But, as I was going on to say when interrupted by a friend, our people are deeply interested on this question of high tariffs and high taxes. They make long, hard days' work to the farmers of the country; they wring the sweat from his brow. The farmers of my district have sent me here to look to their interests. The tariff law now on the statute-book wrings from labor every dollar that the manufacturer pays as a tax. Let members on the other side meet that if they can. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] says that if I was well informed on this subject I would not have made this statement. I have entire respect for the gentleman from Vermont, and I beg to assure him that, to the best of my limited ability, I have informed myself. Doubtless I have not so vast a fund of information as he carries about with him, but still what little I have I operate with. I am not so large an operator as he is. I do not belong to the Committee of Ways and Means. But still I have looked into this question with what intellect God has endowed me with; and I tell the gentleman that I stand by my statement. If it is not true let him make it manifest. I am in quest of information. Let him inform me on that point. Let him show me that I am wrong, and I will acknowledge it. Let him show to me that the plethoric, bloated manufacturers of New England are paying anything to support the Government, and I will recognize it. Show me that our people are not wrung day by day and hour by hour, not merely to support the Government, but to support the manufacturers of New England, and I will acknowledge that, too. I make the assertion, and challenge proof of the contrary.

Then comes this question of drawbacks. It is not true, as the gentleman from Vermont has said, that agriculture is not interested at all in that question. Its interest in it is not very extensive, I admit; but it has just this interest in it: that what the Government pays back to these manufacturers in the shape of drawbacks makes a vacancy in the public Treasury which somebody has to fill up.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. DAWES] asks me how I would raise a revenue. Better, far better, free trade and direct taxation according to each man's wealth, in all sections alike, than this discriminating policy by which that gentleman's constituents grow rich and mine grow poor. The true policy of government is to bring the cheap markets of the world to our doors by free trade. Let our people buy where their money will buy most; and let a revenue for the support of the Government be drawn equally from the wealth of the country.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, I have not participated in this debate to arraign the gentleman's patriotism at all, or to arraign his industry, but I have participated in it for the single purpose of correcting him in his statement. I say to the gentleman that he is mistaken when he says that his constituents are taxed to enrich us. I wish the gentleman to tell me what amount of internal revenue his district pays. My own is a country district, and yet there are but two other districts in the whole Union that pay so much internal revenue to the Treasury of the United States as my district pays; and not a dollar of it at the expense of his constituents. Every dollar of it comes out of the pockets of my constituents. The State of Massachusetts, the whole of New England, pays, in proportion to its inhabitants, its lands and its property, threefold what the gentleman's constituents pay. Let the gentleman put his finger on the article. Is it the cloth he wears on his back? I pay as much duty on it as he does. Is it the cloth his neighbor wears? There is just as much of it worn in my district as there is in his.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me interrupt the gentleman.

Mr. DAWES. Do not use up my time.

Mr. VOORHEES. Very well; I will not interrupt the gentleman if he does not wish it.

Mr. DAWES. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing which the gentleman's constituents consume which is not consumed by my constituents, except it may be whisky. [Laughter.] In everything that pertains to the consumption of the country, my district consumes as much as his does, just in proportion to the number of inhabitants in my district as to those in his. They are about equal in that respect. My constituents pay three per cent. upon every product of their hands, and they pay from three to five per cent. upon the top of that upon every dollar that they make.

I asked the gentleman, when I was up before, whether he would go with me for a direct tax upon every foot of soil and every dollar of stock, cattle, and everything of that kind. If he will go for that, so will all of New England. So will every member here from New England. When we struggled for that during the last Congress we encountered the gentleman and the combined members of the Northwest, who are now complaining against that only just and proper method of taxing dollar by dollar. But they taxed the industry of the country, and my constituents, being more industrious than the gentleman's, are obliged to pay more into the Treasury. That is all. The gentleman's language about free trade and direct taxation he borrows from those who are now arrayed in war against the Government. They are in active, open hostility against the Government. The gentleman's measure—I do not mean to say that it is so intended—is in direct conflict with the Government here at home. The only difference between them is, that the one is avowed as intended for that purpose and the other has that effect.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of closing debate.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope not.

The committee refused to rise.

Mr. WASHEBURNE, of Illinois. I renew the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.]

Mr. Chairman, I have renewed the amendment for the purpose of replying in some measure to the complaint urged by gentlemen from the Northwest on the other side of the House in behalf of the Northwest. They have united in what may be considered a very general denunciation of the revenue laws upon which the Government is to depend for raising the means to carry on the war and to put down the rebellion. Having voted in the last Congress for all of these measures, I intend during this Congress to vote for all those which may be necessary to effect that object. I, too, propose to say a word for the Northwest.

Mr. HARRINGTON. What is the question before the committee?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois, and to which he is now speaking.

Mr. WASHEBURNE, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman spoke to the same amendment, and I hope that he will not interrupt me. I say, sir, that I intend to vote in this Congress for every measure to raise sufficient revenue to enable the Government to put down this rebellion. I am willing to take that responsibility. I shall ever be willing to defend the votes which I gave in the last Congress upon those measures, and those I shall give this Congress.

Sir, it has been alleged here that we in the Northwest are suffering more than any other part of the country from the operation of the revenue laws. I speak for one portion of the Northwest, and I tell the gentleman from Indiana that whatever complaint there may be from his district in regard to the operation of the laws for raising revenue, there is no complaint from the loyal district which I have the honor to represent. The people there are not only willing to stand taxation which we have already imposed, but are willing to stand any additional taxation which may be necessary to crush out this rebellion, and to hang the rebels in the South and the rebel sympathizers of the North.

Complaint has been made against New England. I know that kind of talk. I have heard too often that kind of slang about New England. I heard it here for ten years, when your Barksdales, and your Keitts, and your other traitors now in arms against the Government filled these Halls with their pestilential assaults not only upon New England, but on the free North generally. Sir, I am not for leaving "New England out in the cold," nor am I willing that any other State of this Union shall ever be left out in the cold. I am for any revenue bill that will raise money enough to vigorously carry on the war to crush treason and rebellion and bring back into the fold of the Union every State that has rebelled against the flag, and that by subjugation if it be necessary. I undertake to say the people of Illinois are for such a revenue measure, and that they will cheerfully pay all taxes assessed upon them.

Where was the gentleman from Indiana in the last Congress? When it was proposed to open a great channel of communication, so that the products of his constituents and my own could be speedily and cheaply carried to distant markets, thus advancing the price to be paid to the producers and lessening it to the consumers, where was the gentleman and his friends in the Northwest?

Mr. VOORHEES. I beg pardon of the committee for my repeated appearance upon the floor. Everybody will bear witness that I speak but seldom and always with reluctance. I wish to call the attention of the committee to this point: what has the gentleman said who has just taken his seat? What argument has he made? Has he met anything; has he proved anything; has he disproved anything? Is a speech of that kind to be considered as an answer to any fact or argument? I stand here arguing this bill before the committee. I stand here making assertions and proving facts which the gentleman dare not deny, and does he suppose I will accept a spread-eagle affair of five minutes long as an answer to the remarks I have made upon the material interests of the people I represent?

Why, sir, such an argument, such an attempt at argument, such a speech does not rise high enough to reach an honest man's contempt. Now I call these gentlemen back to the point. They do not answer; they do not deny; they rant. They say the Union will be restored. I think, too, it will be, but it will be after such men as the gentleman from Illinois and those who act with him have been consigned to oblivion, and when the honest sentiment of the people who love this Union with all its laws shall have gained the ascendancy in the country. If they suppose for one moment that the Democratic members and the conservative members upon this floor are to be intimidated from discussion by loud talk and high-sounding sentences, they have got to learn us over again. Meet argument with argument. We will strip your position of this fustian, and leave it naked before the country.

Attack New England! Who has attacked New England? I have not. I have not asked that she should be kept out in the cold. Indeed, she shall not go out, as she takes a notion to once in a while. But when a party in power, be it New England, New York, or anybody else, puts its one hand upon our throats and the other hand in our pockets, and asks us to keep still while the robbery goes on, shall we not be allowed the poor privilege of crying out in our agony?

The gentleman says his constituents are not suffering. Let him speak for them. I think, however, in that he is mistaken if he represents an agricultural district. He says, too, his district is loyal. I should scorn myself if I replied to such a remark. I suppose it is loyal. I do not attack it, and until an attack upon my district comes in some other shape than by such a puerile insinuation, I shall not defend it upon this floor.

A word more. The gentleman says I opposed a great measure for the benefit of the Northwest last Congress—alluding to the celebrated canal scheme in which the gentleman was so much wrapped up. The distinguished chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. STEVENS] from Pennsylvania did the same. For once our disloyal heads upon this side are sheltered by the broad ægis of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. He was not from the Northwest, however.

Mr. VOORHEES. That is true; but I suppose he is loyal. As to the Northwest, I have never been able to appreciate the tangible benefits it would derive from that gigantic scheme of what I have always conceived to be simply a scheme of public plunder. I looked upon it as a great system to feed a loathsome swarm of harpies upon the national Treasury. No such measure ever had and never shall have my sanction. I stand here to defend my course upon that subject whenever it is assailed.

But this is aside from the point. Come back to the issue; come back to the high tariff; come back to the matter of taxation. You shall not escape from it before the country. The soldier of loyal, patriotic heart, the soldier upon the field, who pays fifty or sixty cents a yard for muslin to wrap his wasted body in, shall know to whom he makes that payment. The manufacturer robs him. His interest is identical with the farmer.

Mr. WILSON. I renew the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I had not intended to engage in this discussion at all until I heard the remarks of certain gentlemen upon the other side of the House, who have assumed to speak for the great Northwest. Now, sir, I do not know how it may be with the constituents of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES.] I do not know but that they are all complaining of the burdens necessarily imposed upon the people by the existence of this war. I do not know but that his constituents desire to have the men replaced in power to whom the gentleman refers. He says, restore the power of this Government to them and we will have peace, the Union restored, and prosperity again brought back to the land. Does the gentleman forget, and do his constituents forget, that under the last Administration, which his friends helped to power, this rebellion was organized, and that the men who controlled that Administration are now the men who control the rebel government at Richmond? Do his constituents want those men replaced in power? Do they desire again such an Administration as James Buchanan's, the last sample the gentleman and his friends have given to the country and to the world?

But, sir, I do not wish to enter into this general discussion. I wish to come to the practical phases of the question, and I should like to have the gentleman from Indiana inform this House how it is that the Northwest is compelled to pay a greater proportion of the taxes imposed upon the people than the people of the East? Can the gentleman from Indiana inform this House that the people of his district in the aggregate pay more taxes than the people in the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES?] If not, sir, the argument is against the gentleman from Indiana. You must measure it by districts, for we all represent portions of the country embracing about the same population. The men in my district wear just about the same amount of cotton and woolen goods that the men in the district of the gentleman from Massachusetts do. They pay their proportion of the tax upon the amount of cotton and woolen goods consumed as do the constituents of the gentleman from Massachusetts. There is no difference between us in this regard.

But the gentleman from Indiana would have us believe that because cotton and woolen goods have risen in price, the people of the West have to pay the increased price; and therefore that the burden of taxation is imposed upon them to the exclusion of the people of New England. Why, sir, does not the gentleman know that the agricultural people of the Northwest are to-day receiving higher prices for their agricultural products than they have ever received before? I hold in my hand a paper containing the market report of Chicago. I find that mess pork is bringing from $19 50 to twenty dollars per barrel. Can the gentleman from Indiana tell me at what time in the history of the country a like amount was paid for mess pork? I find also that wheat, instead of being at a dollar a bushel, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana, is at $1 18 to $1 20 per bushel. I find further, that hogs in the Chicago market bring from $6 60 to $7 60 per cwt. Does not that show that while the manufactured articles produced by New England have increased in price, the farmers of the Northwest have also an increased price placed upon their products? Does not that equalize it? Does not New England consume our agricultural products? Do not they depend upon us for the articles of food without which their laborers could not work in their factories? They pay us an increased price for the food we furnish them, and in that way pay back the amount of tax which we of the West pay upon their articles of manufacture. The increased price of the articles manufactured in Massachusetts is distributed throughout the whole country, but the increased price of western products is not distributed between the West and the Northeast as the increased price of New England manufactures is distributed between the East and the West; and for this reason: we raise nearly all the food that the East consumes, and therefore they are paying back to us all the tax which we are required to pay.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Chairman, I would not presume to intrude myself upon the committee at this time, but for the fact that I live in the Northwest, from which complaints have come from the other side, and am a farmer. I am not ashamed to avow upon this floor that I am a farmer; neither am I a city farmer. I went out miles from any house or road to become a farmer; and I stand here in my place to dispute the asserted facts and philosophy of those gentlemen who have risen to speak for the farmers of the Northwest. I can tell them that they are not only against the Government, but against the country—they are legislating for Manchester, Birmingham, and Leeds, and not for the manufacturing and producing interests of this country.

Sir, we are the producers of pork and wheat and corn and cattle and wool, and if we can bring the consumers of those articles nearer to us we enhance their value. How is it when there is a surplus? Why, sir, the value of these products depends upon the nearness and accessibility of the market, and if there was only a foreign market, the value of our products would be proportionately decreased, for we must pay the ocean transportation. Now we have a near market, a home market, and a high market; and I would rather build up Lowell and Lynn and Adams and Utica and Chicago and Cincinnati, than build up Manchester and Birmingham and Leeds, for the great consumers are near us, on our own soil—our countrymen. It is from this fact, that we have good customers here, that I would bring New England nearer to us, that I am in favor of encouraging domestic manufactures. By them we supply the markets of the East and West Indies, of Mexico and South America, with cotton and other manufactured goods. The vessels which go out there laden with our products, return with the products of those countries, and these we get cheaper through building up that trade by ships.

But, Mr. Chairman, all the manufacturing of this country is not to be done in New England, nor in New York in the future. No good friend of the Northwest would strike it down. The business of manufacturing is traveling westward; and when we have secured a national currency and the interest on money is equalized, giving us lower rates, we shall have manufacturing established on the Mississippi river, on the Iowa river, and on the Des Moines, and other rivers of the West. Besides, it is a well-known fact in the history of the movements of the arts and manufactures that they move constantly toward the coal-measures, and follow thrift and population; and we have coal enough in the State of Iowa, easily mined, to supply the world. Shall I as a farmer vote to depress manufacturing? No, we expect to bring consumers, artisans, and capital to our prairie homes.

The gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. VOORHEES,] as I listened to him last year, was threatening us. His party was to leave the school-houses and the mills "out in the cold." He has changed his tone since then. He does not threaten any one now—elections have been held since—but he talks about the poverty of the Northwest, and of unequal taxation. Let him not speak for my district. We are a new State and make no plea of poverty. I say the Northwest never was more prosperous than it is now. We are sad and suffering by the absence of our men. We only want to have our brave soldiers back, and a free, united country. We want men upon our lands. We want an improved system of immigration to bring laborers there where there is great and good room, and then there will be no limit to our prosperity. Sustain labor on our own soil, and—

Mr. GRINNELL. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I renew it. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of answering the remarks of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] who first spoke on this question. I think he is mistaken about the prices of farm produce in the West. It is true that pork is quoted at twenty-two dollars in Chicago; but the enhancement in price has taken place since the article has gone into the hands of the speculators. I know that farmers and small graziers of Illinois have only got six dollars and $6 25 for their pork. Besides, the gentleman forgets that that price does not represent what it formerly represented, inasmuch as payment is made in depreciated currency.

Mr. WILSON. Does not that argument apply to the manufacturers of New England as well as to the farmers of the West?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. It is known to the gentleman, if he knows anything about the agricultural products of the West, that wheat which a few years ago brought $1 25 a bushel in all the markets of the Mississippi valley, is not worth more than that now in a depreciated currency. It is true that the article of corn bears an exorbitant price, but that is the result of a partial failure of the crop. Cattle are not worth as much as they were then by at least thirty per cent. Beef does not command as much as it did for years past; and yet we are told that farmers are receiving compensation equal to what they received heretofore. It is not so, because many articles of manufactured goods that they pay for cost three hundred per cent. more than they cost before the commencement of this war. On every ax that the woodman uses he pays a premium of thirty or forty cents; on every pound of coffee that his family uses, he pays three hundred per cent. more than he used to pay. So it is with cotton and woolen fabrics. Three dollars to-day is not worth more than a dollar was then; and yet, in the face of these facts, the gentleman from Iowa, representing, as he says, an agricultural interest, has the boldness to stand up and tell us that the farmers were receiving compensation equal to what they received heretofore. No, sir. In consequence of the depreciation of the currency, in consequence of the increased price of manufactured goods, in consequence of the increased price of transportation and increase in the price of labor, they are not receiving as much as they received before. Are we to be told, then, that the farmers of the West are not suffering; and are we to be denounced when we ask that the speculators of New England or of anywhere else shall be compelled to pay their proportionate share of the burdens of the people? Is there any justice or equity in exempting them from the payment of this two cents per pound on cotton? I think not. I make these remarks in behalf of the community which I represent, and I presume it will not be charged with disloyalty.

Why, my loyal friend from the Galena district is a constituent of mine, the President of the United States is a constituent of mine, as well as General Grant, the hero of the present war.

I hope that I may not be charged with disloyalty in making the foregoing remarks. I made them because I believe that the burdens of the tax bill of this Congress bore too heavy upon the West, and that unless we guard our western interests the burden of taxation under this bill will fall upon our agricultural people.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have not heard what struck me as being the proper word of reply, capable of being expressed in a five-minutes' speech, to the argument of the member from Indiana. He gave us a pretty, indeed a somewhat striking paraphrase of the argument of Mr. Lamar, the rebel agent, to his confederates in treason, as we find it in the recently published captured correspondence. Drive gold coin out of the country, and induce undue importation of foreign products, so as to strike down the financial system. You can have no further hope for foreign recognition. It is evident the weight of arms is against us; and it is clear that we can only succeed by striking down the financial system of the country. It was an admirable paraphrase of the instructions of Mr. Lamar to the rebel agents in the North.

He told us that a tariff wrings from labor its hard earnings to the extent of the amount it adds to the receipts of the Treasury. It is not so. A five minutes' speech will not afford scope for argument. Let me, therefore, resort to an illustration. The people of the Pacific slope, of California, and Oregon, and Washington, and other Territories, spend their lives in digging gold. The people of the South before the breaking out of the rebellion spent theirs in raising cotton. We of the middle States raise grain, and so spend our lives. We send our cotton to Manchester to be spun; we send our grain to Manchester to feed the laborers who spin and weave it; and we send our gold to buy back enough of our cotton when manufactured, to clothe us. A yard of cloth in Manchester will not buy a bushel of grain. A bushel of grain will not buy a yard of cloth in the far northwestern States. Transportation, inland and marine, taxes and almost consumes the laborer and producer. Let us bring the laborers of Europe here by letting them know what our resources and wants are. Gentlemen of Maryland, let us tell them how rich your State is in coal and iron and water-power. Let us add to this information, so invaluable to them, that you have determined that you will emancipate your negroes, letting them run free, and dam up your magnificent water-power, and make it work for you and them. Gentlemen of Kentucky, do you not wish a home market for your great staples? Do you not wish your immense deposits of coal and iron developed? Do you not wish to see upon your river banks and lines of railroads villages, towns, and cities, school-houses, colleges, and churches rising as they have risen in New England? If you do, will you not help forward American industry? If this be done, and we proclaim to the laborers of the world the wealth that abounds in your midst, the wounds made by this wicked rebellion will all soon be more than healed. Look at the wealth of our Territories. In young Colorado men are already employed not only in agriculture but in working native gypsum, oil, coal, iron, lead, copper, silver, and gold, and universal freedom sheltering all. Yes, if we wisely protect our industry we will have emigrants from all parts of the world come and by their labor add to the value of land that now lies valueless because it is uncultivated. Mines now undeveloped will yield their stores, and the growing towns give untold wealth to those who own the land. To realize all this only requires that we judiciously sustain the industry of the country.

The gentleman spoke of a future oblivion engulfing some men. Yes, sir, it will; but it will not be the men who have honestly and courageously stood by the country. It will not be their children who will pester future legislators to change their names that their fate may not be linked with the infamy of their traitorous ancestors. I remember that the member from Indiana during the last Congress talked about those to whom the infamy of this war would attach. Sir, no infamy has attached to a member on this side of the House. No man who has stood by the country, the flag, and the soldiers who are so gloriously sustaining both has been driven from the railroad cars by indignant patriot soldiers. I no more fear oblivion for my coworkers on this floor than I fear such a burst of indignation from those whose patriotism impels them to glory in sacrifices made on their country's altar, and who understand perfectly that the increased cost of the necessities of life is but the price armed treason is compelling them to pay for the preservation of the unity and Constitution of the country to which they are so devoted.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. VOORHEES. Let me say a word.

Mr. STEVENS. Debate is exhausted on the amendment, and everybody here is exhausted with the debate. [Laughter.]

Mr. VOORHEES. I desire to make a personal statement, and will not consume five minutes' time.

Mr. STEVENS. If debate is exhausted on this amendment, I claim the right to move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Pennsylvania as soon as the gentleman from Indiana concludes his remarks.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to amend the section by striking out the last word.

Mr. STEVENS. The pending amendment is not disposed of yet.

Mr. VOORHEES. Then I have a right to speak to it.

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. The vote will be taken on it.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. VOORHEES. I move to amend by striking out the last word. I was told as I came in just now that the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] was alluding to a circumstance widely published over the country at the time, and which is personal to me, stating that I was thrust from a train of cars by a party of soldiers. I am satisfied that no person on this floor except the member from Pennsylvania would ever have alluded to a thing of that kind; but it having been alluded to, I wish simply to state that it is utterly and unqualifiedly untrue. Not a word, letter, or syllable was true of the statement as published. There was not an offensive word spoken in my hearing, by soldiers or any one else. I got off the cars at the place to which I had taken my ticket, and where I had an appointment that day to speak.

Only a word more. Nothing the gentleman from Pennsylvania could say would call for an answer from me, except, as in this case, the report was circulated upon the responsibility of some other and more respectable source than his slanderous tongue.

Mr. STEVENS. I am opposed to the amendment. I do not know what the amendment is, but I am opposed to it. [Laughter.] I have listened with some pleasure to this discussion, because I know there are some young men here who never heard this before. But thirty years ago I heard this subject discussed by the men now in rebellion, with that able man, Calhoun, at their head; and on the other side by Webster and some other men nearly as able as any now here. [Laughter.] I am sick of it now, and I move that the committee rise.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I beg the gentleman to withdraw his motion. I promise to renew it, and also that I will not make a political speech, if he will permit me in defense of my amendments to state some facts.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. BROOKS. I had no idea, when I offered a mere business amendment, that the politicians on both sides of the House, especially from the East, West, and Northwest, would be in such a commotion.

My proposition was to strike out the two cents allowed as drawback on manufactured goods exported, in the bill under consideration. I was for a revenue; I was not only for the Government raising a revenue, but for supporting the Administration in raising a revenue, and I had but little doubt, until the party bugle was sounded on both sides of the House, that I should be able to obtain a consideration of the equity of the amendment as a mere business matter, without any reference whatsoever to party politics.

I have no idea, as the gentleman from Vermont stated, that the duty of two cents per pound upon cotton will prevent the exportation of the article of American manufacture to foreign countries. The American manufacturer is not only protected in his cotton by a high tariff, but he is protected now, or was yesterday, by a premium on gold of fifty-eight or fifty-nine cents on the dollar, and by an exchange of one hundred and seventy cents or over on all foreign countries. I would enable the American manufacturer, if the duty were four cents per pound, to make enormous profits by drawing bills of exchange upon his cotton exported to the East and to South America.

The principle, then, I lay down is, if you will have a duty on cotton—a duty I regret now to see laid—but if you will have a duty on cotton, let it be equal, let it be universal, let it reach the manufacturer as well as the consumer; let it reach all classes, agriculturalists, commercial men, and manufacturers.

While, therefore, I am in favor of giving the Administration the revenue it needs, I stand up here for equal rights and equal justice, and that was the only object I had in proposing this amendment. I had no idea of starting a party debate.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question, which I put to all the gentlemen from the Northwest on the other side of the House, and which they have failed to answer. I ask him if he will vote for a bill to tax the whole estate of the country, dollar for dollar, at its valuation?

Mr. BROOKS. I will, with great pleasure.

Mr. DAWES. I will join the gentleman in that.

Mr. BROOKS. I think it is a duty that ought to be raised upon the real estate equally throughout the whole country, and I challenge the gentlemen upon the other side of the House to introduce and press a bill like that.

Mr. DAWES. I can only say to the gentleman that he will have New England entirely co-operating with him, and I wish I could hope that the Northwest would do so also.

Mr. STEVENS. I would say to the gentleman from New York that we did lay a direct tax upon lands, but at the urgent request of the western States we suspended its operation for two years.

Mr. BROOKS. I have nothing to do with the controversy between the East and the West.

Mr. STEVENS. I know that. I merely mention the fact.

Mr. BROOKS. I stated in my preliminary remarks that this tax on distilled spirits is a tax upon the producers of corn and grain of from forty to sixty cents a bushel, and I should have read from the Chicago memorial to show—"That the present high averaged price of corn is not owing to the demand for it as food for man or animal, nor for export, for the very plain fact that corn cannot be exported to England (our only considerable foreign consumer) except at a loss of forty cents per bushel, which would bring down the price to an average of seventy cents per bushel."

"Showing, conclusively, that the present high price of corn is forty cents per bushel higher than an export demand will warrant, than a food demand will warrant, than a pork or beef demand will warrant."

"Such being the case, the inevitable result arising from a cessation of even one half the capacity for distilling would be a decline on the present price of corn of twenty to forty cents per bushel, and on other grain for food in proportion as consumption of it is decreased by reason of an increased consumption of corn, say probably seven per cent. on present values, or ten cents per bushel."

What I argued was that when we lay a tax of forty or sixty cents upon the producers of corn and grain in the Northwest, we should insist upon the manufacturer of cotton, in equal and exact justice, paying his two cents per pound, as all other consumers and producers to. I now, in accordance with my promise, renew the motion that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS moved that all debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the pending section of the bill under consideration be closed in one minute after the committee resumes the consideration of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest now that, by unanimous consent, all debate be closed upon the seventh section of the bill also.

Mr. WARD. I must object to that, as I have an amendment to propose.

Mr. STEVENS. It does not preclude amendments, but only debate.

Mr. WARD. I must object, for it would curtail what I desire to say.

COMMITTEE APPOINTED.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following joint committee on the part of the House on the conduct and expenditures of the war: Messrs. GOOCH, JULIAN, ODELL, and LOAN.

The SPEAKER also announced that he had appointed Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, in place of Mr.

Loan, excused from further service on said committee.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOLMAN (at five minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS'S motion was then agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the special order, being bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes.

The question was taken on Mr. Brooks's amendment, and it was disagreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I offer the following as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all manufactures of cotton, wool, silk, worsted, flax, willow, glass, pottery ware, leather, paper, iron, steel, lead, tin, copper, zinc, brass, gold, silver, horn, ivory, bone, bristles, wholty or in part, or of any other material not otherwise provided for by existing law, on hand and for sale on the 12th day of January, 1864, or which may be hereafter manufactured for sale, a duty of five per cent. ad valorem.

It will be observed, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. STEVENS. I make the point of order that debate is closed upon this section.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate was limited to one minute.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, that has expired.

The CHAIRMAN. No, not yet.

Mr. HOLMAN. Moreover debate was only closed on the pending section—section six, and I offer an additional section. It will be observed that the only effect of this amendment will be to increase the duty on manufactures from three per cent. ad valorem to five per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. MORRILL. I would ask the gentleman if that would not increase the burdens of the great West?

The CHAIRMAN. The one minute allowed for debate upon this section has expired.

Mr. HOLMAN. Debate was closed on the sixth section only. My amendment is an additional section to come in between sections six and seven of the original bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The sixth section is still under consideration. The gentleman's amendment would be in order at the end of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I withdraw it for the present.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to amend the seventh section by adding to it the following words:

And that on all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under directions and according to regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

I want to put foreign liquors on the same basis as domestic liquors have been put on.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend the seventh section by striking out "forty" and inserting "sixty" cents, as the additional duty on imported liquors. I observed that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] was very anxious the other day to impose a heavy duty on the cheap article of spirits manufactured in our own country. I propose to place a somewhat heavier duty on foreign brandies and champagne wines imported from abroad. These are very expensive articles and are only used by the wealthy classes. It seems to me, therefore, that they can bear a much heavier duty than the cheap article can. If the argument is that high rates of taxation do not materially affect consumption, I suppose the argument is as good for expensive articles as it is for cheap articles. I hope that my amendment will be adopted, and that this additional duty of sixty cents per gallon will be levied on imported liquors. Independently of the various uses to which spirits is applied in the manufactures, it has become, in some sense, indispensable to the people; and yet it is proposed to tax this common whisky as high as imported liquors are taxed. I think that instead of discrimination against native products, we ought to discriminate in their favor.

Mr. MORRILL. I desire merely to say that the duty proposed is precisely that which equalizes the foreign and the domestic article.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will ask the gentleman from Vermont whether a heavy duty was not imposed on foreign liquors by the act of 1846, and also by the bill reported by himself, and whether the duty proposed here is not comparatively light? I also ask him whether he believes that this increase of duty would materially interfere with the importation of foreign spirits?

Mr. MORRILL. The bill as it now stands leaves foreign and domestic liquors in their relative position to each other. I do not suppose that an increased duty would much diminish the importation, but I think it is as nearly just, as it now stands, as it can be made.

The question was taken by division; and there were, on a count—yes 54, noes 56.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WARD. I move to amend the seventh section by adding to it as follows:

Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to such distilled spirits as are actually on shipboard and bound to the United States, and on deposit in bonded warehouses or public stores when this act shall take effect.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point of order that the amendment is in direct conflict with a provision already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is a matter for the committee, not for the Chair.

Mr. HOOPER. I ask that the section be read as it would be if the gentleman's amendment were adopted.

The section, with the proposed amendment, was read, as follows:

And that on all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under directions and according to regulations to be established by the Secretary of the Treasury: Provided, however, That this section shall not apply to such distilled spirits as are actually on shipboard, and bound to the United States, and on deposit in bonded warehouses or public stores when this act shall take effect.

Mr. WARD. Mr. Chairman, I feel some solicitude in regard to this amendment, as the representative of a city which has a large importing interest. The uniform practice of the Government has been, in all bills relating to the tariff, to except from their provisions all goods, wares, and merchandise on shipboard bound to the United States; also to except goods in the bonded warehouses and public stores. So far as I am aware, there had been no departure from that policy until the last Congress, when a slight departure was made from it. Congress then adopted an amendment excluding goods on shipboard from the rule, but making it apply to goods in bonded warehouses on which the duty would be paid within three months. What I desire to accomplish by my amendment is merely to bring back Congress to the usual custom. I look upon the duty on foreign importations as differing in principle from the tax on domestic goods. Gentlemen may say what they like; but I insist that there is an implied contract between the Government of the United States and the importer. The latter imports at a certain fixed rate of duty, depositing his goods in the warehouse, and giving to the Government a bond to pay that duty. Gentlemen say that there is no contract. I say that there is a contract. I say that the Government is pledged, and that its honor is pledged, when the importer demands his goods, that he shall receive them, and pay the duty only which he agreed to pay, when the goods arrived in the country. So with the goods on shipboard. It is fair that they should pay no more than the duty which was existing at the time the order of the importer was sent out, provided that they are actually upon shipboard, and bound to the United States. I think that this is a matter of justice. I regard this in a different aspect from the duty upon domestic whisky. I say that there has been no opportunity for the importers to avail themselves of the notice.

Mr. HOOPER. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York. It is not consistent with the section.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I move that amendment merely for the purpose of saying, while I have no doubt the class of importers to which my colleague alludes does not come properly within the obnoxious class of speculators which the amendment offered by myself the other day was intended to reach, still the principle which this committee has established, not only in my amendment, but in subsequent amendments to this bill, in my judgment should not now be undone. Although importers may have imported upon the rates of duty which were established at the time their orders were sent to Europe, yet at the same time they have sent those orders to Europe subject to the necessities of the Government. If the necessities of the Government have made it necessary to increase the duties, I say that they took the risk, and that they should not be exempt; that no discrimination should be made in their favor.

Mr. HOLMAN. One word about these bonded warehouses. There are two classes of liquors excepted: those upon shipboard, and secondly, those in bonded warehouses. I would like to inquire whether by that broad provision the gentleman means the liquors placed there in those bonded warehouses by the domestic distillers as well as those placed there by the foreign importers?

Mr. WARD. Only those placed there by the foreign importers.

Mr. HOLMAN. That is not the language of the proposed amendment. If the gentleman does not embrace the domestic distillers who have placed their liquor there under the same sanctions as the foreign importers, I cannot go for his amendment. One placed his liquor in bonded warehouses because the law authorized him to do so, and only requires him to pay the duty when he withdraws it. If he is to be excepted from this bill, how unreasonable it is not to except the manufacturer of domestic spirits, who has also placed his goods in the bonded warehouses? Why should the foreign importer go scot free? It may be that there is an excellent class of commercial gentlemen who are entitled to the favorable consideration of the Government in the great commercial cities. I say that as worthy and as intelligent a class of men, whose goods are also placed in bonded warehouses, is equally entitled to the favor of the Government. If the bill is to be retroactive in reference to one class I shall insist that it shall also be retroactive in regard to the other.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that when the House again resolves itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union that all debate on the pending bill shall be closed in one minute.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Cox in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the internal revenue bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has been closed on the pending section. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from New York.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL. I offer the following as an additional section:

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That consuls of foreign countries in the United States, who are not citizens thereof, shall be and hereby are exempt from any income tax imposed by the act referred to in the first section of this act, which may be derived from their official emoluments, or from their property in such countries: Provided, That the Governments which such consuls may represent shall extend similar exemptions to consuls of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL moved to amend by adding the following as an additional section:

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the assessors and assistant assessors appointed as provided in the act to which this act is an amendment to assess the additional duties levied by this act upon all spirits and cotton on which the duty prescribed in said act shall have been paid or assessed at the time when this act takes effect; and the lists thereof shall be returned to the several collectors, and collections made in the same manner as in the monthly returns of manufacturers; and the duty so assessed shall be a lien in favor of the United States upon all the real and personal estate of the owner of such spirits or cotton, and to be enforced in the same manner as is provided in the case of manufacturers that neglect or refuse to pay the duties provided by the act to which this is in addition: Provided, That the additional duty of one and a half cents per pound shall be levied upon cotton sold by the United States previous to the passage of this act, and on which the duty of one half of one cent per pound has been paid; and upon all cotton so sold on which no duty has been paid a duty of two cents per pound shall be assessed and collected.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to amend by adding the following as an additional section:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all manufactures of cotton, wool, silk, worsted, flax, hemp, jute, India rubber, gutta percha, wood, willow, glass, pottery ware, leather, paper, iron, steel, lead, tin, copper, zinc, brass, gold, silver, horn, ivory, bone, bristles, wholly or in part, (or of any other material not otherwise provided for by existing law,) on hand and for sale on the 12th day of January, 1864, or which may be hereafter manufactured for sale, a duty of five per cent, ad valorem: Provided, That the manufactures above enumerated on which the duty imposed by existing laws have been paid shall only be subject to the additional duty provided for by this act.

On all crude petroleum on hand and for sale on the 12th day of January, 1864, or which shall hereafter be removed for consumption, refinement, or sale, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of ten cents on each and every gallon thereof.

On coal illuminating oil, refined, produced by the distillation of coal, asphaltum, shale, peat, petroleum, or rock oil, and all other luminous substances used for like purposes, there shall be levied, collected, and paid a duty of twenty cents per gallon: Provided, That coal illuminating oil on which a duty has been paid under existing laws shall only pay the additional duty thereon imposed by this act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe debate is in order upon a new section?

The CHAIRMAN. All debate has been cut off by order of the House.

Mr. HOOVER. By unanimous consent, I desire to ask the gentleman one question. I desire to know if he meant to change the present duty upon manufactured tobacco from ten cents per pound to five cents?

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust I may be permitted to answer by saying that the amendment offered has no reference whatever to the tobacco question. It was deemed more fair that that should come under consideration with other subjects of a similar character which the Committee of Ways and Means may hereafter report upon. The only effect of the amendment is to increase the duty on manufactures from three to five per cent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. All debate was cut off by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman was proceeding by unanimous consent, no objection being made.

Mr. PENDLETON. I raise the point of order that the committee cannot give unanimous consent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. My point of order extends farther than that: it is that the amendment introduces a new subject entirely into the Committee of the Whole; and under the order of the House, cutting off all debate upon whisky and cotton, it is not fair to the committee to take the gentlemen of the committee by surprise. Also, that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. STEVENS. May I ask the gentleman from Indiana to withdraw his amendment, and not embarrass the bill, as the committee will present the subject in another bill, upon which the Committee of the Whole will have an opportunity to discuss this matter.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will withdraw it if the committee intend to report upon these matters in another bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Cox reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. I will offer a substitute for the whole bill, and then move to adjourn, so that gentlemen may have an opportunity to examine the substitute before coming to a vote upon it.

I move to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert what I send to the Clerk's desk, and upon that I call the previous question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the substitute will be read, so that we may see whether it is in conformity with the action of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. STEVENS. I was going to move an adjournment, so that gentlemen might see the amendment. What effect will an adjournment now have?

The SPEAKER. The bill will come up to-morrow morning the first thing. The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole House will first have to be voted on before the substitute can be presented for the action of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. But will the whole subject come up in the morning under the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. It will come up as unfinished business.

Mr. STEVENS. Under the demand for the previous question?

The SPEAKER. Either with or without it.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the bill as amended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and also the substitute now reported by me, be ordered to be printed.

It was so ordered.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at half past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 22, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

APPOINTMENT OF A COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER announced that, under the rule of the House adopted yesterday, he had appointed the following members of the standing Committee on a Uniform System of Coinage, Weights, and Measures, namely: Mr. JOHN A. KASSON of Iowa, Mr. ROBERT C. SCHENCK of Ohio, Mr. CHARLES H. WINFIELD of New York, Mr. THOMAS WILLIAMS of Pennsylvania, and Mr. HENRY GRIDER of Kentucky.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN moved that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the unfinished business of yesterday, being the consideration of bill of the House No. 122, to increase the internal revenue and for other purposes, reported yesterday from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with various amendments. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] offered a substitute for the bill, and demanded the previous question.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WILSON. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion. That will answer the same purpose as a call of the House. We merely desire to get the members in before the vote is taken on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Cresswell, Henry Winter Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Edgerton, Eliot, Fulton, Finck, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Herrick, Higby, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Lazear, Le Blond, Loan, Long, Longyear, McClurg, McDowell, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Norton, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Perry, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stebbins, Stevens, Tuayer, Thomas, Tracy, Unson, Van Valkenburgh, Eliza B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Fernando Wood, and Woodbridge—97.

NAYS.—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Anconia, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Coffroth, Cravens, Denison, Eldridge, Ganson, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin

G. Harris, Holman, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Mallory, McKinney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Samuel J. Randall, Shannan, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Sweat, Voorhees, and Wheeler—32.

So it was ordered that there be a call of the House.

Mr. WILSON. A quorum being present, I move that all further proceedings in the call be dispensed with.

The motion was agreed to.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

The SPEAKER stated the question to be upon seconding the demand for the previous question on the internal revenue bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. I submit that the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] cannot be pending while the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union are undisposed of.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be in abeyance until the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union are disposed of, as the Chair stated last evening. If the previous question be sustained, the first question will be upon concurring with the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in their amendments, and then upon the substitute.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to inquire whether the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] was from the Committee of Ways and Means, or whether it was his own?

Mr. STEVENS. It was from the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the question will be first on concurring in the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. And after those amendments are concurred in or rejected, then the question will be upon the bill offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the Committee of Ways and Means?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct. The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER stated that the amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union would be read over, that a separate vote would be taken on such as gentlemen might desire separate votes upon, and that then the vote would be taken in gross on those amendments on which no separate votes were demanded.

The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were read by the Clerk; and those on which separate votes were demanded were reserved.

Mr. STEVENS demanded a separate vote on the third amendment.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD demanded a separate vote on the fourth amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, demanded a separate vote on the fifth amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded a separate vote on the eighth amendment.

The SPEAKER put the question on agreeing to the amendments on which no separate votes were asked, and announced that they were not agreed to; only five members voting in the affirmative, and no further count being demanded.

Mr. STEVENS. Did I understand the Chair to say that no motion to reconsider could be made?

The SPEAKER. After the previous question is sustained, no motion to reconsider can be voted on until after the previous question is exhausted. The amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on which no separate vote was demanded have been non-concurred in by the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Is not a motion to reconsider that vote open now?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been sustained.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly a majority of a quorum did not vote.

The SPEAKER. (after a short interval of time.) The Chair will correct its decision. The previous question cannot be reconsidered, but a motion to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were rejected may be made, but cannot be debated.

Mr. STEVENS. Then I move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understand it, all the amendments except those on which separate votes were asked have been rejected.

The SPEAKER. The House considered the amendments in gross as one amendment, and they were non-concurred in. The gentleman from Pennsylvania now moves to reconsider the vote by which they were rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider simply that the House may vote intelligently. I ask the Speaker by what vote did the House non-concur?

The SPEAKER. There were five votes in the affirmative, and no further count being insisted on, the yeas had it.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not think that that vote ought to carry.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURNE's motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider; and it was agreed to.

So the vote by which the amendments were rejected was reconsidered.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendments; on which no separate vote was demanded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, asked for a separate vote on the seventh amendment.

Mr. BROWN, of Wisconsin, demanded separate votes on the first and second amendments.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If it is not too late, I demand a separate vote on each amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is not too late. The amendments will be voted on in detail.

First and second amendments:

On line twelve, after the word "on" insert "the interest of all persons in default in," and after the word "and" insert the word "in," so that it will read:

Said duty shall be a lien and charge on such spirits, and also on the interest of all persons in default in the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and in the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, until the said duty shall be paid.

The amendments were severally agreed to.

Third amendment:

Insert the following:

And all whisky or any other spirits, on being rectified or mixed with any other spirit or fluid whatever, or into which any matter whatever may be infused, and to be sold as whisky, brandy, rum, gin, wine, or by any other name, and not otherwise provided for by this act or the act to which it is amendatory, shall pay an additional tax of twenty cents per gallon: Provided.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent of the House to offer an amendment changing the twenty cents into a dollar, so as to prevent liquor being adulterated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—ayes 92, yeas 34.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Fourth amendment:

Strike out the following: Provided further, That all spirits distilled since the 31st day of August, 1862, on hand for sale, or removed for consumption or sale, upon which no duties have been paid or collected, or upon which no returns have been made, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864; and insert in lieu thereof the following:

Provided further, That all spirits on hand for sale, whether distilled prior to the date of this act or not, shall be subject to the rates of duty provided by this act from and after the 12th day of January, 1864; except that spirits which have been already taxed under the law approved July 1, 1862, shall not bear more than the additional or increased tax provided for by this act.

Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NOBLE. I ask whether it is not competent to have the amendment divided, so as to have the vote first taken on the part to be stricken out?

The SPEAKER. It is not, it being reported as one amendment by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alcey, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Astley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Francis P. Blair, Boyd, Brundage, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chandler, Ambrose W. Clark, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Crosswell, Daves, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Elliot, Farnsworth, Ganson, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Higby, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubbard, Hutchins, Jenckes, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Maltory, Marvin, McClurg, Samuel F. Miller, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Norton, Odell, Charles O'Neill, Perlman, Pike, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Scofield, Scott, Smith, Spalding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Wadsworth, Elihu R. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilson, Windom, Fernando Wood, and Yeaman—97.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Brooks, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fenton, Finck, Frank Holman, Hooper, Knapp, Lazear, Long, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Pendleton, Perry, Pomroy, Pruyn, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Edward H. Rollins, Schenck, Shannon, Smithers, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Ward, Wheeler, Winfield, and Woodbridge—57.

So the amendment was concurred in.

During the vote,

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, stated that his colleague, Mr. LOVEJOY, was confined to his room by indisposition.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Fifth amendment:

After these words: "And the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction; and any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such spirits or other articles, subject to duty as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same with the design of avoiding payment of the duties imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded, to be recovered as other penalties provided by the act heretofore mentioned," add the following:

One half of which shall be awarded, and, upon recovery, paid to the Informer.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL asked the unanimous consent to insert after the word "recovered," in the same paragraph, the words "and applied."

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

Sixth amendment:

Strike out the following:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits upon which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and when the same is intended for exportation may be removed without being charged with duty, if transported directly from the distillery or bonded warehouse, under such rules and regulations, and upon the execution of such transportation or other bonds, as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; said bonds to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district in which such distilleries or bonded warehouses may be situated to a bonded warehouse at any port of entry of the United States—said warehouse at the port of entry to be established in conformity with the law and Treasury regulations, and to be used exclusively for the storage of distilled spirits—and to be placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouse; and all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, at the expense of the said owner or proprietor, and shall also be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses, in all respects, as other goods may be subject to that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States; and no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirits upon which an excise duty has been paid either before or after it has been placed in bonded warehouse as aforesaid," and in lieu thereof insert as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits upon which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and when the same is intended for exportation, may, without being charged with duty, be removed under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district from which such removal is made: Provided, That the said spirits shall be transported directly from the distillery or a bonded warehouse to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with the law and Treasury regulations, at a port of entry of the United States, and used for the storage of distilled spirits; and to be placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouse. And all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, and at the expense of the said owner or proprietor; and the said spirits shall also be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses, in all respects, to which other goods that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States may be subject. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirit upon which an excise duty shall have been paid either before or after it shall have been placed in a bonded warehouse as aforesaid; but no provision of this act shall be construed to repeal existing laws which provide that distilled spirits may be removed from the place of manufacture or bonded warehouse for the purpose of being redistilled for exportation, or which provides for the manufacture for exportation of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, and cosmetics.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

Add the following:

Provided, That on all cotton on which the duty of a half cent has been paid, the additional duty of one and a half cent shall be levied and collected: And provided further, That all provisions of law, whereby cotton in the hands of manufacturers of cotton fabrics on October 1, 1862, and prior thereto, is exempted from taxation, are hereby repealed, and the same shall be subject to the rate of taxation imposed by this bill.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

Add as follows:

And that upon all such spirits imported prior to the passage of this act there shall be levied, collected, and paid an additional tax of forty cents per gallon, to be collected under the direction and according to regulations established by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Ninth amendment:

Add:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That consuls of foreign countries in the United States, who are not citizens thereof, shall be, and hereby are, exempt from any income tax imposed by the act referred to in the first section of this act, which may be derived from their official emoluments, or from property in such countries: Provided, That the Governments which such consuls may represent shall extend similar exemption to consuls of the United States.

The amendment was concurred in; there being, on a division—ayes eighty-four, yeas not counted.

Tenth amendment:

Add:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the assessors and assistant assessors appointed as provided in the act to which this act is an amendment, to assess the additional duties levied by this act upon all spirits and cotton on which the duty prescribed in said act shall have been paid or assessed at the time when this act takes effect; and the lists thereof shall be returned to the several collectors and the collections made in the same manner as in the case of monthly returns of manufactures. And the duties so assessed shall be a lien in favor of the United States upon all the real and personal estate of the owner of such spirits or cotton, to be enforced in the same manner as is provided in the case of manufacturers who neglect or refuse to pay the duties provided by the act to which this is in addition: Provided, That the additional duty of one and one half cent per pound shall be levied upon cotton sold by the United States previous to the passage of this act, and on which a duty of one half of one cent per pound has been paid; and upon all cotton so sold on which no duty has been paid, a duty of two cents per pound shall be assessed, and collected.

The amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurred on the following substitute, moved by Mr. STEVENS:

Strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

"That, from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duty provided for in section forty-one of an act entitled 'An act to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt,' approved July 1, 1862, and in addition to duties payable for licenses, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all spirits that may be distilled and sold, or distilled and removed for consumption or sale, after the 12th day of January, 1864, of first proof, the duty of sixty cents on each and every gallon; and said duty shall be a lien and charge on such spirits, and also on the interest of all persons in default in the distillery used for distilling the same, with all the stills, vessels, fixtures, and tools therein, and in the lot or tract of land whereon the said distillery is situated, until the said duty shall be paid: Provided, That the said duty on spirituous liquors, and all other spirituous beverages enumerated in this act, shall be collected at no lower rate than the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That all spirits or other articles on which duties are imposed by the provisions of this act, or of the act referred to in the first section of this act, or amendments thereto, which shall be found in the possession or custody or within the control of any person or persons, for the purpose of being sold by such person or persons, in fraud of the internal revenue laws, as heretofore referred to, or with design to avoid payment of said duties, may be seized by any collector or deputy collector who shall have reason to believe that the same are possessed, had, or held for the purpose or design aforesaid, that the same shall be forfeited to the United States; and also all articles of raw materials found in the possession of any person or persons intending to manufacture the same for the purpose of being sold by them, in fraud of said laws, or with design to evade the payment of said duties; and also all tools, implements, instruments, and personal property whatsoever, used in the place or building, or within any yard or inclosure where such articles on which duties are imposed, as aforesaid, shall be found, may also be seized by any collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, and the same shall be forfeited as aforesaid. And the proceedings to enforce said forfeiture shall be in the nature of a proceeding in rem in the circuit or district court of the United States for the district where such seizure is made, or in any other court of competent jurisdiction. And any person who shall have in his custody or possession any such spirits or other articles, subject to duty as aforesaid, for the purpose of selling the same with the design of avoiding payment of the duties imposed thereon, shall be liable to a penalty of $500, or not less than double the amount of duties fraudulently attempted to be evaded, to be recovered as other penalties provided by the act heretofore mentioned; and also that the spirits and other articles which shall be so seized by any collector or deputy collector shall, during the pendency of such proceedings, be delivered to the marshal of said district, and remain in his care and custody and under his control until final judgment in such proceedings shall be rendered: Provided, however, That where, owing to its perishable nature, the expense of storage, or other circumstance the value of the property seized may be diminished by delay of sale, the owner thereof may apply to the assessor of the district, who shall, if he deem it expedient that the property so seized should be sold, cause the same to be appraised under his direction and control, and delivered to the owner, if the said owner shall give bond or bonds in an amount equal to the appraised value, with such sureties as the assessor shall adjudge good and sufficient, which shall be by him transmitted to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, to be held and collected, or any part thereof, or surrendered in accordance with the final judgment, order, or decree of the court having jurisdiction of the case; or, if the owner shall not apply as aforesaid, the assessor, upon the application of the marshal of the said district in whose custody and control said spirits or other articles seized as aforesaid, may be, shall appraise or have the articles appraised under his direction and control, and shall issue and return to the marshal aforesaid an order to sell the same; and the said marshal shall thereupon advertise and sell the same, and the proceeds of sale, after deducting therefrom the costs of seizure and sale, shall be paid into the court having jurisdiction of the case, and paid out as the said court shall on final judgment order or decree.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That all distilled spirits upon which an excise duty is imposed by law may be exported without payment of said duty, and, when the same is intended for exportation, may, without being charged with duty, be removed under such rules and regulations and upon the execution of such transportation bonds or other security as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe; said bonds or other security to be taken by the collector of internal revenue of the district from which such removal is made: Provided, That the said spirits shall be transported directly from the distillery or a bonded warehouse to a bonded warehouse established in conformity with the law and Treasury regulations, at a port of entry of the United States, and used for the storage of distilled spirits; and to be placed in charge of a proper officer of the customs, who, together with the owner and proprietor of the warehouse, shall have the joint custody of all the distilled spirits stored in said warehouse. And all the labor on the goods so stored shall be performed by the owner or proprietor of the warehouse, under the supervision of the officer of the customs in charge of the same, and at the expense of the said owner or proprietor; and the said spirits shall also be subject to the same rules and regulations, and be chargeable with the same costs and expenses, in all respects, to which other goods that are deposited in public store for exportation from the United States may be subject. And no drawback shall in any case be allowed on any distilled spirit upon which an excise duty shall have been paid either before or after it shall have been placed in a bonded warehouse as aforesaid; but no provision of this act shall be construed to repeal existing laws which provide that distilled spirits may be removed from the place of manufacture or bonded warehouse for the purpose of being redistilled for exportation, or which provides for the manufacture for exportation of medicines, preparations, compositions, perfumery, and cosmetics.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, in lieu of the duties provided in the act referred to in the first section of this act, there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon all cotton produced or sold and removed for consumption, and upon which no duty has been levied, paid, or collected, a duty of two cents per pound; and such duty shall be and remain a lien thereon until said duty shall have been paid, in the possession of any person or persons, corporation or association of persons, or transport the same, or procure any other party or parties to remove, carry, or transport the same from the place of its production, with the intent to evade the duty thereon, or to defraud the Government, before said duty shall have been paid, such person or persons, corporation or association or persons, shall forfeit and pay to the United States double the amount of said duty, to be recovered in any court of competent jurisdiction: Provided, That all cotton sold by or on account of the Government of the United States shall be free and exempt from duty at the time of and after the sale thereof; and the same shall be marked free and the purchaser furnished with such a bill of sale as shall clearly and accurately describe the same, which shall be deemed and taken to be a permit authorizing the sale or removal thereof.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That every collector to whom any duty upon cotton shall be paid shall mark the bales, or other packages, upon which the duty shall have been paid, in such manner as may clearly indicate the payment thereof, and shall give to the owner, or other person having charge of such cotton, a permit for the removal of the same, which shall be dated and contain a description, including the weight and other marks of the bales, or packages, and a statement of the fact that the duty has been paid. Whenever any cotton, the product of the United States, shall arrive at any port of the United States from any State in insurrection against the Government, the assessor or assistant assessor, under the act referred to in the first section of this act, shall immediately assess the taxes due thereon, and shall, without delay, return the same to the collector or deputy collector of said district, and the said collector or deputy collector shall demand of the owner or other person having charge of such cotton, the tax imposed by this act, and assessed thereon, unless evidence of previous payment of said tax shall be produced, under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, by the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall from time to time prescribe. And in case the tax so assessed shall not be paid to such collector within thirty days after demand, the collector or deputy collector, as aforesaid, shall institute proceedings for the recovery of the tax, which shall be a lien upon said cotton from the time when said assessment shall be made.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the date on which this act takes effect, in computing the allowance or drawback upon articles manufactured exclusively of cotton when exported, there shall be allowed, in addition to the three per cent. duty which shall have been paid on such articles, a drawback of two cents per pound upon such articles in all cases where the duty imposed by this act upon the cotton used in the manufacture thereof shall be satisfactorily shown to have been previously paid; the amount of said drawback to be ascertained in such manner as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That, from and after the passage of this act, in addition to the duties heretofore imposed by law, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on spirits distilled from grain or other materials, whether of American or foreign production, imported from foreign countries, of first proof, a duty of forty cents on each and every gallon; and no lower rate of duty shall be levied or collected than upon the basis of first proof, and shall be increased in proportion for any greater strength than the strength of first proof.

Mr. WASIBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is this substitute the same as the original bill? If it is not I must call for its reading.

Mr. STEVENS. It is not the same. It makes it distinct that no duty shall be levied on anything except what was distilled after this bill was introduced into the House. The other was doubtful, and this makes the bill distinct on that point. That is all the difference there is.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not avail myself of my privilege of occupying an hour, which I have a right to do, in closing the debate on this bill, because I believe that this matter is fully understood. I want to state distinctly, so that the House may fully understand, what is the bearing of the amendment introduced into this bill—the principle therein contained, as well as the difference between the two bills. By the legislation of 1862, when the internal revenue system was inaugurated, after a very full discussion in this House, it was distinctly declared that all of our taxes should be prospective; that nothing should be laid upon goods manufactured prior to that time; that all those things should be exempted from taxation. That was the principle then solemnly decided upon by those who had control of this House, and who passed that bill. The country was right to suppose that that was the settled policy, unless we were justified in deceiving the people, or a different party came here to alter what had been done before. We know how the gentlemen on the other side will vote, but if those on this side, who were here during the last Congress, votes as proposed, then there will have been not only deception but rank injustice in what was done heretofore. And the public would have a right to complain of a party which would thus hold out to the country a particular policy upon which they might act, and after having intrapped them into operations based thereon, turn round and reverse that policy. I am opposed to any such principle, and I undertake to say the country will be opposed to it also.

But the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] although he possibly intended to embrace in it more than he has, embraces only one single class of people, and that is the distillers. The section of the original act to which this refers, and to which this is an amendment, embraced and taxed only liquors in the hands of distillers, and nowhere else. After that liquor had gone forth, no matter how it went forth, it was not to be taxed. In the hands of the distillers it was to be taxed, and when offered for sale the stamp of the Government was to be put upon it as taxed property, and sent forth to the community with the official stamp of the Government as property in which any man had a right to deal and traffic as he chose, as in all other property. In other words, it was property sent forth by the Government itself, after having paid a revenue to that Government. And under such circumstances to place another tax upon it would be as dishonest, in my judgment, as if I were to sell a man a horse for fifty dollars free of tax, and then, being sovereign, should turn round and tax the horse I had just sold him one half the value of the horse. I can look upon the morality of the matter in no other light.

Now, if the object which possibly the gentleman had in view in offering his amendment was effected by it, what would be the result? But I deny that his bill taxes anybody except the distillers. The tax is upon the distiller alone, and a tax is laid nowhere else; and throughout the whole bill, as amended, the first section of it refers to nobody but to distillers. You cannot reach the spirits anywhere else under the provisions of this bill. And yet this amendment of the gentleman from New York lays a tax upon distillers who have once paid the tax and who happen to have it on hand for sale. If gentlemen will scrutinize the amendment they will see it reaches nobody else on earth.

Some gentlemen here, I presume, have voted for the amendment because they wanted to tax the speculators, but in doing that they vote to put an additional tax on that in the hands of the distillers only, and allow everybody else to go free.

But suppose the gentleman has reached what he possibly intended to be the object of his bill, what has he reached? Liquors on hand. For what? For sale. A man who has laid up a store of a hundred barrels in his vaults for ripening, as I have no doubt many able members in this House have, are entirely exempt under the amendment of the gentleman from New York, even had he reached all he wished, for he says "all spirits on hand for sale." Now, why not reach the seller, or the millionaire, who has laid in a hundred barrels for ten years to come? Why let him go free? Let the gentleman who framed such an amendment answer; I shall not. Such is the effect of the bill, and the people will so understand it. They will see that while the stores of the rich men are all exempt from this tax, the liquor which is sold from day to day to the poor man is reached by this bill, if the gentleman has attained his object.

I submit to this House whether such is their intention. Such is the bill. If you do, swallow it, and swallow it as you would the very worst whisky you ever got in your lifetime. It is very unpalatable to me, because it contains the rankest injustice.

But that is not all. The gentlemen from New England, many of them, have voted upon the principle upon which this whisky is taxed in voting to retax all cotton fabrics on hand. It has already paid its three per cent., and it has not all gone into use. Why do you not trace it to the people who have it now on their backs? Tax goods, tax cotton, tax cotton fabrics, but why not tax it upon the wearer as well as in the hands of the manufacturer who has it in his cloth-room?

But let us go a little further to show the beauties of this bill. It is rank in injustice from amendment to amendment. We have also voted here that all liquors imported under our last law, which paid their dollar or two dollars a gallon, which the merchant received and put into his vault upon paying the revenue to the Government, shall be reached by the tax-gatherer and assessor in his cellar and his vaults, and retaxed forty cents more. Is this the way in which citizens who have proceeded honestly and on the faith of your law as it stood are to be treated by this Congress or by this House? Are we to appear upon the records of the country forever as sanctioning a provision of this kind? Let those who choose to do it, do it. For my part I will sanction no such principle.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to have occupied the time of the House thus long. I now ask for a vote upon the substitute.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Is any further debate allowed?

The SPEAKER. It is not. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, having reported the bill, had a right to close the debate after the main question was ordered. The question now is upon agreeing to the substitute offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the reading of the substitute be dispensed with. I understand that it is substantially the original bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. STEVENS. I may say it is the same bill with the exception I have mentioned. This is prospective entirely.

Mr. BLISS. I object to dispensing with the reading.

The substitute was read.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the substitute; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 51, nays 101; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baily, Blaine, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. The latter motion was agreed to.

SERVICE ON COMMITTEES.

Mr. GOOCH asked to be excused from further service on the select committee on the rebellious States and on the Committee on Private Land Claims.

Mr. Gooch was excused.

Mr. JULIAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to be excused from further service on the Committee on Public Expenditures. This committee now has in charge an important investigation into the affairs of the New York custom-house, and my duties on two other important committees require every moment of my time. I therefore hope to be relieved.

Mr. Julian was excused.

COAST-SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported a resolution that there be printed three thousand copies extra of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1863, two thousand for the use of the Superintendent and one thousand for the use of members of the House; and moved the previous question on its adoption.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

Mr. A. W. CLARK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

COLLECTORS' FEES.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee on Commerce to inquire into the expediency of regulating and equalizing the fees and salaries of collectors of customs on the northern, northwestern, and western frontiers of the United States, and to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

REPORTS OF PRIVATE BILLS.

Mr. KELLOGG, of New York, called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER announced the regular order of business to be the call of committees for reports of a private character, beginning with the Committee of Elections.

CHAPIN HALL.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Chapin Hall; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

SUTCLIFFE AND CASE.

Mr. HALE also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 43) for the relief of Milo Sutcliffe and Levi H. Case; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, and, with the report, ordered to be printed.

ISAAC HERTZBERG.

Mr. HALE, from the same committee, reported back the petition of Isaac Hertzberg, and asked that the committee be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

It was so ordered.

WILLIAM C. WALKER AND OTHERS.

It was so ordered.

CHARLES ANDERSON.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Charles Anderson, assignee of John James, of Texas; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. SCHENCK moved its reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move its reference to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is a claim arising out of a quartermaster's contract, and has been twice before former Congresses, and on each occasion I find that it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, both in the Senate and the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my motion. My impression was that it was before the Committee of Claims, last Congress.

The bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PATENT LAWS.

Mr. CHANLER, by unanimous consent, introduced a resolution, which was read, considered, and agreed to, instructing the Committee on Patents to inquire into the expediency of compiling and printing in one body the laws of the United States and the regulations of the Patent Office relative to patents.

COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the Committee on Enrolled Bills be allowed to sit during the sessions of the House.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, it has occurred to me that very much of the debates on the question before the House would have been more appropriate to the halls of judicature than to this

Mr. CRAVENS stated that his colleague, Mr. LAW, was still detained from the House in consequence of injuries sustained by a fall on the ice, but hoped to be in his seat in a few days.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the substitute was rejected; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question being upon its passage,

Mr. ANCONA demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 68; as follows:

hall of legislation; and being thus impressed, I shall, at some convenient period, offer for adoption an amendment to the joint resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, which I now read for the information of members on both sides of the House, that they may be prepared for it. I shall move to strike out all after the word "read" in the eighth line of the joint resolution, and to insert the following:

Nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work any forfeiture of the real estate of the offenders contrary to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

Then take the proviso and go on with it to the end. It will be perceived that the object in introducing this amendment will be to simplify the resolution and render it more clear and distinct, and save the scruples of the members of the House on the other side, who fear that the Constitution of the United States is in danger of being violated.

Mr. Speaker, the question was asked yesterday very emphatically by the learned gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. Rogers] why it was that members of this side of the House could not be content with the legislation of the last Congress on the subject of confiscation? A reply is furnished to our hand by the language of a distinguished colleague of my own, [Mr. Cox,] who said that our legislation on this subject was "another failure." And it is because we wish our legislation in respect to the confiscation of rebel property to be a success that we venture to offer some amendment to the joint resolution.

In July, 1862, the Congress of the United States passed an act to suppress insurrection, &c., the fifth section of which provides as follows:

"That to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, stocks, credits, and effects of the persons hereinafter named in this section, and to apply and use the same, and the proceeds thereof, for the support of the Army of the United States."

Then follows the clause designating the persons whose property should be thus seized, consisting chiefly of all the officers of the army and navy of the rebel confederacy in arms against the Government of the United States, and the principal civil officers of the so-called "confederate States of America." This enactment did not at first meet with the approval of the President of the United States for reasons that will soon be made apparent, and consequently the joint resolution was adopted explanatory of the act, the last clause of which reads as follows:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

The approval of the President of the enactment and of the joint resolution took place at one and the same time, July 17, 1862. Concurrent with this approval, a message was transmitted by the President to the Senate of the United States, accompanied by a very singular document, yclept a "veto," which thus became in the apprehension of his conservative friends on the other side of this House a very important "State paper."

However much I may esteem the character of our worthy Chief Magistrate, I must be permitted to say that this proceeding was not in good taste. The President, in the exercise of his prerogative, has a just right to place his veto upon any unwise legislation of Congress. But this power was placed in his hands to check improvident legislation, and not to intimidate the members of the national Legislature. Who that is conversant with the passage of this joint resolution will hesitate to say that it was passed under duress—"duress per minus," as we lawyers say?

Now, sir, I will advert for a moment to some portions of this most extraordinary State paper. On page 871 of the Journal of the Senate for the second session of the last Congress I find the following:

Fellow-Citizens of the Senate and House of Representatives: Considering the act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, and joint resolution explanatory of said act as being substantially one, I have approved and signed both. Before I was informed of the passage of the resolution I had prepared the draft of a message stating objections to the bill becoming a law, a copy of which draft is herewith transmitted.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

WASHINGTON, July 17, 1862.

Then follows the veto drawn up for the purpose of being applied to the bill before it was approved with the joint resolution. I inquire, "cui bono" was this supplemental message transmitted to the Thirty-Seventh Congress? I honor the Chief Magistrate when he sends his reasons for placing his negative upon the legislation of Congress, and I honor just as highly any member who adheres to his convictions of right irrespective of the veto to be placed upon his act. Such practices will not intimidate upright and independent minds.

But the veto has thus unnecessarily been made a part of the records of the legislation of Congress.

And on page 873, near the foot of the page, I read:

"That to which I chiefly object pervades most parts of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, seventh, and eighth sections. It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divestment of the title forever. For the causes of treason and the ingredients of treason, not amounting to a full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that 'no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted.'"

And now by this sage reasoning any ingredients of treason less than the sum total which would make up the offense of treason, carries with it the same disability to work a forfeiture, in perpetuity, with an attainder of treason. And by carrying out this process of reasoning, Congress has no power to take from any citizen his property for any offense whatever. Why? Because there can be no confiscation for a longer time than the offender's life for that which is in itself treason or less than the crime of treason.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the first Congress which sat in this country under the present Constitution, passed an act defining the crime and declaring the punishment of treason; and that punishment was simply the good old-fashioned punishment of hanging by the neck until dead, dead, dead. In the third section of the same act we find the crime of murder committed in any fort, arsenal, &c., punished with death; and that Congress ordered that, upon sentence of death for murder being carried into execution, the body of the criminal should be handed over to the surgeons to be dissected. Now, suppose Congress had ordered that the bodies of these rebels, seized, arraigned, tried, and convicted of treason of the blackest dye, should have been handed over to the surgeons for dissection. They then would have been hung up in glass cases according to the practice of surgeons, and subjected to the gaze of all mankind; would not the gentlemen on the other side have made the same appeal to us they make now? Would they not have said, "You are shocking the sensibilities of the children and the children's children of these rebels for all time to come, by exposing their fathers for this great iniquity to be dissected and hung up in a glass case?" However much the sympathy of gentlemen may have been drawn out, however lachrymose they might have become upon that subject, it would have been constitutional and legal legislation nevertheless.

But the gentlemen on the other side claim that the Constitution, in article three, section three, interposes a barrier to the forfeiture of the lands of those rebels for anything more than their lives, whether they be tried and convicted of treason or not. Well, now, I propose, as a lawyer, to affix some limits to this test of the constitutional question. The language of the Constitution either has a legal significance, or it has not. Has it a legal significance?

Now, is it not legitimate to inquire what is meant by an "attaint," because this restriction evidently applies to nothing but "an attainder" for treason? May we not inquire, then, and must we not inquire, what an "attaint" is in the eye of the law? And for this let us go to the fountain-head. I have in my hand the fourth volume of Tucker's Blackstone, and read extracts from pages 380 and 381. From page 380 I read:

"When sentence of death, the most terrible and highest judgment in the laws of England, is pronounced, the immediate, inseparable consequence, by the common law, is attainder."

When, by the operation of the common law, does the criminal become attainted? It is answered:

"This is after judgment, for there is a great difference between a man convicted and attainted, though they are frequently through inaccuracy confounded together. After conviction only a man is liable to none of these disabilities, for there is still, in contemplation of law, a possibility of his innocence." And therefore either upon judgment of outlawry, or of death for treason or felony, and not before, shall a man be said to be attainted."

"The consequences of attainder are forfeiture and corruption of blood." "Forfeiture is twofold—of real, and personal estate. First as to real estate: by attainder in high treason a man forfeits to the king all his lands and tenements of inheritance, whether fee simple or fee tail."

"But though after attainder the forfeiture relates back to the time of the treason committed; yet it does not take effect unless an attainder be had, of which it is one of the fruits; and therefore if a traitor dies before judgment pronounced, or is killed in open rebellion, or is hanged by martial law, it works no forfeiture of his lands, for he never was attainted of treason."

Well, now, for one instant suppose that some portion of our Army should have the good fortune to seize the chief of the rebels, Jeff. Davis himself, and suppose that he should be put to death by martial law; would there be any "attainder" in his case? Not at all; not at all, according to the authorities. But, say the gentlemen, your Congress passes a bill of attainder when it confiscates the lands. I say in reply, Mr. Speaker, that the Constitution of the United States has stopped all that matter by providing that "no bill of attainder shall be passed." Inasmuch, then, as Congress cannot pass a bill of attainder, as the Parliament formerly did in England, either before or after the death of the felon or traitor; as Congress cannot pass a bill of attainder at any time nor in any way, and inasmuch as the common law of England has no application to the punishment of crimes in this country, I declare for myself that I can see no room for this provision of our Constitution to operate at all. I regard it as simply a work of superabundant caution on the part of our ancestors, coming so recently from under the dominion of the British Crown, to provide by all necessary, and, if you please, unnecessary constitutional provisions against the reenactment in this country of scenes of barbarity which had occurred so frequently in the Old World.

I find that the learned Justice Story, who has been quoted here with so much approbation on the other side of the House, in his Commentaries on the Constitution, when speaking of this crime of treason, and of this interdiction in the Constitution of the United States, gives us the instance of the Third Richard, who was attainted by bill of attainder in Parliament, months after he had laid down his life upon Bosworth field. No one pretends that in this country any enactment of that sort could be made by Congress. No one pretends that the common-law principle would attach any such consequence to an adjudication of the courts upon a charge of treason, or murder, or any other felony.

My learned colleague upon the other side of the House [Mr. Bliss] cited, as an authority for the principle for which he contends, a passage from the Federalist, from an essay by Mr. Madison. I give to the authority all the credit that could be asked for it by the learned gentleman, and even more, if necessary, but I say the authority is not in point for his side of the argument, after all. On page 271 of the Federalist I read:

"Congress has power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture, except during the life of the person attainted."

"As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be able to punish it; but as new-fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free governments, have usually weakened their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it, and restraining the Congress even in punishing it from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author."

Now here let us pause for a moment and inquire what is the meaning of this language, "beyond the person of its author." We all know— all who have read the history of such proceedings in England—that oftentimes these attainders were made use of to corrupt the blood of a person who had been executed for treason or some other felony, and to stop the transmission of estates from a remote ancestor of the felon to his posterity below. It is well known that those acts were indulged in to gratify sometimes private hate and malice against the families of offenders, but oftener, perhaps, for the purposes of speculation; and I believe both those motives are charged home upon members on this side of the House in the arguments of the gentlemen upon the other side: that this bill, which professedly is a bill for the suppression of the rebellion and to increase the means of defraying the expenses of our Army made necessary by the rebellion, is not really so, but that it is only a subterfuge, and that the real object is to plunder the oppressed citizens of the South for the benefit of speculators in the North.

Mr. Speaker, I am not very apt to find in the Constitution of the United States an unmeaning sentence, especially when the language is employed upon so important a topic as treason against the Government; yet I do find that the framers of the Constitution gave to Congress full power to punish treason. They intended, however, to limit that punishment, whatever it might be, to the life and person of the offender.

Now I ask, in all good faith, is not the person of the offender punished by taking from him his property equally with incarcerating him in the penitentiary? Is it not a punishment of the person to take from him his estate as much as it is a punishment of his person to decapitate him? So that the punishment is adjudged against the person during the lifetime of that person, I apprehend the limitation of the Constitution is satisfied.

If this was res nova, Mr. Speaker, if it was a new question, I should at once most heartily agree with the learned gentleman from Maryland [Mr. DAVIS] who made an able argument upon this side of the question the other day. But, sir, I am somewhat staggered in my belief when I look into the legislation of Congress immediately upon the adoption of the Constitution. When I find in the act of 1790 the punishment of treason death, and also a proviso that that punishment should carry with it no confiscation of estate whatever, I am led to believe that the members of that Congress, very many of whom were members of the Convention that framed the Constitution, understood the phraseology to mean, that upon attainder of treason no forfeiture of land should follow, except during the life of the offender.

Now, my learned colleague [Mr. BLISS] suggests that there seems to be here an absurdity. I felt conscious that the astute legal mind of that gentleman could not avoid that perplexity, and hence I desired to be made acquainted with his mode of escape from so embarrassing a dilemma.

In all civilized countries the punishment of treason is ordinarily death. It is the highest crime known to the law, and is ordinarily punished by death. If, then, the confiscation of the lands must be only for the life of the offender, how long would that confiscation endure? My astute friend said, "for a time equal to the length of his halter." And that is true. I could not show the absurdity of the conclusion attempted to be drawn by the gentlemen on the other side in any more forcible language than by saying that the framers of the Constitution have gravely provided in article three, section three, that a traitor, condemned to be hung as a penalty for his treason, shall forfeit his estate until he can be taken from his cell to the gallows and executed—simply "for the length of his halter." That is the necessary conclusion, if we adopt, in its full force, the reasoning of the gentlemen on the other side. The first Congress that sat after the adoption of the Constitution passed what is called the crimes act, defining and punishing treason. It provides that if any person or persons owing allegiance to the United States of America shall levy war against them, or shall adhere to their enemies, by giving them aid and comfort, and shall be thereof convicted, on confession in open court or on the testimony of two witnesses, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason against the United States, and shall suffer death. If gentlemen will turn to the twenty-fourth section of the same enactment they will find this proviso:

"Provided always, and be it enacted, that no conviction or judgment for any of the offenses aforesaid shall work corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate."

Of course an intelligent Congress would provide that it would work no forfeiture of estate at all if they were limited to a forfeiture for "the length of the halter." It would be simply ridiculous to provide that the estate should be forfeited during the life of the felon from the time of his sentence to the time of his execution.

Now, it may be that this enactment does not furnish any evidence of the construction given to that clause of the Constitution by the Congress of 1790. Still I think that the legislation goes somewhat in that direction, and it is but fair to consider it, so far as it is an authority, on the other side.

After leaving this, I encounter the Commentaries of Mr. Justice Story on the Constitution; and I must confess that, although I listened with a great deal of satisfaction to the able argument of the member from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] I was amazed to hear him say that this distinguished jurist was no more than a second-rate lawyer in our country.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman from Ohio slightly errs in quoting my observation. It was not that Justice Story was only a second-class lawyer, but that, as contrasted with other men produced in this country, in the quality of strength and grasp of intellect, he must be reckoned among the second class of great men.

Mr. SPALDING. I accept the amendment, and still my amazement does not cease. I was not prepared to hear a lawyer from Massachusetts say that Justice Story ranked even behind the greatest men of the country. If we want proof of the standing of that man as a lawyer, let us go to Westminster Hall where his judicial decisions are from day to day and month to month and year to year cited, not only with approbation, but with the most exalted marks of confidence and respect. If I understand the judicial life and history of Justice Story, he has done for this country little less than Mansfield did for England in building up a complete system of commercial law. Is that man to be ranked behind any lawyer of our country and our age? Oh! if the shade of Marshall could speak on this subject, he would respond and tell you whether his long-endured associate on the bench was second to any of the greatest jurists of the age in which he lived.

But, sir, I wander. Justice Story gives it as his opinion that by the terms of this third section of the third article of the Constitution the punishment of treason, so far as confiscation is concerned, is restricted to the forfeiture for the life of the offender only; and, sir, when I venture to differ with that great man on the exposition of a constitutional clause, I must be better informed of the laws than I ever expect to be in this world. I leave that branch of the subject just here.

I say to you, I am entirely satisfied with the arguments of the learned gentlemen from Maryland and Massachusetts, and others, who have gone the full length of saying that the constitutional provision only limited the confiscation to the person. I listened to their arguments, and was gratified with them; but I cannot concur with them when I find arrayed against them the judgment of Joseph Story on this very point.

Now, admitting that on an attainder of treason lands can only be confiscated during the life of the person attain, what vantage ground is gained on the other side? I insist that that provision, clothed in that language, having that technical signification and meaning, has nothing whatever to do with the act under consideration. It has no relevancy, for it assumes that there must be some person who can be attained before you can limit by this clause of the Constitution the act of Congress.

When we take up the act to which this joint resolution applies, we find that a new punishment is given for treason by the last Congress. Treason is punished by death; and it is provided that the offender's slaves, if there be any, shall be free.

Here may be the pinch on the subject, after all. It is in the discretion of the court whether he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years and fined not less than $10,000, "and his slaves, if any, shall be made free."

Let us pause to inquire what would be the result if a person should be apprehended and brought before the court for treason, and the court should, under the discretion given by this enactment, instead of taking the life of the offender, imprison him for five years, and fine him in a sum of not less than $10,000, could not that be levied upon the real estate of the offender? And if that real estate did not amount to more than $10,000, would it not be taken in perpetuity to answer the fine? The gentleman does not claim that there is any objection to that, assessing the fine and levying it upon the lands of the offender and selling them to satisfy that fine. I suppose that must be in perpetuity. It seems, then, the same thing in substance to the offender found in arms against the Government: to take his lands in satisfaction of the fine, and to confiscate his lands, goods, and chattels.

Mr. Speaker, I claim that the fifth section, and all the branches of that section of the act, have nothing whatever to do with the crime of treason. It regards open, armed rebellion against this Government, and confiscates the means in the hands of the transgressor for the purpose of putting an end to the war and continuing our armies in existence until that is accomplished. It contemplates that—nothing more, nothing less.

I am met by the objection that it is not necessary for the party to be arrested for treason or tried for treason; that the word treason may never be breathed in his ears. If he be proved to have taken part in the great rebellion his property may be taken by the President of the United States and sold for the benefit of our armies. Any man who would gainsay our constitutional and legal right to arm him with that power has more sympathy with the rebellion than with our free form of government.

Why, Mr. Speaker, the changes have been rung in our ears from day to day by gentlemen on the other side of the House that we are hunting down innocent women and children. They are shedding tears over this affecting subject. If this act is to be executed, we are told that the President is permitted to sell the estate of rebels in arms, and that then their widows and children may suffer the pangs of hunger. How is it that we cannot draw upon these fine chords of sympathy of gentlemen on the other side in behalf of our women and children? What regard have they for the widows and children of the two hundred thousand soldiers—the flower of our young men—who have already laid down their lives to uphold this fair fabric of freedom? Never a word of sympathy from the other side. They can see our poor soldiers return minus an arm, minus a leg, as they pass through these lobbies, but their only care is to protect the property of the rebels. And we are asked by one of my colleagues, [Mr. COX,] does the gentleman from New York intend to call us traitors? My friend answered modestly no! If he had asked that question of me, he knows what my answer would have been. I have seen rebel officers at Johnson's Island, and I have taken them by the hand because they have fought us fairly in the field, and did not seek to break down the Government while living under its protection. Yes, sir, that gentleman knows that I would have said to him that I have more respect for an open and avowed traitor in the field than for a sympathizer in this Hall. Four months have scarcely gone by since that gentleman and his political friends were advocating the election of a man for the gubernatorial office in my State who was an open and avowed advocate of the right of secession—an outlaw at that. They received their answer in a majority against him of one hundred and two thousand votes.

Mr. PENDLETON. I would ask the gentleman how many men in the State of Ohio voted for Mr. Vallandigham?

Mr. SPALDING. One hundred and eighty thousand, and there was one hundred and two thousand majority against him.

Mr. PENDLETON. And does the gentleman mean to charge that that one hundred and eighty thousand were all traitors?

Mr. SPALDING. Not at all, I trust; but I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PENDLETON. I do not desire to press upon the gentleman a question that is troublesome.

Mr. SPALDING. It was claimed by the gentleman from Ohio, and those who worked with him, that unless the Unionists carried the State by the home vote, they would resist the soldiers' votes.

Mr. PENDLETON. If the gentleman makes that statement as applicable to me, he makes a statement not true.

Mr. SPALDING. They have uniformly claimed that the Democracy furnished a large proportion of the soldiers to fill up the ranks of our armies. That has been their continued claim; but when it came to the fact of voting, they were not ready to trust those Democratic soldiers to vote for their candidates. That shows the confidence they had in those of our citizens now in the armies for the support of this free Government.

But, Mr. Speaker, we are told that unless we use emollients this war will become a war of extermination. We were met at the opening of this rebellion by the claim that we must handle the enemy "with gloves" or we would infuriate them. Now, having become infuriated, and having put to death two hundred thousand of our men, we are again told we must not pursue them further for fear they may become more infuriated still. I am one of those who have embarked in this cause for the purpose of protecting this free form of government, be the cost what it may.

I said the other day that our Government was upon the eve of bankruptcy. I desire to repeat it. I say our Government cannot command readily all the money it wants to carry on this war; and the Treasury should not be depleted for the reimbursement of any single State. I say the people of this great nation are willing to replenish the Treasury, but it must be done by taxation; and I would, if I could, avoid drawing thus upon their resources; but, if it be necessary to put down this rebellion, let every dollar of property in the free States come under the hammer rather than submit for a moment to withdraw our armies and make peace with the rebels until they throw down their arms.

I go first for compelling the rebels to submission. If I cannot otherwise compel submission, I go for driving them to expatriation; and if that will not answer the purpose, I am most unhesitatingly for extermination.

I hope the wisdom of this Congress will provide legislation whereby the estates of these rebels may be confiscated for the use of our national Treasury, in order to keep up our extended armies; and if the consequence be that by and by the children of some of these rebels shall be compelled to leave their patrimonial estates and go to foreign countries—as probably the facts, in anticipation, will warrant us in believing—I say to them, "You and your fathers for thirty years have been plotting a vile conspiracy against the freest, the best, and the most beneficent Government the world ever saw; and if you are now in your mad career throttled and swept away, you can only complain of the madness of your progenitors which produced these disastrous consequences." They must say, in the language of Virgil, "Nos patriam fugimus nos dulcia linquimus arva;" but all is to be traced to the rebellion engendered against this good Government by the folly and madness of our fathers."

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD obtained the floor.

Mr. PENDLETON. With the permission of the gentleman from New York, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I yield for that purpose.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 54, noes 69.

Mr. PENDLETON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 21, nays 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bailey, Bliss, Brooks, William G. Brown, Clay, Cravens, Donison, Eldridge, Grider, Hale, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, Holman, William H. Miller, Pruyn, James S. Rollins, Spaulding, Stuart, Sweat, Tracy, and Elihu B. Washburne—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Baynes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eliot, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grinnell, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hubbard, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Longyear, Marvin, McClure, Melndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myers, Charles O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomerooy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, Scofield, Smith, Smithers, Stevens, Thayer, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—68.

So the House refused to adjourn.

No quorum voted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. PENDLETON. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put, and there were—ayes 54, noes 56.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope gentlemen upon the other side of the House will consent to an adjournment. It is now four o'clock. There is no disposition to drive off action upon this measure improperly. If gentlemen on the other side will fix a day for taking the vote within a reasonable time, there will be no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I will say to the gentleman from New York that if gentlemen on the other side do not wish to discuss the measure to-day, I want to say a few words, and am ready to go on now. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Pennsylvania will have the floor now, with the understanding that the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] will succeed him. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I do not lose my right to the floor?

The SPEAKER. Not under the understanding just had.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw the motion that there be a call of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has said nearly all I intended to say upon this subject. I begin simply by denying that the Constitution has the least reference to any one of the provisions of the bill in question, and I intend to show that the act of 1862, which was modified by a resolution which it has been truly said was passed under duress very little to the credit of the Congress that passed it—that act of 1862 is not affected directly or indirectly by any one of the provisions of the Constitution, and that especially that part of the act which provides for seizing property and confiscating it in fee simple is purely a proceeding under the laws of war and under the law of nations, over which the Constitution has no control, and in regard to which it has no effect whatever. The first section of the act of 1862 punishes the crime of treason with death and the forfeiture of personal estate. That, I believe, is not objected to, because personal estate, once forfeited, is forfeited forever. There is no such thing as a life estate in personal property. He who gets it for an hour gets it forever. That is the plainest principle of law. The second provision is that those who incite to rebellion shall be punished with fine and imprisonment. That has nothing to do with the Constitution. It is not pretended, I suppose, that the Constitution in any way affects it. Then comes the clause of the bill to which gentlemen take exception; and what is that? It is to be found in the statute-books of that session of Congress, page 313. It provides that, to insure the speedy termination of the present rebellion, it shall be the duty of the President of the United States to cause the seizure of all the estate and property, money, credits, &c., of the persons guilty, and apply the proceeds thereof to the support of the Army of the United States.

Here is no attainder for treason, here is no confiscation of property under any provision of the Constitution. Then the law goes on to state how you are to seize and condemn property. It is to be seized and proceeded against in rem, according to the law for that purpose, and condemned. As what? As the property of traitors? No such thing. Condemned as "enemies' property." Does not that show that the Constitution has nothing to do with it on the question of treason? Here are a body of men in arms against the United States. This act of Congress, so far as it refers to seizures of property in fee, refers to them as seizures of the property of alien enemies, to be treated as such.

Now, where is there a word about attainder for treason? That part of the act does not seize property as traitors' property at all. But the learned gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has well said all that I intended to say with reference to attainder for treason. Attainder for treason is impossible under the laws of the United States as they now stand. Without an express act making a conviction and sentence and execution for treason an attainder of treason, there is no attainder of treason in the United States; and there is no such law here.

By the common law of England, after there is a sentence of execution, or a final sentence, for treason, an attainder is worked, not by the act itself of the sentence of death, but by the common law. In the United States there is no common law. I need not say to lawyers in the House that so far as the United States Government is concerned crime is only by positive enactment, and there is no crime at common law punishable under the laws of the United States. Therefore, as there is no common law the sentence and conviction for treason works no attainder. It cannot be. It is impossible. And although the clause in the Constitution provides against a positive act of that kind by Congress, yet it has never taken place; and to talk about what can be done under an attainder for treason is not understanding the subject in a legal point of view.

It is, however, essential to ascertain what relation the seceded States bear to the United States, that we may know how to deal with them in re-establishing the national Government. There seems to be great confusion of ideas and diversity of opinion on that subject. Some think that those States are still in the Union and entitled to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that, notwithstanding all they have done, may at any time, without any legislation, come back, send Senators and Representatives to Congress, and enjoy all the privileges and immunities of loyal members of the United States. That whenever those "wayward sisters" choose to abandon their frivolities and present themselves at the door of the Union and demand admission, we must receive them with open arms and throw over them the protecting shield of the Union, of which it is said they had never ceased to be members. Others hold that, having committed treason, renounced their allegiance to the Union, discarded its Constitution and laws, organized a distinct and hostile government, and by force of arms having risen from the condition of insurgents to the position of an independent Power de facto, and having been acknowledged as a belligerent both by foreign nations and our own Government, the Constitution and laws of the Union are abrogated so far as they are concerned, and that, as between the two belligerents, they are under the laws of war and the laws of nations alone, and that whichever Power conquers may treat the vanquished as conquered provinces, and may impose upon them such conditions and laws as it may deem best.

It is obvious that this question is of vast importance. If the first position should be established, then the rebel States, after having been conquered and reduced to utter helplessness through the expenditure of many billions of money and the shedding of oceans of loyal blood, may lay down their arms, which they can no longer wield, claim to be legitimate members of the Union, send Senators and Representatives to Congress, retain all their lands and possessions, and leave the loyal States burdened with an immense debt, with no indemnity for their sufferings and damages, and with no security for the future.

If the latter proposition prevails, then Congress will readjust the Government on the firm basis of individual and public justice; will protect the innocent and pardon the least guilty; will punish the leading traitors; seize their lands and estates; sell them in fee simple; pay the proceeds into the national Treasury to discharge the expenses and damages of the war, and provide a permanent fund for pensions to the widows and orphans and the maimed and mangled survivors of this infamous war; and, above all, will forever exclude the infernal cause of this rebellion—human bondage—from the continent of North America.

In order rightly to determine this question we must inquire whether the "confederate States" are to be considered as a hostile people, entitled to no other protection or privileges than are due to foreign nations at war with each other. Is the present contest to be regarded as a public war, and to be governed by the rules of civilized warfare, or only as a domestic insurrection, to be suppressed by criminal prosecutions before the courts of the country? If the latter, then the insurgents when proceeded against have a right to invoke the protection of the Constitution and municipal laws. If the former, then they are subject to the laws of war alone.

Another important question is, is this war waged by States in their corporate capacity, or is it merely a treasonable outbreak by guilty individuals?

Vattel, pages 424, 425, says:

"When in a republic the nation is divided into two opposite factions, and both sides take up arms, this is called a civil war." "The sovereign indeed never fails to bestow the appellation of rebels on all such of his subjects as openly resist him; but when the latter have acquired sufficient strength to give him effectual opposition, and oblige him to carry on the war against them according to the established rules, he must necessarily submit to the use of the term 'civil war.'"

"On earth they have no common superior. They stand precisely in the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest, and, being unable to come to an agreement, have recourse to arms."

When an insurrection becomes sufficiently formidable to entitle the party to belligerent rights, it places the contending Powers on precisely the same footing as foreign nations at war with each other. For all the consequences of war, of combat, and of conquest they are foreign nations. Judge Grier, in a most able, lucid, and conclusive opinion delivered in the prize cases, says:

"The parties belligerent in a public war are independent nations."

No one acquainted with the magnitude of this contest can deny to it the character of a civil war. For nearly three years the confederate States have maintained their declaration of independence by force of arms. True, they have met with sad defeats. But success has not been all on one side. But what renders their position beyond controversy is, the great Powers of Europe have acknowledged them as belligerents, entitled from foreign nations to equal rights with the parent Government. What is still more conclusive, we have acknowledged them as belligerents ourselves. With unfortunate haste we blockaded their ports. A blockade is declared only against a foreign nation. If they were still members of the Union we should repeal the laws granting ports of entry. A nation does not blockade itself. We have treated their captive soldiers as prisoners of war, not as rebels; we have exchanged prisoners; we have sent and received flags of truce. This is not the usage awarded to an unorganized banditti.

What, then, is the effect of this public war between these belligerent, these foreign nations? Before this war the parties were bound together by a compact, by a treaty called a "Constitution." They acknowledged the validity of municipal laws mutually binding on each. This war has cut asunder all these ligaments, abrogated all these obligations.

"The conventions, the treaties made with a nation, are broken or annulled by a war arising between the contending parties."—Vattel, Book 3, chap. 10, sec. 125.

Phillimore says, page 662:

"It was at one time an international custom that the belligerents should, at the breaking out of the war, make a public and solemn proclamation that the obligation of treaties between them had ceased. That custom has become obsolete. In the place of it has arisen the general maxim that war, ipso facto, abrogates treaties between the belligerents."

Chancellor Kent says:

"As a general rule, the obligations of treaties are dissipated by hostility."—1 Kent, 175.

Professor Lieber, the most learned of living publicists, in a communication to Major General Halleck, containing instructions for the government of our armies, which were revised by a board of officers and approved of by the President, treats the rebel States as subject to martial law only, and not subject to the municipal laws of the United States or to the Constitution. On page 8 he says:

"All municipal law of the ground on which the armies stand or of the countries to which they belong is silent and of no effect between armies in the field."

Hence he declares the slaves free, and not to be reenslaved, passim.

The Supreme Court of the United States (in Hilton vs. Jones, Dalt., 224) lays down the same doctrine. It decided that the revolted provinces of America, by the Declaration of Independence, the formation of a government, and supporting it by arms, became an independent foreign nation in 1776. Years before their independence was acknowledged by any other nation, courts applied the law of prize to them as to other foreign nations. Sergeant Wildman (page 8) says:

"The primary effect of war is to extinguish all civil intercourse, and to place all the subjects of belligerents in the condition of enemies. This principle extends not only to the natural-born subjects; but to all persons domiciled in the enemy's territories; to all who come to reside there with knowledge of the war; and who have come to reside before the war continued their residence after the commencement of hostilities for a longer time than is necessary for their convenient departure."

But it is said that this must be considered a contest with rebel individuals only, as States in the Union cannot make war. That is true so long as they remain in the Union. But they claim to be out of the Union; and the very fact that we have admitted them to be in a state of war, to be belligerents, shows that they are no longer in the Union, and that they are waging war in their corporate capacity under the corporate name of the "confederate States," and that such major corporation is composed of minor corporations called States, acting in their associated character. It is idle to say that townships and counties and parishes within such States are at peace while the States by acknowledged majorities have declared war. It is still more idle to say that individuals within the belligerent territory, because they were opposed to secession, and were loyal to the parent Government, are the State, though comprising but five per cent. of the people, and hence that the States are not at war. This is ignoring the fundamental principle of democratic republics, which is that majorities must rule, that the voice of the majority, however wicked and abandoned, is the law of the State. If the minority choose to stay within the misgoverned territory, they are its citizens and subject to its conditions. The innocence of individuals forms no protection (except in a personal point of view) to those residing in a hostile territory.

Vattel, page 311, says:

"When the sovereign or ruler of a State declares war against another sovereign, it is understood that the whole nation declares war against another nation. Hence the two nations are enemies, and all the subjects of the one are enemies of all the subjects of the other. Since women and children are subjects of the State and members of the nation, they are to be ranked in the class of enemies."

Even the innocence of women and children does not screen them from the fate of their nation. True, in dealing with them personally, great difference is made between the innocent and the guilty. But how can it be said that the States are not at war? Individuals do not make war. Individuals may take life, but they cannot make war. They cannot be recognized as belligerents. War is made by chartered or corporate communities, by nations or States.

Phillimore, volume three, page 101, section sixty-nine, says:

"Nevertheless, as war is the conflict of societies, that is, of corporate bodies recognizing and governed by law in all their actions," &c.

On page 100, section sixty-eight, he says:

"A war between private individuals, who are members of a society, cannot exist. The use of force in such a case is a trespass or violation of municipal law, and not war."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the prize cases decided at its last session, says:

"Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government."

Mr. SMITH. I do not exactly understand the position of the gentleman, nor do I know that the question which I propose to ask will cause any difference in the result at which the gentleman arrives; but from the remarks already made by him I desire to ask him this question: whether he takes the ground that a State, and not the individuals of a State, commits the crime of treason against the Government of the United States?

Mr. STEVENS. I take the ground, sir, that when you cannot punish them as traitors you can make war with them as belligerents. It is not a question of punishing under the Constitution, but outside of it. These men are enemies, and we are treating them as enemies; and I have no doubt that, as States, they are at war with us.

Mr. SMITH. The question that I mean to put directly, if the gentleman will allow me, is this: whether the Government has power to punish a State in its corporate capacity, and not the citizens of a State as individuals?

Mr. STEVENS. I mean to say that if a State, as a State, makes war upon the Government and becomes a belligerent power we treat it as a foreign nation; and when we conquer it we treat it just as we do any other foreign nation. That is my position, very distinctly.

Mr. SMITH. I understand the rule of law to be that a corporation has neither body nor soul; and therefore I would like to ask the question whether we can punish a State which, as a corporation, has neither body nor soul?

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman be right, how then could we punish Great Britain when we make war upon her? If she has no soul to be damned, she certainly has a body to be lost. [Laughter.] When we conquer her we shall take good care, let me tell the gentleman, that she shall be properly punished, if we have any regard for our people at all.

Mr. BLISS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if the seceded States are foreign governments, what right we have to adjudicate upon their private property.

Mr. STEVENS. When we seize it as the property of enemies during a war we have a right to take it.

Mr. BLISS. And hold jurisdiction over the soil of a foreign country?

Mr. STEVENS. That is what I should call amphibious action, which the gentleman will understand from my remarks.

"All persons residing within this territory whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile Power, are in this contest liable to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners."

This seems to me to settle the question. This may work a hardship on loyal men opposed to the war. But to escape the condition of enemies they must change their domicile—leave the hostile State; for I again repeat there can be no neutrals in a hostile State. As the United States are at war with an acknowledged belligerent, with a foreign nation, and as such war has abrogated all former compacts existing between them, neither the United States nor the confederate States can, as against the other, claim the aid of the Constitution or the laws passed under it. If they still exist, the slaveholder of South Carolina might claim the aid of the fugitive slave law to regain his absconded slave. So General Barksdale with others was murdered, because he was shot down without being tried and condemned according to the provisions of the Constitution.

By the law of nations, the captain and crew of a vessel are supposed to be standing on the soil of the nation whose flag the ship bears, although in distant seas. Those armed vessels that belong to no nation and make war are pirates. The Alabama and its fellows are not treated as pirates, and must therefore belong to an acknowledged nation. That nation is the confederate States. But if the territory of the confederate States is our territory, then he who treads the deck of the Alabama or Florida stands on our soil, and, plundering on the high seas, is a pirate. We do not so treat them until we have conquered the country held by the confederate States. Covered by the confederate flag, it is foreign country. When we do conquer it, it is a conquered country. Any other principle would render all our conduct inconsistent and anomalous.

If the rebel States are still in the Union I see no reason why they should not elect the next President of the United States. Any number of them might meet and choose electors, who might cast their votes for President and Vice President, and demand that they should be counted by Congress. Or if the rebels decline to vote, then a hundred loyal men, "who are the State," might meet and choose electors. The few loyal men around Fortress Monroe, or Norfolk, or Alexandria, and a few cleansed patches in Louisiana, being one thousandth part of the States, might choose electors for their whole States.

The idea that the loyal citizens, though few, are the State, and in State municipalities may overrule and govern the disloyal millions, I have not been able to comprehend. If ten men sit to save Sodom can elect a Governor and other State officers for and against the eleven hundred thousand Sodomites in Virginia, then the democratic doctrine that the majority shall rule is discarded and dangerously ignored. When the doctrine that the quality and not the number of voters is to decide the right to govern, then we have no longer a republic, but the worst form of despotism. The saints are the salt of the earth; but the "salt of the earth" do not carry elections and make Governors and Presidents. Within the State of South Carolina a rebel's vote weighs just as much as a loyal voter's. We may conquer rebels and hold them in subjection, and legislate for them as a conquered people; but it is mere mockery to say that, according to any principle of popular government yet established, a title of the resident inhabitants of an organized State can change its form and carry on government because they are more holy or more loyal than the others.

From all this the legitimate conclusion is, that all the people and all the territory within the limits of the organized States which, by a legitimate majority of their citizens, renounced the Constitution, took their States out of the Union, and made war upon the Government, are, so far as they are concerned, subject to the laws of the State; and, so far as the United States Government is concerned, subject to the laws of war and of nations, both while the war continues and when it shall be ended.

If the United States succeed, how may she treat the vanquished belligerent? Must she treat her precisely as if she had always been at peace? If so, then this war on the part of the United States has been not only a foolish but a very wicked one. But there is no such absurd principle to restrain the hands of the injured victor.

By the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything that belongs to the enemy. This may be done while the war is raging to weaken the enemy, and when it is ended the things seized may be retained to pay the expenses of the war and the damages caused by it. Towns, cities, and provinces may be held as a punishment for an unjust war, and as security against future aggressions. The property thus taken is not confiscated under the Constitution after conviction for treason, but is held by virtue of the laws of war. No individual crime need be proved against the owners. The fact of being a belligerent enemy carries the forfeiture with it. Here was the error of the President when he vetoed the confiscation bill passed by Congress. In the confusion of business he overlooked the distinction between a traitor and a belligerent enemy.

Vattel, page 125, says:

"Everything, therefore, which belongs to the nation, to the state, to the sovereign, to the subjects of whatever age or sex—everything of that kind, I say, falls under the description of things belonging to the enemy. As to landed estate, property of this kind does not cease to be enemy's property, though possessed by a neutral foreigner, since the owner is resident in the hostile country." "We have a right to deprive our enemy of his possession of everything which may augment his strength and enable him to make war." (Page 364.) "In fine, we seize on the enemy's towns, his provinces," &c.

I am aware that a respectable judge has denied this doctrine because he says, "No nation ever makes such conquest of its own territory." This is assuming a fact which does not exist. The moment a Power becomes an acknowledged belligerent, it is politically the owner of all the territory within the acknowledged limits of the hostile Power. All the lands and towns and people within such boundary, so far as the contending parties are concerned, belong to the belligerent so far as the application of the laws of war and of nations touches them. The court in the prize cases says:

"It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force. South of this line is enemy's territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized hostile and belligerent power."

The same judge just referred to very inconsistently condemned as lawful prize a rebel vessel captured by one of our vessels. Why did he not say, "This property cannot be held, it belonged to one of our citizens; and no nation ever captures the property of its own citizens?" Suppose the rebels should conquer Maryland as we have Tennessee, and the parties should mutually agree to cease hostilities, would not Maryland belong to the confederate States and Tennessee to the United States? By the laws of war, when peace ensues without any stipulation as to territory, each one maintains the uti possidetis. Does not this show that when we conquer a seceded State we take it as hostile territory and not as our own? The confederate States cannot be a foreign nation for one purpose and not for all—for the purpose of claiming all the protection of a belligerent under the law of nations and yet not incurring any of its penalties. This would be showing a remarkable advantage to a belligerent made up of traitors and rebels over an honorable foreign nation with whom we were unfortunately at war. This would be as unjust as absurd.

Suppose the confederate States should conquer the United States, could we claim the benefit of the Constitution of the United States and laws made under it? Would they not have a right to hold us as conquered provinces, and dispose of us as they might deem best? Certainly such is the law of nations. And yet conservative gentlemen, with some smattering of knowledge, ignore the doctrine of mutuality and deny us the same rights!

How did England deal with her rebels in the great mutiny in India? When she reconquered "her own territory" she declared "That their engagements had been canceled by the rebellion, and that the proprietary right in the soil was confiscated to the British Government, which would dispose of that right in such manner as to it might seem fitting."

To my mind there can be no doubt as to what we have a right to do if, as I will not permit myself to doubt, we should finally conquer the confederate States. What it will be policy to do may be more difficult to determine. My mind is fixed. The rebels have waged the most unjust, cruel, and causeless war that was ever prosecuted by ruthless murderers and pirates. They have compelled the Government in self-defense to expend billions of money. Every inch of the soil of the guilty portion of this usurping power should be held responsible to reimburse all the costs of the war; to pay all the damages to private property of loyal men; and to create an ample fund to pay pensions to wounded soldiers and to the bereaved friends of the slain. Who will object to this? Who will consent that his constituents and their posterity shall be burdened with an immense load caused by these bloody traitors? Their lands if sold in fee would produce enough for all these purposes, and leave a large surplus. Such confiscation of course would spare the property of those who took no part in the war, and of the common soldiers, who were compelled by the laws of their States to enter the army.

All this done, and yet the half would be left undone. Oppressive as would be the debt and grievous the loss of our loyal citizens, yet if an honorable and safe peace were made our free and prosperous people would bear it without a murmur. But if a disgraceful peace were made, leaving the cause of this rebellion, and the fruitful cause of future wars, untouched and living, its authors would be the objects of the deepest execration and of the blackest infamy. While the Constitution protected the institution of slavery very few desired to disturb it in the States. There were not three thousand abolitionists, properly so called, in the United States. But since those States have voluntarily thrown off that protection, and placed themselves under the law of nations alone, it is not only our right but our duty to knock off every shackle from every limb. So far as other nations are concerned, there is not a slave in the confederate States. As we have seen, the law of nations fixes their condition. By that law no man can hold property in man.

Phillimore (1, page 316, chapter seventeen) says:

"There is a kind of property which it is equally unlawful for States or individuals to possess—property in man."

"A being endowed with intellect, passion, and conscience cannot be acquired and alienated, bought and sold by his fellow beings, like an inanimate or an unreflecting and irresponsible thing."

"The Christian world has slowly but irrevocably arrived at the attainment of this great truth; and its sound has gone out into all lands, and its voice into the ends of the world."

"The black man is no more capable of being a chattel than the white man."

Such, thank God, is at last the national law of the civilized world. And who is there base enough in this Republic to wish it otherwise or to attempt to evade it? He who now wishes to reestablish "the Union as it was" and to retain the "Constitution as it is" cannot escape the guilt of attempting to enslave his fellow-men.

But something more must be done than to declare all men free in the rebel States. Supposing them now to be conquered, until some legislation by the conqueror takes place among themselves, their old laws and institutions will remain. Until we declare otherwise, slavery will be among their municipal laws, and will bind them in their intercourse with each other. Even if you were to liberate every slave now and then readmit them into the Union as free States, the moment they had acquired that standing they would reestablish slavery and enslave every man of color within their limits. You can prevent this only by amending the Constitution of the United States, prohibiting slavery forever in this Republic. "The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is" is an atrocious idea; it is man-stealing.

There is a class of very respectable men whose vocation and habitual reverence for the Union compel them openly to condemn secession, and yet whose arguments, and opposition to all effectual means for its suppression, show that their whole souls and secret yearnings are with the rebels. They are laboring hard to establish principles which, when the traitors are subdued, will remit them both as States and individuals to all their ancient rights and privileges; to the right to enter Congress and control our councils. To this end, mistaking the argument, they contend that the war has not abolished State governments. I observe that a very excellent Republican member of the last Congress from Ohio is cited as holding that the rebellion has not destroyed State governments. I have never supposed that it did. On the other hand I believe the State governments in the rebel States to be as perfect now as before the rebellion. But that proves what these conservative gentlemen would wish to avoid, that being subsisting States, capable of corporate action, they have as States changed their allegiance from the United States to the confederate States; and that all the inhabitants of such hostile corporations have forfeited all rights under the Constitution which they have renounced; and that they are forever estopped from claiming the "Union as it was." It is indeed true that the United States may give them those rights if it choose, but they cannot claim them. Nor do I contend that the rebellion has abolished slavery so far as it respects the citizens of the rebel States. Over them the State laws have full power until changed by the conqueror. But as to all the rest of the world, as to the United States and foreign nations, there is no law, no rule of international action which requires them to respect the slave laws of the States. Foreign nations never were thus bound, and have never so regarded them. A slave escaping from South Carolina to Canada, or Jamaica, is free; and there is no comity of nations which requires his return to his master. Were it not for a single provision of the Constitution every State of the Union would have been on the same footing as foreign nations. That provision, thank God, is now dead—killed by the traitors themselves. All this struggle by calm and dignified and moderate patriots; all this clamor against radicals; all this cry of "the Union as it was and the Constitution as it is," is but a persistent effort to reestablish slavery, and to rivet anew and forever the chains of bondage on the limbs of immortal beings. May the God of justice thwart their designs and paralyze their wicked efforts!

I pray gentlemen to consider that any other doctrine than this will fatally hamper them when they come to reestablish this Government.

To gentlemen who were members of the last Congress this is but repetition. At the extra session of 1861 I advanced the same suggestions; and I have repeated them on all occasions that I deemed proper since. They were not then quite acceptable to either side of the House. But I am glad to find that the President, after careful examination, has come to the same conclusion. In details we may not quite agree; but his plan of reconstruction assumes the same general grounds. It proposes to treat the rebel territory as a conqueror alone would treat it. His plan is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution. But it is within the legitimate province of the laws of war. His legal mind has carefully studied the law of nations and reached a just conclusion.

The condition of the rebel States having been thus fixed, reconstruction becomes an easier question, because we are untrammelled by municipal compacts and laws—that refuge of conservative sympathizers with our "erring brethren." The President may not strike as direct a blow with a battering-ram against this Babel as some impetuous gentlemen would desire; but with his usual shrewdness and caution he is picking out the mortar from the joints until eventually the whole tower will fall.

When the free North shall be united, when that odious party which is inspired by the love of slavery alone shall have sunk into utter contempt and be despised of all men, then will the traitors' hearts sink within them; then will the brave freemen of the North, aided by persecuted loyal men of the South, bear aloft the banner of the Union from the lakes to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific ocean.

Having crushed into atoms the ephemeral empire whose corner-stone was slavery, they will establish a united and enduring nation on the solid foundation of universal freedom. Such a nation, possessing the most fertile soil and every variety of climate, will soon abound with untold riches, and will swarm with millions of just, intelligent, and brave freemen, who will bid defiance to all the despots of the earth.

Davis, of Montgomery county, Maryland, stating that several of his servants or slaves absconded from him and came to the city of Washington, and were here at the time the act was passed and executed compensating slaveholders in the District; and praying that a law may be passed to include him in the provisions of that act, or that such other remedy may be given him as is necessary. I move its reference to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 70) to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to settle the claim of the State of Kansas; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 71) to authorize a loan on the security of the public lands of the United States, and to promote the sale and settlement of the same; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SUMNER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 72) supplementary to an act entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the reading of the bill.

The Secretary read the bill. It provides that no person, after the date of its passage, shall be admitted to the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States, or of any circuit or district court of the United States, or of the Court of Claims, as an attorney or counselor of such court, or shall be allowed to appear and be heard in any such court by virtue of any previous admission or any special power of attorney, unless he shall have first taken and subscribed the oath prescribed in "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, according to the forms and in the manner in that act provided. The oath so taken and subscribed is to be preserved among the files of such court; and any person who shall falsely take the oath is to be guilty of perjury, and on conviction to be liable to the pains and penalties of perjury, and the additional pains and penalties in the act of July 2, 1862, provided.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. WADE, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of Richard Fitch, praying for bounty land, be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Kansas, it was Ordered, That the petition and other papers in the case of the heirs of John Denman and George Townley be taken from the files of the Senate and referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

Mr. POWELL submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate all orders or proclamations in his Department concerning elections, issued by military authority, in the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware.

Mr. WILSON. Let it lie over until to-morrow. The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it lies over under the rules.

ORDNANCE FOR FORTIFICATIONS.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the committee on the conduct of the war be instructed to inquire into the character and efficiency of the heavy ordnance now provided for the armament of fortifications, the mode of fabrication, the amount of "royalty" paid and to whom for the use of a "patent" in the manufacture, the tests to which these guns are subjected when received into service, the reasons for believing the tests satisfactory, what proportion of our sea and land armaments is of rifled ordnance, when rifled guns were introduced, and the cause of the delay pertaining thereto.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had appointed Mr. DANIEL W. GOOCH of Massachusetts, Mr. GEORGE W. JULIAN of Indiana, Mr. MOSES F. ODELL of New York, and Mr. BENJAMIN F. LOAN of Missouri, members on the part of the House of the joint committee on the conduct and expenditures of the war.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 122) to increase the internal revenue, and for other purposes; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] for the expulsion of Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from Kentucky, have instructed me to report it back, and to ask to be discharged from its further consideration.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I presume that it will be the pleasure of the Senate to continue to-day the debate upon the subject that was up when it last adjourned, and to finish that subject. I do not desire to interfere with that debate. I therefore move to make the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts for my expulsion the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of proceeding to the consideration of the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution is now before the Senate, and the Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone its further consideration until one o'clock to-morrow, and make it the special order for that time.

The motion was agreed to.

COURTS IN WEST TENNESSEE.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 65) to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and with a recommendation that it pass. I ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the bill now. It merely provides for changing the place of holding the courts in the western district of Tennessee from an interior town to Memphis.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs that hereafter the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee shall be holden at the city of Memphis on the first Monday in March and the first Monday in September of each year, and at no other place. All process, civil and criminal, which may have been or hereafter may be issued, returnable to those courts, at Jackson or Huntingdon, is to be returned to them, respectively, at the city of Memphis; and all books and records of every kind, pertaining to those courts, are to be transferred from the places where they have heretofore been held to the city of Memphis.

The judges of the United States circuit court, and of the United States district court for the several districts of Tennessee, may, whenever in their opinion the public interests require it, appoint special terms of their respective courts at Knoxville, Nashville, and Memphis, to be holden at such time as they shall deem most conducive to the public good. Notice of each special term appointed under the provisions of this act is to be published in at least one newspaper printed in the town or city in which a term is to be held, for four consecutive weeks.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HALE. I submitted a few days ago a resolution, which was laid over, asking for some investigation in regard to the Navy Department. I desire now to call up that resolution, and I have some statements to make and an amendment to propose to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution offered by the Senator from New Hampshire is now before the Senate in its regular order, and it will be read.

The Secretary read the following resolution, submitted by Mr. HALE on the 8th of January:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the present condition of the Navy, the efficiency of the steam engines lately constructed and now being constructed for the use of the Navy, the mode and manner of procuring supplies for the Navy, and the conduct of the Department generally; and that they have power to send for persons and papers.

Mr. HALE. I want to make a few statements to the Senate which I think will satisfy them of the necessity and propriety of instituting some of these inquiries. It will be seen by the estimates of expenses, that we are called upon to appropriate this year $142,000,000 for naval purposes. This sum is large or small by comparison. I have been at some pains to look at the naval expenditures of the civilized world, as they have been furnished me by one of our assistant librarians. I find that the naval expenditures of Great Britain during the year 1862 were $59,492,940; of France for 1863, as voted by the Corps Legislatif, $30,000,000; of Spain for 1862-63, $19,421,617; of Russia for 1862, $15,442,373; of Austria per budget of 1863, $5,314,000; of the Netherlands for 1862, $3,633,436; of Sweden for 1863, $3,503,406; of Prussia for 1862, $1,489,260; of Portugal for 1862-63, $111,660. These sums are given in dollars, and they comprise the naval expenditures of all the civilized nations of the world, with the exception of Italy and Denmark. Italy and Denmark publish no naval expenses separate from the general war expenses; but the expenses of the civilized world for a year, taking sometimes 1862, and sometimes 1862 and 1863, and sometimes 1863, as they are given, amount in gross to $138,318,692, so that we are called upon to spend this year some four million dollars more than all the rest of the world with the exception of Italy and Denmark.

It may be said, and said with truth, that these are expenditures in time of peace. I have been at some pains to look over the expenditures of England and France in the gigantic struggle of the Crimean war. That war was declared on the 27th of March, 1854, and the Crimea was evacuated by the allies July 12, 1857, lasting a little more than three years and five months. The total naval expenditures of Great Britain during the war were $262,032,210, and of France $87,877,578, making a total of $349,909,788 for the whole naval expenses of France and England during the Crimean war, which was less than $100,000,000 a year; so that we are called upon this year to appropriate for our Navy $40,000,000 more than was spent by the combined nations of France and England in any one year during the Crimean war. I have got these statistics for the purpose of letting the Senate and the country see what we are asked to do.

But, Mr. President, I want to call the attention of my friend from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to an explanation which he made of a bill where extravagant prices were paid, and I want to say to him that the explanation which he gave, to my mind is entirely unsatisfactory, and that I am informed by those who pretend to know that in that class of supplies where a thousand per cent. was paid above the market price, there is not a single article that was under the market price, and that will so appear on investigation.

These are matters that I think ought to be inquired into, and there are some other matters that I think ought to be inquired into. I think there is something very singular in regard to the mode of furnishing supplies. But I judge from the manifestations the other day that the Senate are rather averse to making these inquiries, or at least averse to trusting them to the Committee on Naval Affairs. Mr. President, if I ever spoke the truth in all my life, or ever hope to do so, I declare that nothing on earth would relieve me more than that the Senate should take this matter from the Naval Committee and give it to a select committee, and that they should be instructed to make these inquiries.

Mr. President, at the time that we are engaged in the greatest struggle the world has ever seen, and when the subject of our Navy is to my mind one of the most important, if there is an investigation to be had it seems to me that it should be had here, and should not be left to be decided by yachting matches which the Assistant Secretary is challenging the world to get up in the harbors of Boston and New York, as may be seen by the public papers. Upon the suggestion of my friend from Iowa, who has submitted to me an amendment which he is willing to go for, and which I am willing to take if I cannot get anything more, I move that the resolution which I submitted to the Senate be amended by striking out all after the word "that," and inserting what I send to the Chair, which is what was furnished to me by the Senator from Iowa.

Another word before I sit down, and then I shall not trouble the Senate. It seemed to be intimate—and especially by my friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] for whom I have the greatest respect and no other feelings than those of kindness—that these inquiries and these resolutions look to opposition to the Navy Department, and, I believe, to the Administration. Not so, Mr. President. I am not here to-day to make a profession of faith. If the history of my humble life has not classed me it would be idle for me to undertake to do it by any professions now. I was opposed to stealing from the Treasury when it was done by Democrats. I am not in favor of having it done by anybody. I do not say that it is done, but I say there are things that ought to be investigated. Sir, the good Book tells us that Judas Iscariot was a thief and carried the bag that held the contributions which belonged to the twelve disciples in common; and I suppose that if anybody questioned his integrity Judas pronounced him at once a foe of Christ and Christianity. Not so, sir. If there be dishonest practices, if there be defects in the law, if there be anything wrong, all on earth that I ask is that there may be an honest inquiry into it. I believe that the matter of naval supplies especially requires it. In regard to the matter of steam engines, I think an inquiry ought to be made; it is a matter that deeply interests the American people and the American Senate, but I plead guilty to just exactly what my friend from Iowa has done: I feel almost entirely incompetent to investigate that matter; I do not want to investigate it; and if the Senate should send it to the Naval Committee I should not think of taking that investigation upon myself, but should devolve it upon others; but that is not now before the Senate; this is a question of naval supplies; I accept the amendment which has been suggested to me by the Senator from Iowa.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The proposed amendment submitted by the Senator from New Hampshire will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was to strike out all of the resolution after the word "that," and to insert the following:

A select committee of three be appointed by the Chair to investigate the subject of naval supplies, and that they have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a stenographer.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will inquire, for information, of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, if he does not suppose that under this resolution the committee on the general conduct of the war will be relieved in their jurisdiction of so much of the conduct of the war as relates to the Navy. It may give rise to a conflict of jurisdiction between our committees, and they may perhaps be punishing each other for contempt and sending for witnesses.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to express any opinion on the subject, although I have a very decided one.

The VICE PRESIDENT appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. GRIMES, and Mr. BUCKALEW the select committee.

OATH OF OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. DAVIS,] calling for all correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebels in relation to the exchange of prisoners, is now before the Senate in its order.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that that resolution and all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the order of the day, the unfinished business of Thursday last.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution submitted by Mr. SUMNER on the 17th of December last:

Resolved, That the following be added to the rules of the Senate:

The oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken and subscribed before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate before entering upon his duties. It shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate; but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, the question now presented to the Senate for decision derives its importance not so much from any immediate results to follow from that decision as from a consideration of those which may occur in the future. A calm, wise, and just decision now may prevent great difficulty and embarrassment hereafter. If the act of July, 1862, entitled "An act to prescribe an oath of office, and for other purposes," was designed by its supporters to include Senators and Representatives in Congress, I can conceive but one object which they sought by its passage to accomplish, that object being none other than the exclusion in the future of the States now in revolution from a representation in this and the other House of Congress, if happily that revolution should not be permanently successful and the Federal authority should again be acknowledged in the confederate States. Representatives from those States must necessarily be such as those States or their people select in accordance with the forms and spirit of the Constitution; for an appointment by others of representatives in the Senate and House of Representatives from those States would not clothe such appointees with the character of representatives of the States or people, but only with that of agents of the power appointing them. If such was the purpose of the framers and advocates of the act referred to, then indeed would they justly be subject to the charge of being the rankest disunionists, men who, under the pretense of endeavoring to preserve the Union, were really laboring to render reunion impossible. For who, sir, is so inconsiderate, so absolutely ignorant as to suppose that ten million people and thirteen States now in revolt can ever be represented in Congress by any one who has not to some extent been identified with them in

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, JANUARY 26, 1864.

NEW SERIES....No. 21

their efforts of resistance to Federal authority; and who not willfully blind to all those considerations governing human action can suppose that reunion with exclusion from positions of honor, trust, or profit, from all participation in the administration of public affairs of those whose assent to such reunion is necessary first to be had, is possible? The wild theorist, the undisciplined romancer may suppose such a result attainable by war, but he who has studied the philosophy of human action, the motives which win consent or impel resistance, who judges of the future by the past, and who from the history of that past has learned the unconquerable spirit and final triumph of those determined to maintain what they conceive to be their rights, will discard as perfectly illusory such fancies of the disordered brain. Let this Senate judicially determine that no one shall hereafter be a member of the Federal Congress who has in any way aided the existing revolution, and an additional obstacle to the many already unwisely interposed to reunion will be thereby created, and an obstacle which experience will demonstrate to be insuperable while it shall continue to exist. But, sir, I will not discuss the policy or impolicy of the act in reference to the question of reunion or the influence which a just interpretation of its provisions may have upon that result. These suggestions are necessary to relieve honorable Senators who stand in the open doors of the Union synagogue and with widespread phylacteries proclaim their devotion to the principles and purposes of Union, and evidence their sincerity by bitter denunciation of those who refuse to interpose obstacles to reunion by the advocacy of measures which are calculated if not designed to render reunion impossible from an imputation irresistibly conclusive if the act under discussion was designed to include members of the national legislature. The legitimate subjects of inquiry are these: are Senators and Representatives in Congress required by the act of July, 1862, to take the oath therein prescribed, and if so, is such requirement constitutional or unconstitutional? I shall maintain, first, that the act does not apply to Senators, and secondly, if it does so apply, that the act is unconstitutional and void.

The words of the act are:

"That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service."

No one contends that a Senator holds office in the military or naval department of the public service. Is he elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States in the civil department of the public service? If so, he is a civil officer of or under the Government of the United States. Is he such civil officer? I contend that he is not, because he is not elected or appointed by any agency or department of the Government of the United States, but by his State as the representative of the State, in a body representative of States and not of individuals. No power exists in the Government of the United States in any of its departments to fill or to compel the filling by others of the trust or position of a Senator from a State. He whom the Government of the United States cannot elect or appoint, and whose election or appointment it cannot compel, can in no just sense be considered an officer of that Government. The Constitution provides that the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State chosen by the Legislature thereof for six years. The trust of a Senator is nowhere denominated in the Constitution an office, and he is nowhere in that instrument designated as an officer. He is called a Senator or member of the Senate, and differs from others, as the President and Vice President, in this particular. That he is not regarded as an officer under the Government of the United States is apparent from several provisions of the Constitution. Section six, article one, declares:

"No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office"— not any other civil office—

"under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States, shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

The framers of the Constitution meant to make the members of Congress entirely independent of Federal authority, and hence the incompatibility declared between the congressional trust and any civil office under the Federal Government. By section one, article two, of the Constitution, it is provided that—

"No Senator or Representative, or person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be appointed an elector of President or Vice President."

From which it is evident that a Senator or Representative was not intended to be considered as holding an office of trust or profit under the United States. The framers of the Constitution did not employ unnecessary words to convey their meaning. If they meant that a Senator or Representative should be considered as holding an office of trust or profit under the United States, why are they specially named in the provision of the Constitution just read? If they so meant, all that it would have been necessary or proper for them to have declared would have been that "no person holding an office of trust or profit under the United States shall be appointed an elector of President or Vice President." When the Constitution contemplates a public trust as an office it expressly designates it as such. Section one, article two, declares:

"The executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States. He shall hold his office during the term of four years."

Again:

"No person except a natural-born citizen, or a citizen of the United States, at the time of the adoption of this Constitution, shall be eligible to the office of President; neither shall any person be eligible to that office who shall not have attained to the age of thirty-five years."

Again:

"In case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation, or inability to discharge the duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President."

Again, in reference to the President it provides:

"Before he enter on the execution of his office, he shall take the following oath or affirmation: 'I do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I will faithfully execute the office of President.'"

So, also, is the Vice President declared to be an officer. Article twelve of the Amendments to the Constitution provides that—

"No person constitutionally ineligible to the office of President shall be entitled to that of Vice President."

The President and Vice President are officers, but even they are not included in the terms "civil officers," as employed in the Constitution. Section four, article two, of the Constitution declares:

"The President, Vice President and all civil officers of the United States, shall be removed from office on impeachment for, and conviction of, treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors."

Speaking of the President and Vice President in this connection, Mr. Justice Story remarks:

"The clause of the Constitution now under consideration does not even allude to consider them officers of the United States. The language of the clause, therefore, would rather lead to the conclusion that they were enumerated as contradistinguished from, rather than as included in, the description of civil officers of the United States."

Holding that civil officers of the United States mean—

"Such as derive their appointment from and under the national Government, and not those persons who, though members of the Government, derive their appointment from the States, or the people of the States,"

Judge Story says:

"In this view the enumeration of the President and Vice President as impeachable officers was indispensable."

Under this clause of the Constitution, and assuming that a Senator was a civil officer under the United States, the House of Representatives, in 1797, did impeach William Blount, a Senator from the State of Tennessee, of high crimes and misdemeanors. It will be observed that by the Constitution the only persons liable to impeachment are the President, Vice President, and all civil officers of the United States. The words of the act of July, 1862, are:

"Any person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, in the civil department of the public service."

These terms but describe a civil officer, for there cannot possibly be a person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, in the civil department of the public service, who is not thereby a civil officer of the United States. I thus remark to meet the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN,] incidentally made some days ago, that the words of the act of July, 1862, were not identical with the words of the Constitution in relation to the impeachment of civil officers. The substance is the same, and the pleadings in the case of Blount raised the direct question whether a Senator is a civil officer of the United States. If he was such officer, he might, by the Constitution, be impeached, otherwise he could not be impeached, and the judgment of the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment was rendered directly upon this point, the only matter in issue joined between the United States and the accused. The material part of the plea filed by the attorneys of Blount to the articles of impeachment was—

"That although true it is that he, the said William Blount, was a Senator of the United States from the State of Tennessee at the several periods in the said articles of impeachment referred to, yet that he, the said William, is not now a Senator, and is not, nor was, at the several periods so as aforesaid referred to, a civil officer of the United States."

The replication to the plea declared that—

"The matters therein contained are not sufficient to exempt the said William Blount from answering the said articles of impeachment, because by the Constitution of the United States the House of Representatives had power to prefer the said articles of impeachment, and the Senate have full and the sole power to try the same."

After the case had been fully argued by the managers on the part of the House, and by counsel for the accused, a motion was made to agree to the following resolutions:

"That William Blount was a civil officer of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, and therefore liable to be impeached by the House of Representatives. That as the articles of impeachment charge him with high crimes and misdemeanors supposed to have been committed while he was a Senator of the United States, his plea ought to be overruled."

After being debated four days the motion was decided in the negative by a vote of 14 to 11, and judgment was thereupon rendered—

"That the matter alleged in the plea of the defendant is sufficient in law to show that this court ought not to hold jurisdiction of said impeachment, and that the said impeachment is dismissed."

A case thus solemnly adjudged by the Senate in the early history of the Government, that Senate sitting as a court, acting under a special oath and passing upon the very matter in controversy here, might under ordinary and should under all circumstances be regarded as conclusive of the question determined. But I may perhaps be pardoned, considering the times in which we live, times in which nothing in the past is considered as sacred or binding, in which the maxim "stare decisis" is held no longer to apply, and in which innovation, change, destruction, are governing passions, for inviting the attention of this body to a few additional considerations in support of the position that a Senator is not a civil officer of the United States. It is provided in the third section of the second article of the Constitution that the President "shall commission all officers of the United States." Does he, or has he authority to commission a Senator? Certainly not. By the second section of the second article it is provided that he

"Shall nominate, and by and with the advice of the Senate, shall appoint ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law."

His own appointment or election, as well as that of the Vice President, being in the Constitution otherwise provided for, we see the reason why they are named specially with all civil officers of the United States in the fourth section of the second article as subject to impeachment and liable to removal from office. Had they not been so specially named, they could not be impeached and removed.

A Senator exercises, executes, performs a trust, not an office. He is elected by the Legislature of his State, clothed with the responsible trust of representing its sovereignty in a body in which sovereignties are alone represented, not appointed by the President, the Federal Government, or any of its Departments to an office under the Government of the United States. He is responsible alone to his State and to the body of which he is a member, but of which he can in no just sense be considered an officer. He may abuse his trust by misrepresenting his State, in which event violated confidence meets its reward in the withdrawal of that confidence by the appointment of a successor, at the proper time, deemed more worthy of being clothed with so responsible a trust. What is an office? It is defined in law to be—"A right to exercise a public or private employment and to take the fees and emoluments thereunto belonging."

If an officer is excluded from his office the court will award a writ of mandamus for his restoration. If another usurps his office the court will award a writ of quo warranto against the usurper to compel him to show by what authority he exercises the functions of such office. These are elementary principles in reference to the law applicable to offices, and to all offices properly so called. Will a mandamus or quo warranto lie in behalf of or be awarded against a Senator or a person claiming to be or assuming to act as such? By no means. The Senate may refuse, arbitrarily refuse, admission into this body to my colleague or any one else, and however well entitled to admission there would be no remedy. The Senate by the Constitution is made the judge of the election and qualification of its own members, and why? Because, being a body representative of sovereignties, composed of those having the confidence of sovereignties, and not of officers of the Federal Government, no court holding appointment under Federal authority shall determine the right of such representative to act for his State in a body independent of its authority and not representing its authority or any other than that of the Government conferring the trust. So essentially do these rights of relief pertain to a civil office under a political or municipal government that I cannot imagine one of such character where they would not or ought not to be afforded by the judicial tribunals of Government. If these remedial rights could not be afforded to the President and Vice President, in case of their denial of office or eviction therefrom, upon which it is unnecessary to express an opinion, the reason and sole reason therefor would be that not being civil officers within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, but political officers—not officers under the Government of the United States, but constituent portions of the Government—coordinate branches of the Government could not pass upon their rights. Such is the distinction between an office under the Government of the United States and the trust of membership in the Senate conferred by a State.

Mr. Justice Story, in commenting on the fourth section of the second article of the Constitution, says:

"From this clause it appears that the remedy by impeachment is strictly confined to civil officers of the United States, including the President and Vice President."

He also remarks, section seven hundred and ninety-two, that

"All officers of the United States who hold their appointments under the national Government, whether their duties are executive or judicial in the highest or lowest departments of the Government, with the exception of officers in the Army, are properly civil officers within the meaning of the Constitution."

And he assigns, as a probable reason for the decision in Blount's case, that civil officers of the United States meant such as derived their appointment from and under the national Government, and not those persons who, though members of the Government, derived their appointment from the States or the people of the States. Civil officers of the United States are the agents or representatives quoad their offices of the United States; but a Senator is the representative of his State, and of his State alone. Says Mr. Justice Story,

"Though they represent States they vote as individuals." It is upon this principle that the Constitution requires that a Senator when elected shall be an inhabitant of the State for which he is chosen. The idea that a Senator in Congress elected by the Legislature of his State, and as the representative of his State, is an officer of the United States or in any "department of the public service," arises from a total misconception of the true nature and character of our system of government. It results from the supposition that that system is in no sense Federal, but wholly national, centralized, consolidated, and excludes the idea of a government uniting both the qualities of national and Federal. Can it be possible that every one holding or exercising a public trust in our complex system of government is an officer of the United States? That the theory from which such a principle is deduced is wholly fallacious will be apparent when the real character of the Government is considered in relation to the foundation on which it is established. In the thirty-eighth number of the Federalist, Mr. Madison remarks:

"It appears, on one hand, that the Constitution is to be founded on the assent and ratification of the people of America, given by deputies elected for the special purpose; but, on the other, that the assent and ratification is to be given by the people, not as individuals composing one entire nation, but as composing the distinct and independent States to which they respectively belong. It is to be the assent and ratification of the several States derived from the supreme authority of the people themselves. The act, therefore, establishing the Constitution will not be a national but a Federal act. That it will be a Federal and not a national act, as those terms are understood by the objectors, the act of the people as forming so many independent States, not as forming one aggregate nation, is obvious from this single consideration, that it is to result neither from the decision of the majority of the people of the Union nor from that of a majority of the States. It must result from the unanimous assent of the several States that are parties to it, differing no otherwise from their ordinary assent than in its being expressed, not by the legislative authority, but by that of the people themselves. Were the people regarded in this transaction as forming one nation, the will of the majority of the whole people of the United States would bind the minority in the same manner as the majority in each State must bind the minority, and the will of the majority must be determined either by a comparison of the individual votes or by considering the will of the majority of the States as evidence of the will of the majority of the people of the United States. Neither of these rules has been adopted. Each State in ratifying the Constitution is considered as a sovereign body, independent of all others, and only to be bound by its own voluntary act. In this relation, then, the new Constitution will, if established, be a Federal and not a national Constitution."

Again, he remarks:

"The Senate will derive its power from the States as political and coequal societies, and these will be represented on the principle of equality in the Senate. So far the Government is Federal, not national."

The admission that in some respects the Government is also national and in others partly national and partly Federal, does not affect the proposition asserted by Mr. Madison and known to every one as true who has any correct idea of the foundation of the Federal Constitution, that the "several States are parties to that Constitution" or compact of Government. And yet, sir, we are gravely told that the representatives of the States in their sovereign capacity, parties to that constitutional form of Government, representatives deriving their authority alone from the States they represent, sustain the same relation to the United States that the most obscure tide-waiter who holds position under the subordinates of subordinates in the Federal Administration. The representatives of the sovereignties who are parties to the Federal compact, deriving their authority from those sovereignties alone, and not from the United States, whom the United States can neither make nor unmake, we are told are nothing but "persons elected or appointed to offices under the Government of the United States in the civil department of the public service." The order proposed to be adopted with a view of carrying into practical effect the act of July, 1862, provides for the administration of the proposed oath alike to Senators, your Secretary, whom yesterday you made and to-day can unmake, and that Secretary's subordinates, and that on the assumption that they all sustain the same relation to the United States, that of employees for pay, commonly denominated officers. If such be the case, what ignorant, what unskillful artificers of Government were the framers of the Constitution, the founders of our Federal Government! How unnecessary, how fruitless the strife which had well-nigh dissolved the Convention of 1787, and which well-nigh prevented the formation of the Union, in reference to the equality of the large and small States as to representation in this body and the mode of ascertaining and appointing that representation. If there was one purpose which more than any other was unalterably fixed in the minds of the members of that Convention, and which they were resolved under no circumstances to relinquish, it was the preservation of the individuality and independence of the several States and the incorporation of those ideas into the organic law uniting the States in a common union of Government, and the very means adopted for the accomplishment of that purpose were the provisions guarantying the equality of senatorial representation and the election of that representation by the Legislatures of the States, representative of the sovereignty of the States. To my mind, in view of the history of the formation of the Constitution, the known opinions of its founders, and its own plain and express provisions, the theory of the advocates of the proposed order and the obligatory character of the act of July 2, 1862, in its attempted application to Senators, is wholly inexplicable.

Mr. President, it is time that this Congress had not only paused in but wholly ceased from its warfare upon the rights of the States and the representatives of the States. The madman may fire the temple which it was the labor of ages to build, and the unreflecting or careless or mischievous legislator or Executive may destroy, forever destroy, the grandest, noblest, best system of Government which the wisest of statesmen, gathering materials from the wisdom of centuries, have been able to construct. The doctrine advocated by the friends of the proposed measure, if it shall become the settled doctrine of those who are now and may hereafter be charged with the administration of the Government, and shall be by them practically applied in the administration of the Government, will, without other causes, work the utter, absolute destruction of our Federal representative system. The immediate fruit of the measure may be apparently harmless; but from the seed it shall yield will spring up the baneful upas which will exhale the odor of political death. Never, in my deliberate judgment, has a measure apparently so harmless yet really more dangerous in principle been attempted in the legislation of Congress. Are we mad? If not, let us evince our sanity by refraining from doing the work of executing the designs of madmen. Such, Mr. President, are some of the reasons which convince me that the act of July, 1862, when legally interpreted, cannot be held to apply to Senators, and consequently why the order proposed should not be made by the Senate.

If, however, Senators are meant to be included in the designation of persons in reference to whom it is sought to make the act obligatory, then I hold as unquestionably true that the act itself is unconstitutional and void. And here I will remark that a strange delusion seems to influence the judgment of some Senators, if we are to judge from their utterances on this floor, that the Senate and House having passed the act of July, 1862, they are bound to execute it while it remains unrepealed, notwithstanding the act itself may be, and if in their judgment it should be, unconstitutional. If Congress has not the constitutional authority to require the oath to be administered, then to require it to be administered would be to do an unconstitutional act, which Congress is sworn not to do. The result of the reasoning of those to whom I have referred, therefore, is that Congress having done an unconstitutional act is bound to be consistent by doing another of the same character. The duty of Congress, sir, is to disregard the act and to repeal it if it be unconstitutional, not to observe and enforce it. There may be consistency in uniformity of wrong-doing, but there is honor and duty in atoning for the wrong already committed and in avoiding its commission in the future. If the act of July, 1862, does ex vi termini or by intentment embrace Senators, then it is unconstitutional and void, because it seeks to add by legislation to the constitutional qualifications of a Senator. This cannot be done. The authority of the Constitution is paramount. It is the supreme law of the land. What it requires must be complied with. What it excludes cannot be admitted. The qualifications of a Senator are expressed in the Constitution. Its language is:

"No person shall be a Senator who shall not have attained to the age of thirty years, and been nine years a citizen of the United States, and who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of that State for which he shall be chosen."

Age, citizenship, and inhabitancy in the State at the time of election are the three and only constitutional qualifications of a Senator. Can the Congress add to them? Justice Story, in his Commentaries, writing upon this very question, says, as has been before cited in this debate:

"It would seem but fair reasoning upon the plainest principles of interpretation that when the Constitution established certain qualifications as necessary for office, it meant to exclude all others as prerequisites. From the very nature of such a provision the affirmative of these qualifications would seem to imply a negative of all others. A power to add new qualifications is certainly equivalent to a power to vary them."

Does the act of July, 1862, supposing it to apply to Senators, attempt to prescribe an additional qualification for a Senator? It does, or it is without meaning. That is a qualification for office without which its duties cannot be permitted to be discharged. A person elected to be a Senator and possessing every constitutional qualification to entitle him to discharge the duties of his trust, cannot, if this act is obligatory upon him, even after he has taken the oath to support the Constitution, the only oath required by the Constitution to be taken, enter upon the discharge of his duties as such Senator until he has done something else: that is, taken the additional oath prescribed by the act of July, 1862. Is not the taking that oath then a prerequisite, a condition, a qualification of office, if the trust of a Senator is to be considered an office, without which the person elected cannot be permitted to represent his State in this body? The States, being parties to the contract of union, agreed, by the adoption of the Constitution, to whatever it contains, and to nothing else. They agreed—the people of the States agreed with each other, or, if you prefer the expression on account of any opposition to what may be considered the doctrine of State rights, the people agreed that each State should be represented in the Federal Senate by two members. They agreed that those members should have the three qualifications before referred to, and should swear or affirm to support the Constitution. Upon these conditions, so far as relates to Senators, they agreed to live in union with each other. Did they agree to any other conditions in reference to the qualifications of their Senators, or to any oath of office they should take? If so, those additional conditions or qualifications must necessarily be found in the written Constitution; for it is the only evidence of their agreement. Where are they? Point me to the article and section in which they are contained. They are not there. Whence, then, your authority to impose them? When, where, how have the States made you their agents to agree to new and further terms and conditions of union between them? Where do you derive the authority to say to a sovereign State, you shall not be represented in the Senate of the United States, notwithstanding the agents you select to represent you have every qualification which we ourselves had when admitted as members of the body, and all which we have since had, all the Constitution requires, all which every Senator who sat in the body for seventy-five years had, unless those agents will as a condition precedent to entering upon the discharge of their duties take an oath which we ourselves have not taken, and which is not required by the Constitution to which you are a party? If you can require the oath prescribed in the act of July, 1862, to be taken as a condition precedent to entering upon the discharge of the duties of a Senator, where is the limitation upon your authority either as to the number or character of the oaths which you may prescribe? If the taking of this oath is obligatory, then also would the taking of one that the person claiming a seat in this body had never violated any one of the ten commandments, that he had climbed the Andes, swam the Hellespont, looked into the crater of Vesuvius, split rails in Illinois, or commanded a flatboat on the Mississippi.

It is no answer to say that Congress would never attempt the imposition of such conditions upon membership in this body. The question is not what Congress will do, but what has Congress the constitutional power to do? Upon the supposition that they can impose the oath under consideration they can require far more dangerous ones than any I have named. They can amend this very act so as to make it obligatory upon a Senator to swear that he voted at the last presidential election for the present Federal Executive, and that he will vote for his reelection; that he had not opposed in any manner the adoption of any measure of public policy advocated by the party in power; and those who shall succeed you, as members of this body, might require that all persons claiming admission as Senators here shall, before entering upon their duties as Senators, swear that they never advocated or approved any measure of policy adopted by this Administration. Thus would a right to a seat on this floor depend, not upon the fixed, determined qualifications prescribed in the Constitution, but upon the whim, caprice, or partisan feeling of those who happened for the time being to be in the majority here. But I will not enlarge upon this branch of the subject. The settled judgment of the statesmen of the country from the formation of the Government to the present time, as evidenced by the absence of any attempt to inaugurate any such system of legislation as that proposed, is conclusive as to its want of constitutional support. No statesman living or dead before the session of 1862 ever countenanced such unwarrantable legislation; no commentator upon the Constitution has ever suggested the possibility of the existence of any such power in Congress; but every one whose views have been expressed on the question has denied the existence of the power. It is in vain to say that by the Constitution each House is the judge of the election and qualifications of its own members. No one denies it. Each House is the judge whether any one claiming admission into it has the qualifications prescribed in the Constitution; but the power to decide whether prescribed qualifications exist in the particular case, and the power to create qualifications not before prescribed, are wholly different things. The Senate and House shall be the judges of, is the language of the Constitution, the qualifications, the constitutional qualifications of their members, not the creators or prescribers of those qualifications. Their function in this regard is judicial, not legislative. They judicially determine what qualifications exist in the particular case, do not legislatively declare what qualifications ought to or shall exist. To attempt to support the constitutionality of the act of July, 1862, and the power of Congress to require the administration of the oath in question upon the ground that each House is the judge of the election and qualification of its own members, is to reason absurdly and to contradict the premises of the argument; for in fact this act denies the existence of any such right in the respective Houses, and assumes that both Houses, by a joint act of legislation, with the approval of the President of the act, have authority to determine those matters for the Houses respectively. "But," says some zealous patriot, justly indignant at the attempt to separate these once happily united States, "would you have Jefferson Davis and Robert Toombs, whose hands are dripping with the blood of our brave soldiers, to appear in this Chamber and take seats as members on this floor?"

Such exclamations, sir, may well become the hustings or serve to excite the passions of the tumultuous mob. They have no force when addressed to the legal mind engaged in determining the obligatory character of legislative enactments, and by none can be supposed to have relevancy to the issues of this debate. This act and this order does not pretend to exclude any one from membership in the Senate who has given aid or comfort to the enemy, or even him whose hands are stained with the blood of "our brave soldiers." Innocency of these great crimes is not the additional qualification which your act seeks to establish, but it is simply the oath of the party claiming membership that he has not been guilty of the offenses of which he is required to purge himself; and if he does purge himself by taking the oath, his right to enter upon the discharge of his duties is even by the provisions of your act and the terms of your order plain, clear, and unquestioned. Should he swear falsely he may, under the act, be prosecuted for perjury. But self-purgation by oath fulfills your additional condition of membership and establishes the existence of the qualification which the act requires.

The honorable Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLBANE] has attempted the only legal argument in favor of the constitutional power of Congress to declare, if not a constitutional qualification, a constitutional disqualification for a Senator. The deservedly acknowledged ability of that Senator, his great legal learning, which causes him on such subjects always to be listened to with marked attention in this body, caused me when he arose to address the Senate to be somewhat apprehensive in regard to the correctness of the opinions which I had formed; but when I listened to the premises of his argument, their illustration, and finally to the attempt, as I thought, to ridicule the argument of my colleague, I was convinced that a cause in behalf of which only so much could be said was not to be considered as sustained by correct legal principle or truly logical reasoning. I have examined the printed argument of that Senator, and with becoming deference presume upon some reflections upon its principles. The Senator remarks that

"In order to understand properly the true intent and meaning, the purport and object of a statute, it is necessary and proper to take into consideration all the contemporaneous legislation in pari materia, all relating to that subject passed in or about that time, bearing upon each other."

He attributes the failure of my colleague to meet the true issue of this debate to a disregard of this supposed just rule of interpretation. The substance of the Senator's argument is this: that up to 1861 we had experienced great difficulty from the fact that persons held seats in this and the other branch of Congress whose affections were alienated from the Government and who desired to destroy it; that they finally attempted its destruction by retiring from Congress, by departing from this city, as did Catiline from Rome; to carry into effect through blood the conspiracy which they had here concocted. The evil to be remedied by congressional legislation he assumes to have been the possibility of a repetition of such conduct in the future by declaring that those who had so acted should never in the future be capable or qualified to hold any office under the United States. That provision was made, he suggests, by the passage of an act in July, 1862, which provides—

"That every person who shall hereafter commit the crime of treason against the United States, and shall be adjudged guilty thereof, shall suffer death, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; or, at the discretion of the court, he shall be imprisoned for not less than five years, and fined not less than $10,000, and all his slaves, if any, shall be declared and made free; said fine shall be levied and collected on any or all of the property, real and personal, excluding slaves, of which the said person so convicted was the owner at the time of committing the said crime; any sale or conveyance to the contrary notwithstanding."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall hereafter incite, set on foot, or assist, or engage in any rebellion or insurrection against the authority of the United States, or the laws thereof, or shall give aid or comfort thereto, or shall engage in or give aid and comfort to any such existing rebellion or insurrection, and be convicted thereof, such person shall be punished by imprisonment for a period not exceeding ten years, or by a fine not exceeding $10,000, and by the liberation of all his slaves, if any he have; or by both said punishments, at the discretion of the court."

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable and disqualified to hold any office under the United States."

"There," says the Senator, "was the law that created the disability; it was not the law about the oath." Disability as to whom, and in respect to what? To those mentioned in the act, and as to that mentioned in the act, "any office under the United States." Does not the Senator perceive that his argument assumes the very matters in controversy here—is a Senator an officer under the United States, and does a Senator hold any office under the United States? These controverted matters he assumes as true, and additionally assumes that such an enactment as to Senators would be constitutional. Assuming that this act constitutionally creates a disability for the exercise of the trust of a Senator, the honorable member from Vermont assigns as a reason for its enactment that it being impossible to convict of the prohibited acts in the States in revolution, the power of exclusion from the Senate was retained in the body under the last section, which was purposely worded that the guilt of the person applying for admission might be passed upon without the evidence of a judicial conviction being produced. I submit, Mr. President, that the only evidence of guilt under this act which can anywhere be recognized wherever and whenever the same shall become the subject of investigation is the record of conviction. Suppose that it is provided in a State constitution or in a State law that any one guilty of larceny or perjury shall not be entitled to vote at any election to be held in such State: could a judge of elections, in case there had not been a conviction, refuse to receive a vote, assuming that the person offering it had been guilty of the prohibited offenses? Could he judicially determine guilt in the absence of legal proof, the record? If so, that provision of the Constitution that no man shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property—which include every constitutional right—without due process of law is a nullity, a mockery. But the Senator seems to think that exclusion from office under this act could be enforced without the evidence of conviction, for he says:

"This law was not drawn so as to provide that if a man shall be convicted of treason he shall be disqualified. That is not the expression. It was intended and made for the occasion. It is that 'every person guilty of either of the offenses described in this act shall be forever incapable.' The man is incapable if he is guilty of the act. A disaffected State would send a traitor here would not be likely to convict him; and if we could not be disabused and freed from persons of that kind to confound our councils, it is clear that this Constitution and this Government must go to ruin. Hence this law was drawn, intentionally drawn, in that way."

Whether a person supposed to be guilty of the offenses prohibited in this act could be convicted in the State or district of his residence is not the material question here. That question is, can the crime of treason be ascertained so as to affect the individual with deprivation of right or forfeiture of estate otherwise than by judicial determination, by due process of law, which means a trial by a jury and the judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction? It is not reasonable to suppose that Congress meant that under this act guilt should be ascertained in a mode unknown to the law and prohibited by the Constitution. If they did so intend, their intention cannot be executed because its execution would be prohibited by the provisions of the paramount law. But, sir, the reason which the honorable Senator offers for what he supposes to have been the action of Congress and the intention of Congress in this regard does not exist. If the acts of those engaged in the present revolution amount in law to treason, then you are not required to try them in the State or district in which they reside. Having established the existence of a conspiracy by those engaged in the attempt to establish the government of the confederate States to subvert the Government of the United States, and proving that in the prosecution of that common design, and as a part execution of that conspiracy, Maryland and Pennsylvania were invaded and the battles of Antietam and Gettysburg were fought, you have ascertained as amenable to your laws and brought within the jurisdiction of the Federal courts in those States more persons than will ever be executed by virtue of judicial proceedings if this so-called rebellion shall last for twenty years and then be successfully subdued.

But, Mr. President, I deny that it is competent for Congress to prescribe a disqualification or a qualification for a Senator, either as a punishment for crime or otherwise. This position does not necessarily conflict with any antecedent legislation of Congress. Admitting, for the sake of the argument, that Congress may provide that any one guilty of an offense shall be disqualified from holding any office under the United States, the original question remains, does a Senator hold any such office? That he does not, I have already attempted to show. But the Senator from Vermont regards the act to prescribe an additional oath of office as designed simply to aid in the execution of the act to punish treason, to which he refers. It is the latter, not the former, which creates the disability or prescribes the qualification. This is not admitted, for the reason that a person claiming membership in this body might be wholly innocent of every offense named in the act to punish treason, and might conscientiously swear that he had not offended against its provisions, and yet be disqualified under the act to prescribe an additional oath of office. The language of the act prescribing a punishment for treason is "that every person who shall hereafter commit," &c.; that is, after the passage of the act. It is wholly prospective in character. The act to prescribe an additional oath of office, and for other purposes, requires a Senator, before he shall enter upon the duties of his office, to swear or affirm that he has never, not that he has not since the passage of the act to punish treason, done or committed any of the acts mentioned in the prescribed oath, and some of which are other and different ones from those mentioned in the former act, and that he will not in future commit any of such acts. The act prescribing an oath is retroactive as well as prospective in character. It is therefore a substantive disqualifying act. But, sir, the whole basis of the Senator's argument is swept away by the simple fact that the act to punish treason was subsequent in date to the act to prescribe an additional oath of office.

But, sir, had Congress the authority to prescribe an additional qualification for office or for a Senator, it would not follow that the act under discussion would be a constitutional exercise of that authority. This act would nevertheless be unconstitutional and void, not perhaps technically as an ex post facto law, but as opposed to the same spirit of liberty which prohibits the enactment of such laws, and as repugnant to the genius of free government. The object of the act is the punishment of the individual by denial or deprivation of office or trust to which he would otherwise be entitled. To provide a punishment for an antecedent act is against the spirit of liberty, and is of the essence of tyranny. The attempt to exercise such a power has in former times convulsed even monarchical and despotic Governments, and is now universally conceded not to be within the competency even of the omnipotence of the English Parliament. What is the act in question? It provides that before a Senator shall enter upon his duties as such, he shall swear or affirm that he has never voluntarily borne—not that he will not in the future voluntarily bear—arms against the Government of the United States; that he has voluntarily given no aid, countenance, counsel, or encouragement—not that he will not in future do so—to persons engaged in armed hostility thereto; that he has neither sought nor accepted nor attempted to execute—not that he will not in future do so—the functions of any office whatever of any authority or pretended authority in hostility to the Government of the United States; and that he has not yielded—not that he will not yield—a voluntary support to any pretended government, authority, power, or constitution hostile or inimical thereto. Such a law is contrary to the essential principles of personal liberty and against the genius of all free government, and therefore void in every such government whether expressly prohibited or not.

"There can be no individual liberty (says Lieber) where every citizen is not subject to the law, and where he is subject to aught else than the law, that is, public opinion organically passed into public will. This we call the supremacy of the law. All subjective arbitrariness is contrary to freedom. The law of a freeman is a general rule of action having grown out of the custom of the people, or having been laid down by the authority empowered by the people to do so. A law must be a rule which does not violate a superior law or civil principle. It must be made before the case to which it is applied has occurred, without which it cannot be mens ius affectus, as the ancients called the law, and it must be truly as well as plainly published."

I am aware that the courts of law, governed by technical rules, have defined ex post facto laws to be those which render an act punishable in a manner in which it was not punishable when it was committed. And admitting this definition to be technically true, yet I contend that the reason why the enactment of such laws is prohibited applies with equal if not greater force against the propriety and obligatory character of legislative enactments such as that now under consideration. It is unjust and therefore illegal to visit upon the person committing an offense a punishment not prescribed, or a greater one than that prescribed at the time of the commission of the offense. An act prescribing such a punishment would be ex post facto. The object of such an act is the infliction of punishment positively, or the deprivation of right. The object of the act of July, 1862, is the same—the punishment of a Senator refusing to submit to its requirements by deprivation of office or trust; not for any act done or attempted for which there was a prescribed punishment, but what is worse, because of an assumption of guilt on his part by others, which illegal assumption he declines to meet by an oath of self-purgation. If judicial determination of the correctness of the principles I have asserted were required it could be easily furnished. The decisions in many of the States in relation to the unconstitutionality of acts requiring an oath as a qualification for office, that persons have not been engaged in doing, are directly in point, and in discussion in another forum would be produced as authority. The clear and unanswerable reasoning in many of these cases cannot fail to convince any one that all acts, whether of the State Legislatures or the Federal Congress, of the character of that under consideration, are repugnant to the genius of free institutions and unwarranted by the supreme law of the land.

Article six of the Constitution declares that "The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution; but no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States."

This section prescribes the substance of the oath, declares in what it shall consist—the support of the Constitution of the United States. Had this section been omitted, there would have been no authority for administering any oath to a Senator. Having the three constitutional qualifications before mentioned, he would have been entitled to enter upon the discharge of his duties without taking any oath whatever. If this be so, then I insist that the only oath that can be required to be taken is such as is mentioned, namely, to support the Constitution of the United States. That this is so, a moment's reflection will suffice to show. Is there any authority to require that the members of the Legislatures of the several States shall take any other oath than or any additional oath to that prescribed in this section? Why not? Because the only authority by which they can be required to take an oath arises from this section. The authority to require Senators in Congress to take an oath is the same. If the extent of that authority is limited as to members of the State Legislatures in this section, it is likewise limited as to the members of Congress. If not, the extension of authority in reference to the latter must be shown, not assumed. It is asserted, however, by some that Congress may prescribe an additional oath to Senators, because the last clause of the section referred to says "But no religious test shall ever be required as a qualification to any office or public trust under the United States." Does the prohibition upon Congress against requiring a religious test confer upon them a substantive power to require any other test? If so, that test may be of any character not prohibited. If the prohibition upon requiring one particular kind of oath to be taken confers power to require the taking of others, then any other kind of oath than that prohibited may be required, because the right arising from implication there can be found no express limitation upon its exercise. The only authority, then, to require such additional oaths to be taken is a limitless implication arising from a positive prohibition. Let us test the correctness of this view of the question. If the prohibition against requiring a religious test, which means an oath in respect to religious belief, confers authority to require any other oath to be taken, then a political, scientific, physical, or partisan test may be required. The statement of the absurdity and danger to which the argument necessarily leads is conclusive against the correctness of the premises upon which it is founded. To enable Congress practically to execute the powers conferred upon them, the creation of many offices not named, and the qualifications for which were not prescribed in the Constitution, might become necessary. In respect to the persons who should exercise the duties of such offices Congress undoubtedly would have authority to prescribe qualifications. The framers of the Constitution, taught by the history of other nations the abuses and danger resulting from a religious test as a qualification for office, expressly provided that no such qualification should be required in respect to any office or trust under the Government of the United States. Thus we see the reason for the prohibition under consideration, and how it can have practical application without admitting that from it arises all the dangerous implications contended for by the advocates of the measure now before the Senate.

Mr. President, while reflecting upon the dangerous innovations which characterize the executive and legislative policy of the present times, I often turn with a melancholy interest to the opinions expressed by the great and wise men who established our Federal system of government, and contemplate how little of the future it is allowed even the wisest men to know. In the twenty-eighth number of the Federalist, Mr. Hamilton, urging the adoption of the proposed Constitution, and with the view of relieving the apprehensions of those opposed to the establishment of a Government with powers that might be exercised for the oppression of the people, remarks:

"It may safely be received as an axiom in our political system that the State governments will, in all possible contingencies, afford complete security against invasions of the public liberty by the national authority. Projects of usurpation cannot be masked under pretenses so likely to escape the penetration of select bodies of men as of the people at large. The Legislatures will have better means of information. They can discover the danger at a distance; and possessing all the organs of civil power, and the confidence of the people, they can at once adopt a regular plan of opposition in which they can combine all the resources of the community. They can readily communicate with each other in the different States, and unite their common forces for the protection of their common liberty."

Sir, the brief experience of seventy-five years has been sufficient to show that this supposed "axiom" has practically no place "in our political system." Within that period the State which was first to adopt that Constitution has by the "invasion of the public liberty by the national (usurped) authority" been practically blotted from existence, reduced to a military province, and her people prevented by "Federal authority" from selecting the agents of their will both under the State and Federal Governments; and the attempt is now being made here to prevent her from having an equal representation in this body unless one of her Senators shall submit to a test, a qualification not prescribed in the Constitution, and to which test she did not agree when she entered into the Federal Union. Sir, it is time that the once proud freemen of this country should arouse themselves to a proper consideration of the dangerous results to which such acts of oppression and gross usurpation may lead. The fate of Delaware to-day may and will be the fate of every State hereafter unless wiser counsels and a different policy shall in future prevail. Shall the Constitution be preserved and thereby the liberty of the people be maintained, or shall that Constitution be subverted and that liberty be subject to the arbitrary will of those who assume to exercise Federal authority? Such is the issue arising from the developments of the present times. Its decision is with the people themselves. If they are worthy of their fathers they will preserve their heritage.

Mr. SUMNER. There is a time for all things; but there are times when certain things are out of place, and this principle is especially applicable to the present debate. The question is on the adoption of a rule of the Senate to carry out an existing statute. It is not on the passage of the statute or on its proposed repeal, but it is simply on its recognition as an existing statute, and the enforcement of its plain requirement. Considering the simplicity of the question we may well be astonished at much that has been intruded into this debate.

The Senate is a branch of the legislative power, in conjunction with the House of Representatives and the President. Neither of these branches alone can make a law or unmake a law. The concurrence of all three is essential to a valid act of legislation. And as it takes all three to make a law, so it takes all three to unmake a law. So long as the law exists, there is no difference between the obligations of the Senate and the obligations of the humblest citizen—except, perhaps, that the Senate, which helped to make the law, is bound to set an example of obedience beyond any citizen.

Therefore I put aside as entirely irrelevant much that we have heard against the proposed rule. This is not the time to say that the oath is unconstitutional, or that it is ex post facto. These are considerations properly arising on the passage of the statute, or on a proposition for its repeal. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] and the Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON], who have argued these topics so exhaustively, were either too late or too early. The statute is already the law of the land, and there is no new bill introduced for its repeal.

On a former occasion I have indicated the constitutionality of the statute, and I now willingly leave that topic to the judgment of Senators, enlightened by the wisdom of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER], whose argument has not been answered. But I repeat that this objection is utterly out of place at this moment.

A Senator over the way [Mr. HENDRICKS] has gone so far as to introduce my course on a former occasion as an apology for not taking the oath. Because I denounced an infamous statute, which was a scandal to civilization, as unconstitutional and utterly unworthy of the support of virtuous citizens, it has been argued that the slave-drivers then in power were more lenient to me than we are now to them. In other words, the slave-drivers required of me no oath to support a statute which I abhorred, and therefore we are wrong in requiring the proposed oath. But this argument confounds the two cases, which are as wide apart as the poles. While denouncing an outrageous statute, and refusing to play the part of a slave-hunter, I never joined in rebellion against my country, or uttered one word except in loyalty. But here are persons with bloody hands in battle array, striking at all that we hold dear, or there are others who have acted with them. Such persons will be justly brought to the test of an oath; and they can claim no immunity from the example of those patriot citizens who, recognizing the crime of slavery, refused to become in any way its tools.

And another Senator [Mr. JOHNSON] has taken this occasion to arraign me for certain opinions on another question, and he complained that I place them under the protection of a judgment of the Supreme Court. This is not the time for the discussion of the question of "reconstruction." It has nothing to do with the matter now before the Senate. I may think that the Government of the United States has belligerent rights, as well as the right of sovereignty, over the rebel States; that it is especially the duty of Congress to take care that these rights are so exercised as to crush the rebellion, and to prevent its breaking out again; and that, to this end, Congress must take all possible bonds for the future. These opinions, which the Senator chose to characterize harshly, may be wrong, but they have nothing to do with the matter in hand. At a proper time I shall be ready to defend them. At present I choose not to be diverted from the issue before us.

Putting aside the irrelevant matter which has been introduced, and presenting the single point in issue, the question becomes too plain for argument. It is simply this: will the Senate obey an existing statute? And this question opens another: what is the meaning of the statute?

That the Senate will openly refuse obedience to an existing statute, recently enacted in support of loyalty, is not to be supposed without an impeachment of the loyalty of the Senate. It is only because the question of obedience has been complicated with other questions, that there has been for a moment any doubt on this head. Clearly, the Senate will not disobey an existing statute. It is, then, on the statute alone, and nothing else, that any question can arise.

And here I ask leave to recall the Senate from the learned commentary and elaborate diversion of the Senator from Delaware. The actual question is one which may be treated without learning and without effort. It arises on the following words of the statute:

"Hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation; [here follows the oath:] which said oath, so taken and signed, shall be preserved among the files of the Court, House of Congress, or Department to which the said office may appertain."—12 Statutes at Large, p. 502.

It will be observed here that the language is plain rather than technical. Every person "elected" or "appointed" to any "office" in the "civil, military, or naval department of the public service," must take the oath. What words could be broader than "departments" and "public service?"

Obviously, and beyond all question, a Senator is "elected." Therefore on this point there is no question.

The inquiry recurs, is a Senator an "officer" in the "civil department of the public service?"

Is he an "officer?"

Is he in the "civil department?"

It seems absurd to raise these questions, but I have not raised them. This has been done by others. You might as well raise the questions, if a man is a creature, and belongs to the human family.

But let us look at these questions in their order.

1. Is a Senator an "officer?" Here please to look at the dictionary. I turn to Webster:

OFFICE.—"Offices are civil, judicial, ministerial, executive, legislative, political, municipal, diplomatic, military, ecclesiastical," &c.—Webster.

Thus, plainly offices are legislative. But why summon the dictionary? And yet the zeal of the other side seems to leave me no alternative.

Not content with the dictionary, I call your attention to the use of the word in other authoritative places, and pardon me if I begin with the constitution of Massachusetts, written originally by John Adams.

In the bill of rights of the constitution of Massachusetts, section five, it is declared:

"All power residing originally in the people and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them."

Here are members of the Legislature classed among officers, and thus this word received its interpretation.

In another part of this same constitution it is provided:

"Any person chosen Governor or Lieutenant Governor, Counselor, Senator, or Representative, and accepting the trust, shall, before he proceed to execute the duties of his place or office, take and subscribe the following declaration."

Here the place or trust of a Senator or Representative is called an office. But this same use of these terms as synonymous and as applicable to the post of Senator and Representative is continued, as follows:

"Every person chosen to either of the places or offices aforesaid, (meaning the offices of Governor, Lieutenant Governor, Senator, or Representative,) shall, before he enters on the discharge of the business of his place or office, take and subscribe," &c.

The authority of New Hampshire is like that of Massachusetts. Her constitution declares:

"All power residing originally in and being derived from the people, all the magistrates and officers of government are their substitutes and agents, and at all times accountable to them."

Here the word officers obviously means the substitutes and agents of the people. But who are substitutes and agents of the people more than Senators?

Then again in the same constitution it is declared:

"No office or place whatsoever in Government shall be hereditary."

Here the word "office" is made synonymous with "place."

The constitution of Vermont testifies as follows:

"All power being originally invested in and consequently derived from the people, therefore all officers of government, whether legislative or executive, are their trustees."

Thus in Vermont, members of the Legislature are "officers."

The constitution of New Jersey testifies also, in the clause prescribing the qualifications which shall entitle a person to vote:

"For representatives in Council and Assembly, and also for all other public officers that shall be elected by the people of the county at large."

Here, again, members of the Legislature are treated as "public officers."

The constitution of Pennsylvania testifies as follows:

"Members of the General Assembly and all officers, executive and judicial, shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support the constitution of this Commonwealth, and to perform the duties of their respective offices with fidelity."

Here members of the General Assembly are classed with those holding "offices."

The original constitution of New York is more positive. Here are the words:

"The chancellor and judges of the supreme court shall not hold any other office except that of Delegate to the general Congress upon special occasions; and the first judges of the county courts in the several counties shall not, at the same time, hold any other office, except that of Senator or Delegate to the general Congress."

Here the post of a Delegate to the general Congress, and also of a "Senator," is treated as an "office."

Surely here is enough on this head. The post of Senator is an office of honor or profit, and a "Senator" is an "officer."

2. But assuming that the post of Senator is an "office," and that a Senator is an "officer," the question occurs, to what "department of the public service" does he belong?

Clearly he is not of the "military" or "naval" department. But if not "military" or "naval," he must be "civil." Here again consult the dictionary:

Civil.—"It is distinguished from ecclesiastical, which respects the church, and from military, which respects the army and navy." "This term is often employed in contrast with military, as, a civil hospital; the civil service."

Civil List.—"In England, formerly a list of the entire expenses of the civil government; hence the officers of civil government, who are paid from the public treasury; also, the revenue appropriated to support the civil government."

Civil State.—"The whole body of the laity or citizens not included under the military, maritime, and ecclesiastical states."—Webster.

To say that a Senator is not included under this comprehensive but distinctive term is simply an absurdity.

It is evident that Congress adopted the words of the statute because they were comprehensive and distinctive. They obviously comprehended all "officers" in the "public service," whether "elected" like a Senator, or "appointed" like a judge. But, beyond their plainness, these words had this added advantage, that already for more than a generation they had received a practical interpretation from Congress.

Here is the Blue Book, so familiar to our hands. Its title-page begins as follows:

"Register of officers and agents, civil, military, and naval, in the service of the United States."

If we turn to the contents, we shall find in this list members of Congress, including Senators and Representatives, with the "officers and agents" of the two Houses.

If we go back to the Blue Book for 1820, which is now in my hands, we shall find the same title, and the same enumeration of Senators and Representatives.

This Blue Book is still published in pursuance of a joint resolution by Congress, originally adopted as long ago as 27th April, 1816, with the following title:

"Resolution requiring the Secretary of State to compile and print, once in every two years, a register of all officers and agents, civil, military, and naval, in the service of the United States."

If Senators can properly be included in such a register, it is only as belonging to the "civil department of the public service," which is precisely where they have been placed by the recent act of Congress.

The only apology for the objection which has been urged from the beginning of this debate with so much pertinacity, is founded on the case of Mr. Blount, the Senator expelled and afterwards impeached, at the close of the last century. I shall not take time to consider this case. It has already been amply done by others. On former occasions I have done it at length. And yet I will not leave it without protesting again that it is absolutely inapplicable to the present occasion. If that case were out of the way, nobody would have thought of saying that a "Senator" was not an "officer in the civil department of the public service." Now, what did this case decide? Let another give the summary. I quote the words of Mr. Wharton, in the notes to his edition of the State Trials:

"In a legal point of view, all that this case decides is that a Senator of the United States, who has been expelled from his seat, is not, after such expulsion, subject to impeachment; and perhaps from this broader proposition may be drawn, that none are liable to impeachment except officers of the Government, in the technical sense, excluding thereby members of the national Legislature."—Page 317, note.

The case of Mr. Blount has no application to the present question. It is not an interpretation of the statute, and so far as it illustrates the Constitution it simply concerns the liability to impeachment. But even this case has often been drawn into doubt. And if we look into the proceedings of the time, we shall find that the decision, such as it was, encountered an able and earnest opposition.

Among those who took a distinguished part on that occasion was James A. Bayard, of Delaware, the eminent Representative who conducted the impeachment as manager on the part of the House of Representatives. In his effective argument on that occasion he has set forth the true significance of the Constitution. From the argument of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] in the present debate I confidently appeal to that of the earlier Mr. Bayard. Here is a passage:

"I have submitted, in the course of my argument, that the sound principle of construction to be adopted in relation to the construction of an instrument having in view the vast object of settling the powers of the Government and the rights of the people, is to give it such an interpretation as is best calculated to give effect generally to all its parts according to its true design. If I am supported in this principle I shall be able to show, by strong cases under the Constitution, that its undeniable intention must be frustrated if a Senator be not considered an officer of the United States."

"I find it provided in the seventh clause of the third section of the first article, that conviction on impeachment disqualifies the party convicted from holding any office of honor, trust, or profit under the United States. If a seat in the Senate be not an office, the disqualification does not extend to it. And yet can it reasonably be contended that the policy which incapacitates a citizen, if convicted on impeachment, from holding an office the most mean and humble, does not apply to the case of a Senator? The wisdom of the Constitution, sir, has considered a conviction as an evidence of moral unfitness for public trust. It can never happen but in the case of a great national offense. And shall such an offender, degraded from the capacity of even being doorkeeper of this Chamber, yet retain the capacity of being a member of a body of the most dignity, trust, and power in the country? This is a solecism in politics, an absurdity in reason, which I trust this honorable court will not willingly by their act attach to an instrument so highly and justly revered as the Constitution of our Government."

"I find also a provision in the seventh clause of the ninth section of the first article, that 'no person holding any office of profit or trust under the United States shall, without the consent of the Congress, accept of any present, emolument, office, or title of any kind whatever, from any king, prince, or foreign State.' If a Senator holds no office of profit or trust under the United States, it is lawful for him to accept a present, title, or office from any king or foreign State."

"Can it be possible that a public functionary, of all others the peculiar object of this jealous restriction, is, in fact, the sole object of exemption from its operation? Can it be imagined that a Senator, upon whom the Constitution has heaped the powers and trusts of legislator, judge, and executive magistrate, is the only person who is left exposed to the seductions of foreign influence? It can never be admitted that a situation which, from its trust and importance, most invites corruption, is the only one which the Constitution has not guarded against. If, sir, a Senator be not an officer under this clause, it might happen that the Senate of the United States might become a House of Lords. It would be in the power of any king in Europe to change our free Government, and to convert one branch, at least, from a republican into an aristocratic form. You will not suffer an ensign in your Army to accept the humble title of chevalier, and yet you will allow an integral part of the Government to be composed of earls and dukes. And let me pray the honorable court to remember, at the same time, that the Constitution has provided that a member of either House shall not be allowed to retain his seat and hold any commission, civil or military, under the United States. The President has no titles to grant, nor offices of great emolument to confer; and yet the classic republicanism of the Constitution will not allow a Senator to feel the influence of his patronage; and yet, at the same time, he may lawfully be the pensioner or the titular noble of a foreign Power. Such a doctrine is not simply absurd, but infinitely dangerous."

In view of these emphatic words it is difficult to see how any person can insist that a "Senator" is not a "civil officer," even according to the text of the Constitution. Conceding to the judgment on the trial of impeachment all the authority which can belong to it, you cannot properly deduce from it any conclusion except that a Senator, already expelled, is not a "civil officer" liable to impeachment. Nothing beyond this.

But whatever may be the significance of this word in the Constitution, even conceding all that is claimed for it there, the instance is entirely inapplicable to the interpretation of the statute in question. If there be any doubt on the Constitution, there is none on the statute. The latter is plain, and there are no associate words to interfere with its natural and unequivocal significance.

I conclude this branch of the subject as I began, by putting aside all irrelevant matter—all superfluous questions—all surplusage—all topics which are not properly germane to this debate. There is no question of the Constitution—no question of ex post facto—but a simple question on the meaning of a statute.

The oath has been prescribed by Congress. It is too late to debate its constitutionality thus incidentally. It only remains for us to obey it; promptly, swiftly, patriotically. The procrastination of this debate is of evil example to the country. How can we expect the alacrity of loyalty among the people if the Senate hesitates?

But another objection to the proposed rule has been brought forward by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor.] According to him the statute is obligatory, and the oath must be taken by Senators, but a rule requiring the oath is superfluous and without precedent. The argument of the Senator is plausible, but it is answered by a simple statement of facts, in which, as Presiding Officer of the Senate, he bore a conspicuous part.

From this statement it will appear that the rule or some equivalent action of the Senate is not superfluous. If it be without precedent it is because the omission of the Chair has been without precedent. It appears from the Globe, which I have before me, that on the 4th March, 1863, the Senate was organized, in the absence of the Vice President, by the choice of Hon. Solomon Foot, of Vermont, as President pro tempore. The oath to support the Constitution was administered to him by Mr. FOSTER, of Connecticut, but the additional oath was omitted. The President pro tempore then proceeded to say:

"Senators elect, and Senators whose term commences under a reelection at this time, will receive the oath of office in the order in which their names will be called by the Secretary."

The Secretary then called the names of a long list of Senators, who came forward and took the customary oath. But the President pro tempore did not offer to administer the additional oath; nor, at the time of qualification, was anything said with regard to it. After the conclusion of the ceremony, the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] said:

"I desire to call the attention of the President of the Senate, and of the Senate itself, to an act of Congress approved 2d July, 1862."

And he proceeded to read this act, and said:

"I do not know that any motion in regard to it is necessary, further than calling the attention of the Presiding Officer and of the Senate to the law."

The President pro tempore then said:

"The Chair presumes it is sufficient to call the attention of Senators to that duty, and that that duty will be performed as required by law."

Nothing, however, was done by the Chair or by Senators.

The next day, 5th March, two other Senators, Mr. HENDRICKS and Mr. SPRAGUE, came forward to be qualified. The Chair proceeded to administer to these Senators the usual oath to support the Constitution, but did not administer the additional oath, and these Senators took their seats. Shortly afterwards, during the session of that day, on a call of the yeas and nays, all these Senators were called, and answered to their names. It was immediately after such a call, showing that the statute had been disregarded, that I proposed the rule which is now under discussion. It was obvious that something must be done to obtain a recognition of the statute in the Senate Chamber. The Chair, which had administered the other oath, had omitted to administer the additional oath.

It would be difficult to indicate any sufficient reason for the discrimination made by the Chair between the two oaths. Each stood on the requirement of a statute. On what principle was one statute respected and the other neglected? But without stopping to consider the identity of obligation in the two cases, I content myself with calling attention to the unquestionable fact, that one statute was respected and the other was neglected.

On the next day, 6th of March, Mr. BAYARD, of Delaware, who had been absent before, came forward to be qualified. The Chair, as in the other cases, administered the oath to support the Constitution, but omitted the additional oath, and Mr. BAYARD took his seat. Afterwards, on this day, I called up the proposed rule for consideration, and I objected to an executive session until the question of the rule was settled, as follows:

"Here is a statute of Congress, and the question is whether the Senate is going to set an example of obedience to it or of disobedience; that is all." * * * * * "If the Senate now choose to go into executive session they choose to enter upon most important duties in disregard of an act of Congress which they have assisted in putting upon the statute-book."

On coming out of executive session, which was ordered, the Senate proceeded with the consideration of the proposed rule. And here I will read, with the permission of the Senate, the conclusion of remarks which I made on that occasion:

"And now, sir, as I conclude, let me say that I desire to take and subscribe the new oath in open Senate, that I may, in all respects, qualify myself for the discharge of my duties as a Senator. Others will do as they please, or as the Senate shall require. But I hope that I may appeal to the Chair to administer that oath to myself, or to direct that it shall be administered. With the expression of this desire, I take my seat."—Globe, (March 6, 1863), page 1559.

The President pro tempore made no offer to administer the oath, but said simply:

"The subject is under debate."

The debate was continued until the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] proposed that the Chair should proceed to administer the oath. Again it appears from the report that I expressed a hope "that the Chair would consent to administer the oath to me."

Shortly afterwards the President pro tempore said:

"The Chair proposes now to take and subscribe this oath, in pursuance of the law of 2d July last, and that being done, the Chair will administer the oath to such members as will voluntarily take it."

Mark the words: "to such members as will voluntarily take it."

The oath was then administered to Mr. Foor by Mr. FOSTER. Resuming the chair, the President pro tempore then said:

"The Chair will now direct the Clerk to call, in alphabetical order, the names of all Senators who have been elected or re-elected since the 2d July, 1862, that being the day of the approval of the act; and such Senators present, whose names shall be called, as choose to do so, will come forward to the Secretary's desk and receive the oath of office administered by the Chair, after which they will have an opportunity to subscribe the oath."

The Senators present, whose names were called, some of them, after delay, came forward and took the oath; and then, at the suggestion of the Chair, I withdrew the resolution. The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] was not then present.

The language of the Chair when inviting Senators to take the oath, left a loop-hole through which they might avoid the oath. It was, "such Senators present as choose to do so will come forward," and then "they will have an opportunity to subscribe the oath." In such dainty terms Senators were invited to do as they pleased; thus making a discrimination between the earlier oath which they were obliged to take in order to be qualified, and the additional oath which they were free to neglect.

Such is a plain statement of facts, showing the necessity for the proposed rule. I make this in no spirit of personal criticism, but simply that you may see the occasion for the proposed rule.

Had the Chair, at the beginning, proceeded to administer the additional oath as it administered the earlier oath, there would have been no occasion for a rule. Or had the Chair afterwards, when attention was called to the omission, administered the additional oath according to the requirement of the statute, there would have been no occasion for a rule.

But the Chair did no such thing. It left the taking of the oath to the conscience or will of each Senator. And though the statute solemnly declares that "every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe" the oath in question, yet the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] has not only "entered upon the duties" of his office as a Senator, but he has continued to discharge these duties and to draw his salary, although he has never taken and subscribed the oath.

It is evident that something must be done to correct this incongruity, and to rehabilitate, if I may so say, the act of Congress. I know no better way than by the proposed rule. But I have no partiality for this mode. I shall be ready for any other proposition which will lift the statute from the desuetude and neglect into which it was allowed to fall, and will secure its enforcement. In the events which are now at hand this statute will be a safeguard of the Republic, and its enforcement here will secure its enforcement everywhere. To the traitor, seeking office, it will be a touchstone; while, like the angelic sword at the gates of Paradise, it will thrust away from these Chambers all those brutal enemies who, for the sake of slavery, have helped to fill our land with mourning.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts, it seems to me, has made a very labored attack upon the President pro tempore of the Senate in his remarks; and but for this, I should not perhaps feel called upon to say a word. But, sir, I feel it due to that gentleman, and the course pursued by him at the commencement of the extra session last year, that I should state some of the facts bearing upon this question.

The old law required the oath to support the Constitution to be taken. The new law required the additional oath to be taken and subscribed; and when we met in the Senate here, on the 4th day of March at twelve o'clock, neither the Secretary of the Senate nor any one else had prepared an oath to be subscribed. The newly elected Senators were called by name, and they advanced to the Chair and took the usual oath. No one thought at that time of the other oath; and the oath was not prepared ready to be subscribed by the Senators. If the Senator from Massachusetts charges upon the Chair neglect of duty in the administration of his office, why did he not, when he walked up to the desk on that day and took the old oath, then ask to subscribe and take the oath under the new statute? He did not think of it. There was no "dainty" performance of duty in the taking of the oath of office on the part either of the President of the Senate or on the part of the Senator from Massachusetts. I do not charge it upon either. The Senator did not think about it at the time when he first went forward and took his oath of office.

But again, sir, the Senate almost immediately adjourned on its organization that day without doing any business. It is true that the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] did call the attention of the Chair to the subject, but the Senate immediately adjourned, and the oath of office was then drawn and prepared to be brought into the Senate to be subscribed. But the Senator from Massachusetts, by the introduction of his proposition to establish a new rule, got up a long debate in the Senate as to whether it was proper to have a rule; and it was pending this debate that the President pro tempore himself proposed at once to show his respect for and obedience to the law by saying that he was now prepared and felt it his duty to arrest the debate, which was consuming so much time, by taking the oath of office himself, and he asked the honorable Senator from Connecticut, [Mr. FOSTER], who by direction of the Senate had administered the usual oath to him in the first place, to administer to him the new oath. He proceeded to do so, and then the Chair at once proceeded to call upon all the newly elected Senators who had not taken the new oath to come forward and take and subscribe it, as it was then prepared for them to subscribe at the desk of the Secretary. After this was done, the Senator from Massachusetts, seeing that the idea of a rule in the Senate in order to require men to obey the law was (as in my judgment it was) a perfect farce, withdrew his proposition for a rule and thus ended the debate.

These are the facts, Mr. President. As to the position taken by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] in relation to the proposed rule, and the necessity of adopting a rule in the Senate in order to require the fulfillment of a law, if I were to assume the attitude of the Senator from Massachusetts, and speak in the same dogmatical tone that he does, I should say it is too plain for any argument, there cannot be any two opinions on such a question. I say that the ground taken by the Senator from Vermont is correct; that this attempting by rule to bolster up a law is derogatory to legislation and derogatory to the Senate. The law is valid or invalid. It is urged on the one side that it is against the Constitution; on the other that it is constitutional. If it is valid the rule adds no force to it. If it is invalid the rule cannot give it any power.

Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Vermont in the view that he expressed as to the necessity of the adoption of any such rule as this in relation to this statute; and I should not have said a word on this subject but for this apparent attack upon the Senator from Vermont, as if he had handled this law with dainty fingers, as if he had left some loophole out of which men might escape from the performance of their legal duty. Perhaps I speak warmly; I sometimes feel pretty warmly and pretty deeply when I see friends attacking each other. If I see friends attacking enemies I do not care much about it; but this continued war among friends on this side of the Chamber sometimes makes me think that the Republicans are endeavoring to do precisely what the Democrats did last year. They did all in their power to help the Republicans beat them, and I do not know but the Republicans now—perhaps out of gratitude for what the Democrats did last year—are going to pursue the same course and keep up a war among themselves.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to ask my friend from Wisconsin a question. I do not concur with him as to the mode of getting at this question. How would he compel the enforcement of the law as against the Senator from Delaware, [Mr. BAYARD], who is here in his seat acting with us? If he will point out some mode of getting at the execution of that law other than the mode pointed out by the Senator from Massachusetts, I shall have a little more regard for his objections to this rule.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The matter is perfectly plain. There are two modes of proceeding. If a man is not a Senator, how do you prevent his voting? Suppose some outsider should come here and assume to take a seat here and speak, what would you do?

Mr. SHERMAN. This question arose by the inadvertence, I think, by the neglect, of the officers of the Senate. Certainly the Senator from Vermont was no more at fault than the Senator from Massachusetts. I agree with the Senator from Wisconsin in that. The criticism on the Presiding Officer of the Senate, it seems to me, does not raise a fault with him—I speak of the first day's proceedings—because he simply neglected that which the Senator from Massachusetts and all of us neglected. I was as much at fault as either of them. But this is a question as to whether members of the Senate are to obey that law. I desire to see it enforced. We have decided the constitutionality of the law after a full and ample debate; at least I have for myself. I do not wish to review that decision. I do not say, myself, that this rule is the best mode of getting at it. If the Senator from Wisconsin can point out any other mode by which we can require this oath to be administered to the Senator from Delaware, I may agree with him; but until he does it seems to me we had better adopt the mode suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts.

It occurred to me at the very beginning of this controversy that probably the shortest way would be, when the name of the Senator from Delaware was called on roll-call, to object to it, and to insist that his name be stricken from the roll until he takes the oath of office. That seemed to me to be the clearest and easiest mode of getting at it, but I did not like to make a suggestion of that kind. I do not think the Senator from Delaware, in the face of the law, ought to be allowed to vote on any pending proposition until he takes the oath, or until the Senate shall have decided on that question that he is entitled to his seat. The course I have suggested, I think, would be a better way of disposing of this question; but at the same time I do not want to criticize the mode indicated by the Senator from Massachusetts until I see clearly some other mode that is better.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know whether the remarks which were made by the Senator from Massachusetts were intended as a criticism on the Presiding Officer of the Senate on that occasion—

Mr. SUMNER. Not at all. I hope the Senator will allow me one simple word in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin. It seems to me that he makes trouble where there ought to be no trouble. He makes suggestions which there is no occasion for him to make. Sir, I know the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] too well, his distinguished character and all his merits, to allow myself for a single moment to say anything that any candid person could interpret into an attack upon him. The idea never entered my mind. I banish it. I am sorry that it entered the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin. I confined myself to a statement of the facts from the record—absolutely from the record—prepared carefully, tending to show the necessity for some action of the Senate in order to secure the enforcement of that statute. That was all; and in making that statement of fact I showed that the Presiding Officer administered one oath and did not administer another; and that Senators continued, after the attention of the Presiding Officer was called to the omission, to perform their duties as Senators and to answer to their names on the roll-call. That is what I did. If there is any person who imagined that I could make an attack on the Senator from Vermont, I beg to undeceive him; and I beg to take back every word I have said that by any possibility could be so egregiously misinterpreted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know whether the gentleman carefully measured his words in writing out what he said on this occasion before delivery; but he will find that he did indulge in some remarks intimating that the Presiding Officer had acted so delicately in regard to this law as to afford an opportunity to men to escape its provisions.

Mr. SUMNER. I will read the words, if the Senator will permit me.

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe the exact word used by the Senator was "daintily."

Mr. SUMNER. These are the words which I read and characterized, from the Globe:

"Such Senators present whose names shall be called as choose to do so, will come forward to the Secretary's desk and receive the oath of office administered by the Chair, after which they will have an opportunity to subscribe the oath."

I characterized those as dainty words.

Mr. COLLAMER. I did not refer to anything the Senator read from a book. I am referring to his own remark, that the Chair had done it so "daintily."

Mr. SUMNER. I said that.

Mr. COLLAMER. I cannot but think that that implied more than the gentleman would seem to say now he intended. Very well; let it be so intended that it is more than he did mean, and that he takes it back; and let that end it.

Now, Mr. President, in relation to this rule and the occasion for such a rule, I beg to call the attention of Senators for a moment to its effect. The Constitution of the United States requires that Senators shall take an oath to support that Constitution; and the act of 1789, the first act passed by Congress, went on to provide the mode and manner of taking it. It required it to be taken in the Senate and to be administered by the Presiding Officer, so that the records of it could be kept among the records and muniments of the body. That made it the duty of the Presiding Officer to administer the oath, and clothed him with the authority to administer it. It was a matter of law, not merely the form of the oath made up agreeably to the general provision of the Constitution, but the time, mode, and manner of its administration were all matters of law. Senators will please to bear in mind that the act which requires this oath of which we are now talking did not prescribe the mode and manner and time and place of its administration. There is nothing in the act to prevent a man from taking it before the Senate meet at all, or from taking it before any magistrate and taking his certificate and keeping it in his pocket. There was nothing prescribed in the law itself requiring the Presiding Officer to administer it at all. It was therefore made in no way expressly his duty to administer it; nor is it to this day; and it is not now. There is the great difference between the administering of the oath to support the Constitution and the administering of the oath which we now have in question. In the one case there was a law passed prescribing it, and in the other there was not. In the latter case the law required, to be sure, that it should be done before entering upon the duties of the office; but how done, where done, and how to be certified, was not provided. Now arises the propriety of a rule, at some period to carry into effect the present law, inasmuch as we have no statute about the time and mode and manner of taking the oath. The rule prescribes the time, mode, and manner; that it shall be done in the Senate, and the oath administered by the Presiding Officer of the Senate, and that the record of it when signed shall be kept among the records and muniments of the body itself.

I endeavored to take particular pains to state that the act of 1790 which fixed the form of the oath agreeably to the Constitution particularly provides that it shall be administered by the Presiding Officer of the body. I said so before, but I say the present law about the additional oath says no such thing; and there is the difference between the two cases, the old oath requiring no more than the law to carry it into effect, the present one requiring some rule to carry it into effect, if we really mean to have the evidence of the oath preserved hereamong our muniments, and hence the propriety of the rule now mooted. When the Senate met in March last there was no rule and no law that it should be done in the Senate at all. The rule now proposes that it shall be done in the Senate, and by the Presiding Officer. I have thought it necessary to point out the difference existing between these two oaths, and the mode and manner of their administration, the one being perfect, and the other requiring a rule to carry it out.

Mr. SUMNER. Mr. President, I desire to add further a word in reply to the Senator from Wisconsin. What I said a moment ago was an interruption to the Senator from Vermont. I desire to say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if he objects to the rule which I propose, let him propose something better, and I shall vote for it. I am not attached to the proposition which I have brought forward. I am perfectly willing to vote for any substitute which will do the work proposed.

The statute requiring the oath has not been enforced. How shall we secure its enforcement in this Chamber? The Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggested, and I think there is much in that suggestion, that an objection may be made to the name, for instance, of Mr. BAYARD, when it is called, and then a motion may be made that the name be struck from the roll. We might reach the end possibly in this way. But that would be by indirection, though it might meet that specific case; and it seems to me, after the long neglect and desuetude into which we have allowed the statute to fall here, that it becomes the Senate in some more formal way to rehabilitate it. I may be mistaken in that idea, but I content myself with saying that my single purpose is to secure the enforcement of the statute. I understand the Senator from Wisconsin to be in favor of its enforcement. Let him bring forward his proposition for its enforcement. Let him tell the Senate how in his opinion that statute which has so long been neglected in this body may be set upon its feet. If he will offer a proposition better than mine, I shall vote for it; but if he has no proposition to offer better than mine, I think I may claim from the candor and the patriotism of the Senator that he shall vote for mine.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, one or two remarks have fallen from the honorable member from Massachusetts that I deem it my duty to attempt to reply to, more especially as they were, perhaps, not anticipated in the debate in which I participated on Thursday.

So far as concerns the very positive manner in which the honorable member from Massachusetts expresses his opinion, I have nothing to say except that that is a matter of taste. It is, perhaps, not very good taste to be so wedded to his own opinion as to intimate that any other opinion is absurd. It is barely possible that there may be some two or three members of the Senate who entertain views different from the honorable member from Massachusetts, who are just as little likely to be wrong as the honorable member from Massachusetts, and who would be just as certain to see that any proposition was absurd as would be the case with the honorable member. I find no fault with him, however, Mr. President. It is a habit we sometimes indulge in. Sometimes it is the result of vanity, which is not his case, I am sure. Sometimes it is to be attributed to other causes. But whatever may be its origin, the honorable member will permit me to suggest to him that it is a habit which perhaps it would be better not to indulge in. It is calculated to provoke retort. As far as I am concerned, it is certainly not according to my views of self-respect; but my aim is studiously to avoid indulging in anything like acrimonious debate. I give to each member of the Senate the right, which is his, of having his own opinions and of courteously expressing them in just as strong language as he may think proper to indulge in, but not going beyond the limit of a gentlemanly senatorial courtesy. I have no idea that the Senator from Massachusetts thinks he has transcended, now or at any other time, beyond such a limit; but it is dangerous to indulge in very decided observations of that sort, because the tendency is to go beyond the proper limit.

The country is now in a condition in which it has a right to expect beneficial results from the counsels of this body. The work before us is a mighty work. It involves the continuing existence of this nation. Upon it hangs, perhaps, the destiny of our institutions. It is not a time to indulge in personal epithets. It is not a time to seek to advance party, forgetting country. It is a time when it becomes us all, and I am sure that such is the general sense of the Senate, to look exclusively to the interest of the country, and to sacrifice every other interest that we may have, present or future, all our hopes of advancement in the future, if by doing so we can subserve the welfare of the country intrusted to us in part, and restore ourselves again to the prosperity and the power which once belonged to us.

Mr. President, I expressed my opinion on Thursday last, not dogmatically. I could not do so without warring against my own feelings. A different opinion had been expressed by the honorable member from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER], who addressed the Senate the day before; and I should have felt that I disgraced myself if I pretended to be dogmatical and discourteous by stating that my opinion must be right, and that an opinion sustained by the authority of the gentleman to whom I have just referred must necessarily be absurd. But I am bound to act upon my own opinion, and entertaining it conscientiously, I am obliged to yield to that conviction instead of yielding, as I should do in a matter which I had thought to be a question of doubt, to the authority of the honorable member from Vermont.

Now, Mr. President, there are two questions upon which I have but a single remark or two to make before ceasing to trouble the Senate at all in this debate. The first is, whether the act of July 2, 1862, embraces a Senator. The honorable member from Massachusetts bolsters up, or seeks to bolster up, his view of that question by referring us to the constitutions of the several States, and the laws of the several States which have been passed in pursuance of those constitutions—not a legitimate source of argument, as I think, as far as the particular question is concerned. The question before the Senate is, what is the meaning of the words "civil officer," as found in the Constitution of the United States, with reference to this question? That must be ascertained, as I humbly suggest to the honorable member from Massachusetts, by looking to the Constitution itself; nor is it to be ascertained by going to Webster, and coming from Webster the various significations that he attaches to the particular word. The interpretation of that word is in the Constitution. The Constitution is its own interpreter, and must be its own interpreter, unless we are willing to run the hazard of being wrong. The reason why, as I suppose, and those who agree with me have supposed heretofore, that the words "civil officer" do not embrace a Senator, as those words are used in this act of Congress, is, that a Senator is not an officer under the Government, but above the Government; he does not derive his authority from the Government, but from the creators of the Government; his commission comes from his State, and his State issues the commission to him under the authority of the Constitution. He is a part of the Government, and not an officer holding a commission or exercising any authority under the Government in the sense which this debate involves.

The honorable member from Massachusetts has appealed to the ancestor of the Senator from Delaware who is supposed to be more immediately involved in this question, for the purpose of showing that that very distinguished man, eminent every way, eminent for learning, eminent for native ability, and, what is better still, eminent for an undying and a spotless patriotism, who under the impulse of that patriotism saved the nation from convulsions sure to have been the result if he had not stepped in and by his refusal to vote succeeded in bringing about the election of Mr. Jefferson—the Senator from Massachusetts, with the industry which distinguishes him, and for which he is entitled to all possible credit, has referred us to the speech of that honorable gentleman in the case of Blount, he having been one of the managers of the impeachment, and the Senator has incorporated into his speech, which will be published, a considerable portion of the argument of Mr. Bayard; but it is a little extraordinary that it escaped his attention that there was another part of that speech, which so far from affirming his own doctrine is directly adverse to it. The language of this oath act is: "That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States" shall take the oath. Now, what did Mr. Bayard think, if we are to be governed by his authority, was the meaning of the words "under the Government of the United States" as applied to a Senator or a Representative? In his view was a Senator an officer under the Government of the United States? Let him speak for himself:

"There is another objection," says Mr. Bayard—I read from his speech on that impeachment—

"There is another objection of a similar nature, arising from the provision in the sixth section of the first article, of which it is probable much use will be made. That section declares that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. It will, therefore, be said, if the place of a Senator is an office, this clause is repugnant and absurd.

"This provision, I humbly apprehend, has the same limits with the one which I have just adverted to. The intention of it was to erect a barrier between the executive and legislative departments, to prevent executive patronage from influencing legislative councils. It was designed, therefore, to apply solely to the officers of executive appointment. I am not much disposed, sir, to place reliance, in an argument upon so great a subject, upon nice distinctions or verbal criticism; but I think I shall be excused for paying some attention to the peculiar language of the clause in question. The regulation is that no person holding an office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. The United States here means the Government of the United States, for the United States grants no office but through the Government. Now, it is clear that a Senator is not an officer under the Government. The Government consists of the President, the Senate, and House of Representatives, and they who constitute the Government cannot be said to be under it."

In anticipation, therefore, Mr. President, as yourself and the Senators will discover, as far as the critical meaning of the terms to be found in this act is involved, the authority of Mr. Bayard is directly in conflict with the opinion so confidently expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts upon his authority.

But a word more. The honorable member from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] suggests—and I have no doubt he is right provided the law applies to Senators—that it is unnecessary to adopt the rule provided the end can be accomplished without it, and that the end can be accomplished by some one's moving, and the Senate's supporting the objection, that the Senator from Delaware, the only Senator, I believe, who has not taken this oath, when his name is called shall not be recognized. I have no doubt that the honorable member from Ohio is right. You have the same power over a Senator who refuses to take this oath that you would have over a Senator who refused to take the constitutional oath; and what power is that? Not to recognize him; to say that he is not qualified. If, therefore, in point of law, the passage of the act of July 2, 1862, was a constitutional exercise of power on the part of the legislature, and binds Senators as well as all other officers of the Government, then his refusing to take the oath renders him subject precisely to the same treatment to which he would have been subject or would be subject now if he refused to take the oath prescribed by the Constitution. Therefore, those of the body who, very honestly I doubt not, entertain the opinion that a Senator is included within the meaning of that act, (the member from Ohio, as he says, being one of them,) need no rule except for the purpose suggested by my friend from Vermont to which I shall refer in a moment—they need no rule to enforce the object of that statute. The object is, and such are the words if it applies to a Senator, that no Senator shall act at all until he takes the oath. If he declines to take that oath, then you tell him he cannot act; and if he perversely insists upon acting, what are you to do? Call your Sergeant-at-Arms to turn him out of the Chamber. I admit that, and let us see where that will place us.

The Constitution says that every Senator and member of the House of Representatives "shall be bound by oath or affirmation to support this Constitution." That is all it requires. Mr. BAYARD is here; he has taken the oath to support the Constitution. The honorable member from Vermont is clearly right in saying that the direction in the clause which I have just read that the oath to support the Constitution shall be taken, not prescribing the exact form of the oath, not pointing out the party by whom the oath shall be administered, or the place in which it shall be administered—these were all subjects for legislation; and Congress under that impression—passed the act of 1789; but even that act, strange as it may seem, was supposed at the time to be unconstitutional, as my friend from Vermont will discover if he reads the debates of that day.

Well, now, Mr. President, Mr. BAYARD has taken that oath—I name him, although it is not strictly parliamentary to do so; he is here with the commission of his State in his hand. He says he is a Senator. Looking to the Constitution, and looking to that alone, he is a Senator. He has done everything with reference to an oath that the framers of the Constitution thought to be necessary, and he has taken the oath prescribed, and precisely as prescribed, in the form which the framers of the Constitution, who for the most part constituted the Congress that passed the act of 1789, thought proper to prescribe. Suppose you had not passed this act of July 2, 1862; or suppose the act is inoperative without a rule, and you have not passed the rule, how are you to get rid of him? Only by expelling him. There is no other way. There are but two ways of getting rid of a Senator—one of them doubtful, and not existing, provided Blount's case is considered as an authority, and a conclusive authority; and the other is by expelling, under the authority given in the Constitution to each body to expel a member. How are you to expel him?

There were wise men, Mr. President, who lived in that day. My friend, the Senator from Vermont, has told us—and to a certain extent, no doubt, he is right—that there is perhaps throughout the country now as much general intelligence as there was then; there may not be as many great men as lived in those days, though some of us do not think that; but, sir, the Senator from Vermont is not to be told that public opinion in every age of the civilized world has been fashioned into all that is great and noble and virtuous by the great men of the day, those high intellects that are the first to catch and reflect the dawn while the levels below are still in darkness. The illumination comes, but it comes by the reflection; and I believe, as firmly as I believe in my own existence, that if it had not been that some of those towering intellects were to be found among the members of the Convention by whom this Constitution was submitted to the American people, it never would have been submitted. They rose above party; they rose above section; they looked to the country at large; they recollected how they had all gone through the terrors of the revolutionary struggle shoulder to shoulder, their blood commingling together upon almost every battle-field, and they determined that liberty so achieved should not be lost by stubborn adherence to individual or sectional opinion. I am sure the same patriotism animates us; and I trust in God the time is still when, under the inspiration of the patriotism that they taught us, we will show to the public whom we are equally bound to represent, that in our hands the destinies of the country are as safe as they were in the hands of the men of 1789. But they saw, and every age that we have lived since whenever party excitement has been raging has shown that they correctly foresaw, the great necessity of guarding the legislature and every member of the legislature against the deleterious influence of such excitement, which is sure from its very nature to be carried to an extreme; and they therefore provided that no Senator or Representative should be expelled by a vote of less than two thirds. Now, what are you about to do? You are about to break down that guarantee of the independence of the legislature; you are about to submit this Senate above all to the influence of the passions of the hour, in every republic known, in the history of every people whose history we have, so great sometimes as to deaden reason and often to lead to bloodshed and slaughter. Now, what are you about to do? Our fathers told us that every Senator who takes the oath to support the Constitution shall have his seat secured in this body against the power of the body to get rid of him, by the security furnished by the provision that he shall remain here unless two thirds of the body expel him.

My friend from Vermont, he from Massachusetts, and one whom I hold in equal esteem, the honorable member from Michigan, [Mr. HOWARD,] talked about an unwillingness to receive back into this body men who have crimsoned their hands with the blood of the loyal citizens. My honorable friend from Michigan, acting under the impulse of patriotism, which is a part of his own nature, intimated that he would see every dollar of the treasure of the loyal States expended and every human life sacrificed rather than come into association with men of that description. Mr. President, patriotism may run wild, as well as every other virtue. To be beneficial, it must be restrained; it must try to restrain itself; it must be taught by its cooler judgment; and I put it to the humane heart of the honorable member from Michigan, to which I know an appeal never can be made in vain, if he would really sacrifice the interest of the loyal States, the safety of the loyal States, the peace of the loyal States, their reputation in the eyes of Christendom, by making this a war of subjugation or annihilation. I am sure he would not in his cooler moments. If the South is willing to return—I do not mean the leaders; if captured they should be tried and convicted, and execution should follow to a large extent; but you cannot try and convict and execute four or five or six million people. That is impossible; and if you could do it who would be left? The white race in the southern States annihilated; the slaves alone protected; a nation of Africans instead of a nation of white men! I wish not to be misunderstood. If necessary to put down the rebellion, to reinstate the authority of the Government, I would go as far as he who is disposed to go farthest, and say that anything and everything must be attempted that proves to be necessary; but in my humble judgment that is not the condition in which, as I think, we are now involved.

Mr. President, there is another view. I suppose every one will admit who looks to the language of the Constitution that the framers of the Constitution intended—I put it to my friend from Vermont—to exact the same security of officers of the State governments that they deemed it necessary to exact of officers of their own Government. They believed that the oath which they prescribed was necessary; and they believed, as I think, that it was the only oath necessary. One thing is certain: no one can deny that whether they deemed it proper to exact any other form of oath than that which is contained in the clause which I have just read, they thought that the same oath which was deemed necessary to insure a faithful execution of the post of Senator or Representative should be taken by every representative in a State Legislature. Read the language: "The Senators and Representatives before mentioned, and the members of the several State Legislatures, and all executive and judicial officers, both of the United States and of the several States, shall be bound by oath or affirmation, to support this Constitution."

Now, will anybody pretend that the act of July 2, 1862, includes members of the State Legislatures and State judicial officers? Will anybody pretend that it could constitutionally include them? If not, then we are certainly in a condition that the framers of the Constitution never contemplated. They evidently looked to the necessity of having one form of oath binding the consciences of members of the State Legislatures and judicial officers by the same obligations as they deemed it necessary to impose upon members of Congress of either branch, and for very good reasons. From the peculiar frame of the Government, the large mass of powers was necessarily left with the States. Almost all the transactions of private life were left to the States. Inhibitions were placed upon the Congress of the United States to interfere at all with the legislation of the States in some particulars. But they saw very well that unless they could secure the conscience of the State legislators and State judicial officers in the same way in which they could secure or profess to secure the consciences of their own officers, there would not be harmony. They were wise enough to see, what experience has proved, that difficulties, contrarieties of opinion, conflicts of authority were sure to be the result of the State governments and the Government of the United States; and they therefore bound the officers of the State governments to take that oath; and they reserved to themselves, as has long since been settled, the right by legislation to bring up all questions involving the authority of the United States, upon which the judicial opinions of the State courts had been passed, to the Supreme Court of the United States in order to require uniformity and to pro-

fect the authority of the United States. Now you say by this oath, provided it includes Senators, that the oath which the Constitution prescribes is no security at all, or rather a lame and impotent security. Why? It is not because the man who takes it is not bound to support the Constitution, for he so swears in so many words. Why then is the oath not as good now as it was when it was first prescribed? The answer is, a state of things exists now which did not exist then; rebellion has reared its horrid form; an effort is made at the life of the nation; the obligations of the Constitution are forgotten and violated. Where? Not by us; we are not doing it; nor has the honorable member from Delaware done it, because he says there is nothing in this oath that he cannot take. Where has it been done? It has been done in these seceded States. Well, they are to come back; and when they come back they are to come back as States; at least, I assume that to be the result. Their State Legislatures will convene as State Legislatures under the Constitution of the United States, bound to yield obedience to it; their judicial officers will recognize their allegiance which nothing but treason would have broken; and you receive them, you are bound to receive them unless they are to be considered as traitors; I will not argue that question; but on my hypothesis you are bound to receive them. South Carolina, then, and Georgia and these other States are again in the Union as they were before, not bound by this oath of ours. How do you know they will not break loose again? How do you know that the contamination of their treason is not still within their bones, that the disease will break out whenever they can make the occasion? How can you know it? Yet if the existence of the disease so to speak renders it improper that any man having it should be a member of the Senate because it would endanger the integrity and the existence of the Senate, and of the nation as far as the Senate can injure the nation, if you will not have him, how are you to get the same security in the State Legislatures and the State judiciary? Not under this Constitution. Dissolve the States; consider them as constituting but one mass of people and the territory as but one territory separated by no line except such lines as Congress may think proper hereafter to designate; abrogate the State constitutions; and not only that, but change the Constitution of the United States and prescribe that members of the State Legislatures and their judicial officers shall take this additional oath, or you will have them back without the security which, according to the hypothesis upon which this act is passed, is supposed to be absolutely necessary in order to preserve the Government in its purity.

I forbear further to trouble the Senate, Mr. President, and I should not have said a word but for a remark or two which fell from the honorable member from Massachusetts; and I am induced to speak in reply to a part of his argument, merely because what he has said to the Senate has been carefully considered in his closet, and reduced to writing (as he had a perfect right to do to guard himself against error) as the result of his mature deliberation of each one of the questions involved. I conclude with saying that, in my judgment, in the first place, the statute of July 2, 1862, did not embrace Senators; and, in the second place, that if it did, there was no power in Congress by legislation so to embrace them.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] seems to suppose that this law has remained unexecuted. The fact is that there is but one of the newly elected Senators in this body who has not taken this oath; and that Senator is Mr. BAYARD from Delaware.

Mr. SUMNER. There is one other—Mr. RICHARDSON.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. RICHARDSON of Illinois, perhaps, has not taken the oath. The Senator then puts to me the question, "if my rule will not reach this case where the law has remained unexecuted, will the Senator from Wisconsin point out the way in which to reach it?" Mr. President, the rule of the honorable Senator will not touch the case of Mr. BAYARD at all. The language of this rule is "that the oath or affirmation prescribed by act of Congress of July 2, 1862, to be taken before entering upon the duties of office, shall be taken and subscribed by every Senator in open Senate before entering upon his duties." That will not reach Mr. BAYARD's case. It will not reach the case of Mr. RICHARDSON either. How does the Senator from Massachusetts propose to reach, under this rule, the cases where, as he assumes, the law remains unexecuted?

Mr. SUMNER. Does the Senator wish an answer?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Senator may answer. Mr. SUMNER. The answer is simply by the enforcement of the rule.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That I supposed; but the rule has no application to that case, because Mr. BAYARD has appeared and has entered upon his duties as a Senator. The Senator's rule is now prospective, not retrospective, and does not touch the very case he is aiming at. The honorable Senator from Ohio and the honorable Senator from Maryland pointed out precisely the way in which this is to be reached. If the law which was passed in 1862 is a constitutional law, and a person is disqualified from exercising the duties of a Senator unless he takes that oath, the question can be raised on every vote he attempts to give in the Senate, just as if any other person not qualified at all for a seat in this body should appear here and take one of these seats and undertake to exercise its duties.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator understood me as saying that in my judgment this question could be raised on any vote, he misunderstood me. I suggested that mode; but there are difficulties made by parliamentary law, which, it seems to me, would prevent that mode from being effectual. No question can be raised while the roll is being called, and I have no doubt the Presiding Officer would overrule any such point. The only way in which it could be made would be by a resolution in the Senate directing the Secretary to strike from the roll the names of those who had not taken the oath. It could be done in that way and in no other.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But, Mr. President, here is another point in the case. If the law is defective because it has not specified the form in which this oath shall be taken nor where it shall be taken this body has no power by rule to add to it or modify it. If I, after having been elected to the Senate, had taken that oath of office and subscribed it before any officer under the laws of the United States authorized to administer oaths, and had put it in my pocket and brought it with me, I should have complied with the statute, and the Senate could not vary the law and compel me to do anything else by a rule.

Mr. President, it has very often been said, in the course of this debate, that the Senate, if it does not adopt this rule or something like it, is in danger of being overrun by rebels from the seceded States—men coming here with the blood of our children upon their hands. Have we forgotten Bright's case? Was not Bright a Senator from Indiana, and for writing a letter in which he addressed Jefferson Davis as "president of the confederate States" did not two thirds of this body expel him, because on the very face of his letter he seemed to acknowledge that there was a government called the government of the confederate States, and that Jefferson Davis was the president of that government? Have we no confidence in ourselves, no confidence in our successors? Sir, whether we adopt this rule or not, I have no fears that any of those leading men with the blood of our children upon their hands will ever come into this Senate Chamber or the other House of Congress. When the military power of the so-called confederate government is once broken, those leaders will call on the rocks and the mountains to hide them from the wrath of their people. That is as certain in my judgment as anything which has not yet transpired can be. They have so deceived, so abused, so misled their people to their own destruction that they will flee from them as they would from the "wrath to come."

I have no sympathy for the men engaged in this rebellion who lead it or sympathize with it; but I cannot blind myself to the fact, which I believe to be true, that there is a large mass of the people within the States where this rebellion exists who have been forced into the rebellion by force of arms in many instances, who have been misled in many others; and when the military power of the rebellion is once broken they will seek to return to their loyalty and to the Union of these States. I repeat, I can never have any sympathy for the men who have knowingly, willfully led that people into this rebellion. No punishment can be too great to be measured out to them for their crimes; and sometimes in my heart I bless God that I can believe there is a tribunal before which, if they do not receive their just deserts on earth, they will be called to render an account where fraud and perjury will be of no avail, and where they must answer for their crimes.

Sir, in reference to them I feel, and sometimes from my heart I am almost ready to express the sentiment avowed by a Universalist clergyman who resided in my town, in the State of Wisconsin. In the goodness of his heart he preached a thousand times to the people there that there is no such place as hell beyond the grave. He enlisted in the Army, and went as a chaplain in one of our regiments. He went into the rebellious States; he saw this rebellion and looked it naked in the face; and when he came home again, as he did to our people, in addressing them on this subject, and speaking of the crime greater than any other that had ever been committed on earth, by the leaders of this rebellion, he declared to them:

"Fellow-citizens, you know me; you know what my opinion has been; but I tell you I have come to believe in a hell as a military necessity. [Laughter.] There is a hell in my creed for these traitors."

That was his language.

I repeat, sir, I have no sympathy and can never have any sympathy with the men who have misled that people and who are imbruing their hands in the blood of our sons and our brothers; but for the great mass of that people who have been misled from their allegiance, who have been trampled under foot by military despotic power, to whom we as a Government owe protection, in whose States we as a Government are bound to maintain a republican form of government and to defend them against this very despotic power which is trampling them in the dust, I do feel and entertain sympathy, and I am not afraid or ashamed to acknowledge it here or elsewhere or every where. If in the providence of God the time shall come when we can break down the military power of this rebellion which holds these people captive in its chains, and we can once more let their hearts gush out in patriotic love to that Union which once protected them, which never oppressed them, which never exercised any influence over them but to bless them and to enrich them, and under circumstances like those they seek to return to their allegiance to this Government and to this Union, I shall not reject that allegiance nor prevent that return.

Mr. President, I agree with the gentlemen who have preceded me, that we are living in the midst of great events. I well remember when as a child I first read the story of the Revolution, of that grand old period which made men great—the story of the Declaration of Independence and the rights of man; the history of Washington and all his great compeers—the thought that oppressed my young mind was this: "Why was not I in the providence of God permitted to live at that epoch?" How little did I think that I should ever be permitted to live in the midst of events such as are now transpiring. Sir, we are not only spectators but actors in the grandest events of human history. The age in which we live, the whole civilized world, of which we are a part, are continually advancing under the influence of that spirit which above all others is the spirit of the age in which we live.

If we look across the Atlantic what have we seen in the old eastern division of the Roman empire of which Constantinople is the seat of power? We have seen England and France allied together in arms against Russia; and for what? To protect the political integrity of the Sultan. After the great battles of the Crimea the political integrity of Turkey was saved; but, sir, the soul of Turkey, the spirit of Moslemism, the very idea upon which that empire was founded and has been maintained for long centuries, the idea of that persecuting, fanatical, religious intolerance, is gone forever—not destroyed by the arms of Russia, but destroyed by that very alliance which saved the "sick man" from the jaws of the Russian bear. In February, 1856, before the allied forces were withdrawn from Constantinople, out of gratitude it may be to his Christian allies, the Turkish Sultan issued an imperial decree by which he established universal religious toleration throughout the whole of his great empire, admitting Jews and Christians to equal rights before the law with Mohammedans. What a grand revolution was that, sir, when the great American idea of free universal religious liberty, first applied to government in this country by Roger Williams of Rhode Island and William Penn of Pennsylvania, penetrated even into the dominions of the Sultan and revolutionized that empire! We have seen that bigoted persecuting spirit of religious intolerance, which is itself a child of hell, give way before that enlightened spirit of religious freedom, born of Christianity, and which is the essence of Christianity itself. We have seen this; and we have seen the Crescent bow to the Cross.

If we look into the western division of the old Roman empire, what have we witnessed transpiring there? We have seen the kingdom of Italy, composed of nearly twenty million people, born almost in a single day; and, adopting the other great American idea that governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed, we have seen the people of Italy by universal suffrage elect Victor Emanuel to be their king.

If we go beyond the old Roman empire into the dominions of Russia, which was never under the dominion of the Roman empire, what have we witnessed there? In that same year, in that same month, and almost on the very day that Mr. Lincoln stood on the steps of this Capitol and announced to the civilized world that the American people had decided in the last election that slavery had made its last conquest in America, that slavery should never go one foot further into the Territories of the Union, the Emperor of Russia announced to his assembled nobility his unalterable purpose to set free his serfs; and although that Government has sometimes, and perhaps properly, been regarded as the most absolute and despotic Government in Europe, true to his generous purpose, Alexander has emancipated over twenty-three millions of his serfs.

Mr. President, grand as are these events transpiring in the civilized world on the other side of the water, the revolution in the Mohammedan empire, the revolution in the seat of empire in old Italy, the great social and bloodless revolution in the empire of Russia, by which twenty-three million persons have had the chains broken from their arms in a single hour—great as are these events, we are witnessing, and are acting, too, in still grander events on this side of the ocean. The part we have to play is as important in the history of humanity as that of our great ancestors in the American Revolution. The doctrine which they then announced—the capacity of the people to maintain republican constitutional liberty and self-government—is now on trial. It is now enduring its first severe agonizing trial. In this controversy is involved all that they fought for, all that they held dear. In this struggle, if we succeed or fail, we involve with us in our success or failure the constitutional liberty of all mankind, white and black. We are all in the boat together. Therefore I believe that it is our duty, as representatives of the people, on this, as on all other occasions, to rise up to the full comprehension of the epoch in which we live. I believe we shall go through the struggle successfully. I believe that we shall come out of this struggle with slavery utterly done away with; that we shall be redeemed and regenerated as a people; and we shall stand hereafter, as we have stood heretofore, in the vanguard of the civilized nations, the Power of all other Powers on the earth. That is my faith and my belief.

But, sir, to return to the subject upon which this debate has sprung up, I submit that this resolution or rule of the Senator from Massachusetts can add no force whatever to the law. If the law is valid, his rule will not affect it. If it is invalid, it will not cure it. It cannot add to the law nor take from it, and, more than all, it does not apply to the very case he desires to reach. If the Senator will allow me to make a suggestion to him, I will suggest to him to do now precisely what he did on a former occasion after we had wasted a long time in debate, withdraw his proposition. He did it before; he can do it now. His resolution has no application to the case in hand, and can have no effect.

But, Mr. President, I perhaps owe it to the Senator from Massachusetts to say a single word further. That Senator and myself have always been upon terms of friendship and intimacy, and I beg him to understand that anything I said this morning did not grow out of any desire or wish on my part to wound his feelings. I, too, am a warm friend of the Senator from Vermont, and I thought I understood the Senator from Massachusetts, but perhaps I was mistaken.

Mr. SUMNER. Utterly mistaken.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I thought I understood the effect of his remarks to be a pretty severe criticism on the course of the honorable Senator from Vermont. I spoke at the time in the heat of the moment, and perhaps gave utterance to strong language; but certainly I did not intend to injure or wound in the slightest degree the feelings of the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. My colleague [Mr. HENDRICKS] was called to New York on important business, and I agreed to pair off with him on this question, unless my vote was necessary to make a quorum. I should vote for the rule and he would vote against it if present.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Conness, Dixon, Fessenden, Foster, Grimes, Hale, Harlan, Henderson, Howard, Lane of Kansas, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Ten Eyck, Trumbull, Van Winkle, Wade, Wilkinson, Wiley, and Wilson—28.

So the resolution was adopted.

I ask that the resolution be read, and that the report and resolution be laid on the table and ordered to be printed.

The resolution was reported, as follows:

The resolution and report were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

JOSEPH SEGAR.

Mr. DAWES, from the same committee, to whom were referred the credentials of Joseph Segar, claiming to be a Representative from the State of Virginia, made a report, accompanied by a resolution; which were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, That Joseph Segar is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative in the Thirty-Eighth Congress from the first district of Virginia.

Mr. UPSON. I desire to say that while I concur in the result expressed in the resolution, I do not agree to some of the statements contained in the report.

The SPEAKER proceeded, as the next business in order, to call the States for resolutions.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY.

Mr. ORTH introduced the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of organizing a department of Government to be denominated the Department of Industry, to embrace under its supervision and control a Bureau of Agriculture, a Bureau of Freedmen's Affairs, a Bureau of Mines, Minerals, and Mineral Lands, and a Bureau of Colonization and Immigration; and to report by bill or otherwise.

INCREASED PAY OF SOLDIERS.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted the following resolution, upon which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That the immediate increase in the pay of the private soldiers of the Army is imperatively demanded by every consideration of justice and sound public policy; that such increase is especially necessary and proper in behalf of those soldiers who entered the Army prior to the adoption of the present regulations as to bounties, and that the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to report a bill at the earliest practicable moment increasing the pay of the private soldiers to correspond substantially with the increase in the price of labor, and of all articles of domestic consumption since the pay of the private soldier was fixed at thirteen dollars per month.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to change his resolution into one of inquiry.

Mr. HOLMAN. After so much delay, I think it proper that there should be a definite expression on the part of the House upon this subject. If the pay of our soldiers is to be increased it is time it were done. The subject has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs several times as a matter of inquiry. Such resolutions have produced no result. The adoption of an imperative resolution can alone be effective. If gentlemen favor an increase of the pay of the private soldiers of our Army, an imperative instruction must be adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the resolution go over if debate arises on it?

The SPEAKER. It does not; the previous question is demanded.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope it will not be sustained.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 55, noes 59.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STEVENS and HOLMAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 56, noes 65.

So the House refused to second the demand for the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move that the resolution lie upon the table, and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the pending motion?

The SPEAKER. That the resolution lie upon the table, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does that motion come from the other side of the House?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir; it comes from a gentleman who intends to vote against his own motion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, I, for one, intend to vote against the motion.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yea 1, nays 141; as follows:

YEA—Mr. McBride—1.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, Baily, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Dennison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Elliot, Finck, Frank, Ganson, Gooch, Grider, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Higby, Holman, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel H. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Keran, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Longyear, Marcy, Marvin, McClurg, McDowell, McIndoe, McKinney, Samuel F. Miller, William H. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Leonard Myers, Nelson, Noble, Norton, Orth, Pendleton, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, Prunty, Badford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Edward H. Rollins, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Scott, Shannon, Smith, Smathers, Spalding, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stevens, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, Fernando Wood, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—141.

So the House refused to lay the resolution upon the table.

During the roll-call,

Mr. L. MYERS stated that Mr. O'NEILL, of Pennsylvania, had paired off for the day with Mr. Cox.

Mr. DENNISON stated that his colleague, Mr. ARONA, was detained from the House in consequence of sickness in his family.

The result of the vote having been announced as above recorded, the question recurred on Mr. STEVENS's motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HOLMAN. If the resolution is referred to the Committee on Military Affairs under this motion, does it go there as an imperative instruction, or is it discretionary with the committee whether they will report the bill or not?

The SPEAKER. The resolution being imperative, has no force unless it be adopted by the House. If referred to the committee, it would merely be a matter for inquiry.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Elliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel H. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hubard, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Orlando Kellogg, Longyear, Marvin, McIndoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Leonard Myers, Norton, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, James S. Rollins, Scofield, Shannon, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Tracy, Upson, Van Valkenburgh, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, and Windom—73.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanler, Cravens, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Griswold, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Hutchins, Kallbelsch, Keran, King, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Malloy, Marcy, McClurg, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, James R. Morris, Morrison, Amos Myers, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Prunty, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Robinson, Ross, Scott, Smith, Stebbins, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Sweat, Thomas, Voorhees, Wadsworth, Whaley, Wheeler, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—66.

So the bill was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

During the roll-call,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, stated that Mr. LOVEJOY was detained at his residence by indisposition.

Mr. COBB stated that his colleague, Mr. SLOAN, was still detained from the House by serious illness in his family.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, House bill No. 65, to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes.

MILITARY ARRESTS, ETC.

Mr. McDOWELL offered the following series of resolutions, and moved the previous question on their adoption:

Resolved, 1. That this House fully recognizes the great fundamental provision of the Constitution of the United States which guarantees the freedom of speech to every American citizen; and that neither the President, nor any person acting in a subordinate capacity to him, has the right of authority to arrest and imprison a citizen of the loyal States for the utterance of sentiments distasteful to the men in power.

2. That we recognize in the FREEDOM OF THE PRESS the great bulwark of civil liberty; and that those persons temporarily entrusted with power have not the rightful authority, in those States not in rebellion, to subvert this great constitutional guarantee by issuing military orders, or by a resort to any other means unknown to the laws of the country.

3. That the right to security of person from arrest, in the loyal States, when no crime is charged, is a sacred right guaranteed to every citizen; and that neither the President, nor any one acting by his authority, has the legal right to arrest, imprison, or transport our people without "due process of law," requiring affidavit, warrant, arrest and trial by a jury of the country impartially selected.

4. That the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus is a fundamental and inherent right belonging to the American people, solemnly guaranteed by express provision of the Constitution, that cannot be denied to the citizens of the loyal States, where the courts are open and the administration of justice unobstructed, and "invasion and rebellion" do not exist.

5. That the Constitution of the United States is one of expressed and limited powers, and that neither Congress nor the Executive have the "lawful right" to interfere with the established rights and domestic institutions of the several States.

6. That we reaffirm our unalterable devotion to the Constitution of the United States, and to each and every provision thereof, as framed by the fathers, including those provisions relating to the rights of property and the inviolability of contracts, as understood and interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. McDOWELL demanded tellers on the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. McDOWELL, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 65.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I propose to debate the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. The resolutions go over under the rule.

PEACE RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. EDGERTON offered the following resolutions, and demanded the previous question on their adoption:

Whereas this House on the 17th day of December last adopted, with but one dissentient vote, the following resolution, to wit: "Resolved, That we hold it to be the duty of Congress to pass all necessary bills to supply men and money, and the duty of the people to render every aid in their power to the constituted authorities of the Government in the crushing out of the rebellion, and in bringing the leaders thereof to condign punishment;" Therefore, in explanation of the foregoing resolution, and in further expression of the opinion and purpose of this House,

Resolved, That the aid hitherto liberally supplied in men and money, by the people of the United States, to enable the Federal Executive to prosecute the existing civil war, has been so supplied, by all citizens truly faithful to the Federal Union and Constitution, for the purpose, and no other, expressed in the resolution adopted by Congress in July, 1861, declarative of the object of the war, and commonly known as "the Crittenden resolution;" and public faith, true Christian humanity, and wise statesmanship alike demand strict adherence by "the constituted authorities of the Government" to the purpose or object of the war as thus declared by Congress and accepted by the people.

Resolved, That the demand of the President, in his proclamation of December 8, 1863, that the people of the States wherein rebellion exists shall swear to abide by and support his proclamations of emancipation (in other words, change, or submit to the change, at his dictation, of their State constitutions, local laws, and domestic institutions, not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States) before such States or their people will by him be considered to have ceased to be in rebellion, and entitled to pardon or amnesty, and entitled to their constitutional rights of State government, in harmony with the Government of the United States, is, in the judgment of this House, an oppressive and unconstitutional demand, the tendency and effect of which, if persisted in and enforced by war, will be to substantially change the object and character of the war on the part of the Federal Government, from one to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States as the supreme law of the land, to a revolutionary war against the constitutional rights and sovereignty of Federal States, and virtually subversive of the constitutional Government of the United States, and of such a war we now record our disapproval.

Resolved, That in view of the immense power of war demanded by the President and supplied to him by a patriotic people, and hitherto wielded by him according to his own will, with little deference or regard to the opinions and convictions of the very large number, if not majority, of faithful Union citizens in the United States who have doubted or disapproved his policy in the conduct of the war and his extraordinary assumption of executive power, and in view of the dangers to constitutional liberty and the manifold evils that ever attend civil war, we desire peace and the replacement under its healthful and benign influence, with the least possible further waste of the blood and treasure of the people, of all the relations and functions of constitutional Government, State and Federal, now disturbed and endangered; and we therefore deprecate all vindictive and revolutionary measures and policy, military or civil, as tending to divide the Union men of the country, to aggravate the evils and to intensify the animosity of the war and prolong its duration, and we advise, and do cordially invite, and pledge our cooperation in negotiations, proposals, and efforts for peace upon the basis of a restoration of the Federal Union under the Constitution as it is, leaving to the free constitutional action of the people the questions of amendments of the Federal Constitution, and leaving also to the people of each State, as their unquestionable right, the right, and its free exercise, to form, regulate, and control their State constitutions, laws, and domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move that the resolutions be laid upon the table.

Mr. HOLMAN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to withdraw his motion and let the resolutions go to the committee appointed on that subject.

Mr. ARNOLD. At the suggestion of the gentleman from New York I withdraw the motion. The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. ARNOLD. I propose to debate the resolutions.

The SPEAKER. Then they go over, under the rule.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

THE GRADE OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

Mr. FARNSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute, House bill No. 26, reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army.

The substitute revives, section one, the grade of lieutenant general in the Army of the United States, and authorizes the President, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the Army, to be selected, during war, from among those officers in the military service of the United States not below the grade of major general who are most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability, and who shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States. By the second section the lieutenant general so appointed is to be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff described in the act of 28th May, 1798; also to the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August 23, 1842; provided that nothing in the bill shall be construed to affect in any way the rank, pay, and allowances of Winfield Scott, lieutenant general by brevet, now on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to ask the gentleman who reported the bill whether it is essential that there should be limitation as to the persons from whom the selection is to be made—whether the President should not have power to select from any rank he may think proper?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The limitation in the bill is that the lieutenant general shall be appointed from among officers of the Army most distinguished, not below the grade of major general.

Mr. STEVENS. But why should that be, if the President can find a better man below that grade?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The supposition is that the best men for the position are to be found in the grade of major generals. Promotions in the Army are supposed to be based on merit.

Mr. STEVENS. How much do the pay and emoluments of a major general amount to?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think the pay and emoluments of a major general are a little above $400 a month. The pay of Lieutenant General Scott is about $720 a month, including all allowances.

Mr. STEVENS. If I recollect the act of last Congress, it authorized the President to appoint anybody commander-in-chief, without regard to grade. Am I right?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think not. The law provides that the President may designate a commander of a department, or a commander-in-chief of the Army, but he must be of an equal grade. That is, he cannot place a brigadier general over a major general; but he may place a junior brigadier general or a junior major general over his seniors of the same grade.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to ask my colleague a question. I would like him to tell the House whether the bill which has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs restricts the President, in making the appointment, to the major generals of the regular Army? May he select from major generals in command of volunteers?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. He may select from either the regular or the volunteer forces. I have no disposition to discuss this matter further; and if other gentlemen do not wish to speak to it I will call for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. Has the amendment ever been printed?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Of course not. The bill and the amendment are both brief.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does not the gentleman propose to have them printed?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. No, sir.

Mr. PENDLETON. Is it not extraordinary that there should be action called on a matter of such importance without permitting us to hear what the amendment is more than by hearing it read from the Clerk's desk?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The amendment is a small one; we struck out one or two words and inserted others. The amendments of the original bill were rather informal.

Mr. PENDLETON. Has the original bill been printed?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I think that it was not ordered to be printed. It was introduced at an early day, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. PENDLETON. If it was introduced at an early day it ought to have been printed.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I call for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until this day week.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order during the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope that the gentleman will withdraw his demand for the previous question, so that the matter may be postponed to a day certain.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I should rather not do that.

On seconding the demand for the previous question there were, on a division—ayes 50, noes 60.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FARNSWORTH and PENDLETON were appointed.

The call for the previous question was not seconded, the tellers having reported—ayes 58, noes 66.

Mr. PENDLETON. I now move that the further consideration of the subject be postponed until after the morning hour on Monday next, and that the bill and amendment be printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. If that motion be voted down, will not the bill and amendment be up for action?

The SPEAKER. That will be the result.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that the motion to postpone will not be agreed to.

Mr. PENDLETON. We only want time to have the bill and amendment printed, so that we may examine it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope that this will be considered a test vote.

Mr. PENDLETON. You cannot make it a test vote.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Bally, Augustus C. Baldwin, Jacob B. Blair, Brooks, James S. Brown, William G. Brown, Chanler, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Edson, Ederston, Eldridge, Flinn, Ganss, Garfield, Grider, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. So the motion to postpone was agreed to.

During the vote,

Mr. DEMING stated that his colleague, Mr. ENGLISH, had been called home by sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. PENDLETON moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found correctly enrolled a bill (H. R. No. 65) to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes; when the Speaker signed the same.

GENERAL M'CLELLAN'S REPORT.

Mr. PRUYN asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That fifty thousand additional copies of General McClellan's report be printed for the use of this House.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, objected.

EMANCIPATION IN KENTUCKY.

Mr. ANDERSON asked unanimous consent to introduce the following resolution:

Whereas the President of the United States has heretofore recommended that Congress make an appropriation to compensate the loyal owners of slaves in the State of Kentucky in the event the people of that State should adopt a system of emancipation; and whereas the Legislature of that State is now in session, and it is believed the institution of slavery in said State has become so endangered and precarious in consequence of the present war, forced on the Government of the United States by the disunionists and traitors of the South, that it would be to the interest of the people of Kentucky to accept compensated emancipation: Therefore,

Resolved, That the committee on emancipation be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for compensation to loyal owners of slaves in said State, in the event a system of emancipation be adopted by the people thereof; and that said committee report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN objected.

ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back the Senate amendment to the enrollment act with a substitute; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that it be made the special order for Wednesday next.

Mr. STILES objected.

Mr. SCHENCK moved that the rules be suspended for the purpose indicated, and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 92, nays 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alley, Allison, Ames, Anderson, Arnold, Ashley, Baily, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. Clark, Freeman Clarke, Cobb, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Briggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Fenton, Frank, Garfield, Gooch, Grinnell, Hale, Charles M. Harris, Higby, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburt, Hutchins, Jenekes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Francis W. Kellogg, Orlando Kellogg, King, Longyear, Marvin, McClure, Meludoe, Samuel F. Miller, Morrill, Daniel Morris, Amos Myer, Leonard Myers, Norton, John O'Neill, Orth, Patterson, Perlman, Pike, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Rollins, Schenck, Seofield, Shannon, Smith, Smithers, Spalding, Stevens, Thayer, Thomas, Tracy, Upson, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Yeman—92.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Brooks, James S. Brown, Chanter, Clay, Colford, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Fluck, Ganson, Grider, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Harris, Horlick, Holman, Kalbfleisch, Kernan, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, McDowell, McKinney, James R. Morris, Morrison, Noble, Pendleton, Proyn, Radford, Robinson, James S. Rollins, Ross, Scott, Stobbs, John B. Steele, William G. Steele, Stiles, Stuart, Voorhees, Vawter, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, Benjamin Wood, and Fernando Wood—54.

So the rules were not suspended; and three thirds not voting in favor thereof.

DAKOTA CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. DAWES presented certain papers in the Dakota contested-election case; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew my motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1863, which had been previously made the special order for this day.

The bill was read in extenso.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill clause by clause for amendments.

The first section having been read—

Mr. BROOKS said: I wish to call the attention of the committee for a short time to many of the recommendations for appropriations contained in this deficiency bill. I sometimes regret that in the assignment of seats here it has so resulted that I am upon the outskirts of Democratic civilization, and not upon the other side, that I might obtain a better hearing from them; for it is no use to address the Democratic party in the House, as they are utterly powerless here. But it is of the highest importance to the country that gentlemen upon the other side of the House should give bills of this character their attention.

I know I am far behind this age, and that it is utterly impossible to keep up with the progress of it unless one runs wild. I was educated in the olden school with another class of men, when, in the reporters' galleries of this House or a member upon the floor of the House, we were all taught to look upon deficiency bills with great distrust, and to scan them with the severest scrutiny. When I first entered the Halls of Congress, a deficiency bill of $25,000 was calculated to create excitement and no inconsiderable alarm. And when, pending the Mexican war, a deficiency bill of $350,000 was introduced into this House there was an extraordinary excitement and an extraordinary debate, which is fully recorded in the Journals of Congress. But here to-day we have a deficiency of over five million dollars, it may be more. I have had no time to make a full calculation, but I think the sum approaches five million dollars.

I know gentlemen upon the other side will tell me that this is an era of rebellion; that this sum is extraordinarily large, belonging to an extraordinary era, and that therefore it is impossible for the Administration of the Government to have that prospective view of public affairs which will enable it absolutely to foresee what will be the expenditures of this Government. I have only this to say, that pending the war of 1812 with the powerful empire of Great Britain, there were no such deficiency bills. Pending the Mexican war there were no such deficiency bills. I give large credit and large credence to the argument of the other side that in the progress of a civil war it is impossible for the Administration, even now in the third year of the war, to foresee what was likely to be the expenditure of the Government, but it is possible to foresee something.

What I mainly object to in the deficiency bill is the creation of offices without the authority of law; the acceptance and indorsement of offices created without law; the creation of offices wholly unknown to the statute-book; and to appropriations in a deficiency bill of large sums of money to pay them. Here in this bill are four hundred and fifty clerks created in the departments of the Government at the other end of the avenue. I know many of them are necessary; perhaps they are all necessary; and I do not intend to make any decided opposition to the appropriations for them; but I do say it was the duty of the Administration, and it was the part of wisdom in the men administering this Government, to have foreseen the necessity of these disbursements and the necessity for these clerks in the estimates of last Congress, and to have called upon this House for the necessary appropriations. But here is recommended the creation of four hundred and forty or four hundred and fifty clerks who have been serving for from six months to a year in the departments in their respective offices, to whom we now owe debts, and to whom if not we, at least the Administration is under the necessity of providing the proper mode and means of payment.

I mean to say further, it is the duty of the Administration now, in the second and third years of the war, to comprehend its magnitude and expense, and to make the necessary estimates in advance, and not appear here with an enormous deficiency like this. The extent of the war was as well known two years ago as it is now; and its disbursements were as well known; the necessity for these clerks was as well known. These offices have been created without authority of law, and there is imposed upon Congress, in the exercise of its legislative duties, the necessity of making an appropriation for their support.

There are in this bill the most extraordinary estimates which we have ever seen in any deficiency bill within the whole range of my congressional experience. Here are deficiencies for buildings, deficiencies for fences, deficiencies for furniture, deficiencies for carpets, also for lithographing and engravings, and many other articles too numerous to mention. What I mean to say upon this subject is, that when the regular appropriations run out for fences, for grading, for carpeting, for furniture, &c., it is the duty of the Administration to stop its expenditure, and await an appropriation by Congress before it disburses any other money. It can wait, as other people are obliged to wait, for their comforts and their conveniences and their luxuries, without taking the law into its own hands and appropriating money out of the Treasury, and then calling upon the legislative department of the Government to make the necessary appropriations.

There is created by this bill a foreign mission. The subject was alluded to the other day, but it did not at the moment attract my attention or the attention of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and the matter was not fully and fairly met. But here is an appropriation for a minister to San Salvador, who is recognized by this deficiency bill, the office being created without any authority of law whatever. This is the appointment of a minister to an inconsiderable power; it is the creation of an office for the benefit of an office-holder; the appointment of a minister to a foreign Power which has not in population, in magnitude, or in wealth, anything like the importance of many of the wards of Philadelphia, New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago. And yet here is the creation by the State Department of a foreign mission to San Salvador without the least authority of law, and we are called upon here in this bill to make a deficiency appropriation for that purpose. I appeal to gentlemen upon the other side of the House, I appeal to them in sincerity and truth, to resist this thing. If I were one of them and among them, if I belonged to their party, I never would (as I never have with any party, here or elsewhere) sanction these assumptions by the executive authorities of the country.

I will call the attention of the House to other subjects connected with the deficiency bill. I wish to disabuse, if possible, gentlemen from the prepossessions and prejudices in their minds. This I take it is no mere party measure. I stand upon the floor of this House almost solitary and alone. [Cries of "no," from Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri, and others.] I am an old-line Whig, and nothing but an old-line Whig. For the last twenty-five or thirty years I have resisted the exercise of all executive authority, of all executive assumption whatever, and there are scores of gentlemen upon the other side of the House who, in the better days of this Republic, have stood side by side with me in resistance to executive power and executive assumptions in deficiency bills, or bills of any character like this which is now before us.

I desire to maintain and support the Administration in the vigorous prosecution of this war for constitutional purposes, and all my efforts have been so directed and shall be so directed. But this House, this Congress, holds the Treasury of the Government, and it has a right in its disbursements to insist upon an economical and prudent administration of public affairs. There is not now such an administration of our public affairs. Many of the departments of the Government are utterly corrupt, and known to be so, and their corruption has attracted the attention of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, and it is to their credit and to their honor that they have ordered an investigation into some subjects; but they themselves have no idea of the depth of corruption by which they are surrounded. The Treasury Department, in its heart and core, in its highest and heartiest pulsations, in the manufacture of the public money, the public bills, the public credits, is rotten and cannot stand investigation. One of the men in that Department has been arrested for matching and patching torn or destroyed public money. Another, Dr. Gwynn, is in the Old Capitol prison; and the man who is now at the head of that department stands charged upon the records of this House by a Republican committee with having fraudulently reported to this Government upon the construction of public buildings heretofore. The man to whom I refer is Spencer M. Clark. That man, who has now the control of the public money, stands recorded in a public document here, issued in 1862 by a Republican committee of the House of Representatives, as having cheated and defrauded the Government as the then architect for one of the public buildings. I will make no comment on the subject, but I avail myself of this opportunity to call the attention of Republican gentlemen to the official document. I will ask the Clerk to read the record which was made in 1862 by a Republican committee of the House, and I ask them to bear in mind that of this man's associates one is in prison and the other ought to be if the public record is true.

Mr. GRINNELL. Will the gentleman from

New York allow me to ask him a question? It is whether the Superintendent of Public Printing does not receive a salary, and has not anything to do with these contracts?

Mr. BROOKS. My worthy friend is far behind the age. The Superintendent of Public Printing, he who prints the public documents, is a printer of the olden style; but there is a new public printer installed at the other end of the avenue to coin money.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am simply trying to catch up, if possible, with the gentleman.

Mr. BROOKS. We are both old fogies [laughter]—both behind the age.

Mr. GRINNELL. I know that, and I was afraid I would not be able to get on without getting hold of the gentleman's coat-tails. I understand that there is the same public printer for both Houses.

Mr. BROOKS. The public printer prints the public documents; but the printer of the public money is ensconced with his types, with his engravings, with his laborers in the Treasury building, and has there converted the power of the Constitution—which is to coin money—into coining paper, coining Treasury notes, coining shimplasters, or sticking plasters as in olden time they used to be called.

Mr. GRINNELL. Do I understand that the public printer is engaged in manufacturing money?

Mr. BROOKS. There are two public printers. Will the gentleman understand that? One public printer is Mr. Defrees, who prints the public documents. I do not refer to him in any respect whatever.

Mr. GRINNELL. I thought that the paper proposed to be read had reference to Mr. Defrees.

Mr. BROOKS. No, not to Mr. Defrees. I believe he is an honest man, as an old printer ought to be. I refer to that adventurer, that gentleman who first turns up as an architect of public buildings, and who is now printer, in the Treasury Department, of Treasury notes and Treasury bonds, and five, ten, twenty-five, and fifty-cent pieces of the public money. That is the public printer to whom I refer. Now, will the Clerk read the extract that I send up?

The Clerk read from the report of the Committee on Expenditures on Public Buildings to the House of Representatives at the Thirty-Seventh Congress, as follows:

"For evidence of the extravagant expenditures of public money under the Bureau of Construction, as now and heretofore organized, we refer to the testimony in relation to the Charleston custom-house and the Treasury extension. A single item relating to the former will illustrate the system by which a building about one hundred and fifty feet long by one hundred and twenty feet wide from outside to outside of the columns, and carried some forty-five or fifty feet above the ground, entirely unfinished, roofless and bare, has already cost the Government over two million dollars, and half a million more asked for by the acting engineer, without any intimation that it will do anything more than 'continue the work.' At Hastings, New York, Edward Learned & Co. carry on the business of quarrying and cutting marble. A contract was made with them for the marble of the Charleston custom-house—a contract so indefinite and confused that any construction could be put upon it, even the style of architecture being named, and the material being changed from granite to marble after a previous contract had been made with the same parties. In January, 1861, after South Carolina had seceded, Learned & Co. notified the Treasury Department that they had certain material on hand, and claimed inspection and payment under a clause of the contract. Mr. Clark, the acting engineer in charge, to whom the matter was referred by Secretary Dix, whose letter we herewith submit, went to Hastings and returned with a schedule of material there to the amount of $43,061 60, which he and Mr. Young, the supervising architect, reported to be correct, and the sum of $32,386 20, or seventy-five per cent. on the whole amount, was paid out on it; that is to say, $28,382 70 in cash, and $3,913 50 allowed by the contractors for a previous overpayment. Mr. Clark, in a letter to the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, dated February 13, 1861, states as the result of a careful résumé of his notes, after an official visit to the quarry, that he found 'a large quantity of marble in every style of progress, from the rough block to the elaborate carved ornamental work, ready for shipment,' and he thinks 'its total value would not much, if any, exceed $100,000.' Desirous to ascertain if this large quantity of marble was really at Hastings, the committee sent there Mr. Oertley, the Government computer, an officer in the Bureau of Construction, and Messrs. Hamilton and Clasky, practical stone-cutters and architects. There was a perfect concurrence between these gentlemen upon their return. Their testimony shows that the marble on which Learned & Co. were paid at the rate of $43,061 60, the schedule of which will be found in the testimony of Mr. Young, was worth at a fair market price from nine thousand to twelve thousand dollars; that all the marble outside of the schedule, even at the rate of price named in it, could not exceed $10,000, and, as Mr. Oertley said, at a liberal market price would be worth not more than $6,000. By the testimony of these gentlemen it seems that the Government, under the auspices of Messrs. Clark and Young, have been paying $5,755 93 for capitals that, cut in Italian marble, would be worth not more than one thousand or twelve hundred dollars; that upon the item of capitals alone, as shown particularly by Mr. Hamilton, the Government pays $295,081 92 for what would cost at a fair market price $51,000, or an excess over the value of $244,081 93."

Mr. BROOKS. All that I have to say, in conclusion, is that this public document was long ago to my knowledge brought to the attention of the Secretary of the Treasury if not to the President of the United States, and yet that gentleman has been intrusted with the terrific power of printing the public money.

Mr. WILSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York under what Administration this amount of money was extravagantly expended in the construction of the Charleston custom-house, and under what Administration the contract with Learned & Co. was made.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not going to enter into any of these party conflicts. I stand on my own line. I find that there is this difference between the Democratic and Republican parties, that when the Democrats lay their hands deep in the public money—as Fowler, the defaulting postmaster at New York—they hide their heads and shirk off in the first steamship to a foreign country, whereas the defaulting Republicans stand on their native heath and claim the highest public offices. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON. Then I understand from the gentleman that the enormous and needless expenditure of over two million dollars for the Charleston custom-house was made under the Administration of Mr. Buchanan, and that the contract with Learned & Co. was also made under the same Administration. I suppose that if we had the real facts in that case we would ascertain that by the interesting working of New York city politics, Mr. Fowler was afforded an opportunity by the friends of the Administration to make his escape, and his sureties also remained in safety. They were taken care of by the Administration, which was the Administration of the party which the gentleman desires to see again elevated to power. I would suggest to the gentleman that he may also find some very valuable information in regard to this question of frauds, if he will investigate the Fort Snelling frauds and give to the House a statement concerning them.

Mr. BROOKS. The gentleman can make nothing by any such reference to me. I voted against Mr. Buchanan. How did the gentleman vote?

Mr. WILSON. I voted against Mr. Buchanan, and am against those who are now desiring to bring that party into power again.

Mr. BROOKS. Did the gentleman from Iowa vote for Mr. Pierce?

Mr. WILSON. If the gentleman should try to ascertain my political antecedents, he might run me back into the Whig party; but that has nothing to do with the matter. If the gentleman wants to become the champion of that Charleston expenditure, or of the Learned contract, or of the Fort Snelling swindle, or of the escape of Fowler and his securities, it is all well. I am not here for that purpose. I interrupted the gentleman with a view of getting from him definitely the information which he seems to possess.

Mr. BROOKS. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman shall make no such issue with me. I have nothing whatever to do with the disbursements of the Charleston custom-house whether under a Whig or a Democratic Administration. The point I make, and which I wish the committee to comprehend, is this: when this Mr. Spencer M. Clark was known to have reported fraudulently on this matter of the Charleston custom-house he was not only kept in office but promoted to the highest pecuniary position in the country—that of manufacturing the public money. That has been known for months to the Secretary of the Treasury, if not to the President of the United States. That is the issue. It matters not whether he is one of my party or one of his party; that is not the question, but did the Secretary of the Treasury know or not when he made Mr. Clark the printer of the public money that there was a public document charging him with fraud, and made by the party to which the gentleman belongs? That is the issue. If he has anything to say on that I shall be happy to hear him. That is all I have to say.

Mr. STEVENS. I am not quite sure to what amendment the gentleman has been speaking. Will the Clerk report the amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. General debate is in order, and no amendment is pending.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought the gentleman was speaking to some amendment. I believed that something had been proposed, for I could not think that this was not for some purpose. I could not believe that this discussion arose from any disposition on the part of the gentleman to indulge in a political harangue. I do not think that this business of the country is to be interrupted without definite action, and merely for the purpose of making a political speech against the administration of the Government. Hence I thought that I had overlooked the fact of an amendment being pending.

However, sir, to say a word in addition, I do not think it worth while to reply at large to the remarks of the gentleman from New York, because, according to his own statement, he has the sympathy of no party, stands by himself, speaks nobody's opinions but his own, and expects nobody to believe him. [Laughter.] That being the case, I do not feel that it is necessary to correct what has been said if there were anything to correct. I know that frauds are committed under every administration of the Government. I know that rogues get into office under every Administration. I believe that a few such have got into office under this Republican Administration who have been bequeathed to us by the former Administration, and which this Administration thought proper to spare as monuments of mercy. [Laughter.] I never agreed to that policy. I made personal efforts to have Mr. Clark dismissed from office. I wanted him with all the other ravenous birds of the last Administration to be turned out. But he was retained. He is a man of genius. He is a man of marked ability and industry. What he has done under the Administration since I do not know. I hope that by reason of his new associates he has been affected by their saving grace. [Laughter.] I hear statements are made against him, but nothing against him that he has done since he has been where he was placed by this Administration. I know that he is a most ingenious and industrious man; and I say this although I protested against his retention.

I will never consent, however, to get into political discussions on general appropriation bills. It is true that there are deficiencies in the various appropriations for the current year, which had not been anticipated when these estimates were made last year. It is true that there are optimists in our party who have hoped every ninety days that this war would be ended. Of course they have made their estimates hoping that that event would take place, hoping then as now that there would not be a large appropriation needed. We did not know that the people would not agree with the gentlemen on the other side of the House—whether they would agree that we should lay down our arms, withdraw our armies, and suffer peace to be accepted. It was not to the last election that we were sure, for the symptoms were previously unfavorable. Hence it was that these estimates were made under the contingency that possibly they might not be needed for the last half of this year. Gentlemen will understand that this money has not yet been expended. The appropriation was made a year ago for the year 1864. There has been enough to carry the Government on for six months, but there are six months yet to come, for which there is no appropriation. It is to provide for the employment of these men for the next six months that these appropriations are asked. This is to carry the Government on to the 1st of July, 1864. As to the large increase of appropriations, everybody knows that expenses are growing from year to year. The clerical force of the Departments is not now sufficient for the purposes of the Government.

There is a great difference between this and the time when the gentleman and I were in Congress together in olden times, when he used to denounce Democratic corruption with some unctious; and I used to listen to him with pleasure, though I never took any part in it myself. But then the Army was eighteen thousand strong, now it is six or seven hundred thousand; then the appropriations were seventy or eighty millions a year, now they are eight or nine hundred millions a year; and all the machinery which was provided for the former state of things was nothing compared to present exigencies, and it is necessary to go on gradually from year to year, as fast as they can, extending accommodations and buildings for the increased and increasing clerical force.

I can state a single fact illustrating that in reference to the Second Auditor. He has a much larger force than when the war commenced, but so many are the dead of this war, so many are asking for the bounty and back pay of their slaughtered children and dead husbands, and so many maimed men are asking for bounties, that on the 31st day of December last the clerical force was only sufficient to bring up the last case of just one year back; and there were seventy-two thousand cases filed which had not been touched. Now, I know nothing more cruel which comes within my public observation, and nothing which touches my heart more, than to see the widows of deceased soldiers, and to see maimed soldiers gather around me, asking me why it is that their cases have been delayed so long, and why they cannot be acted on, so that they can have relief and be able to supply their families with bread.

Sir, I ask nothing, and the committee ask for nothing, but what they deem absolutely essential for carrying on the Government in its present condition. I had hoped that no shade of politics would have entered into the discussion of this deficiency bill, and I am glad to see that there is no party which makes it now. It is an isolated gentleman, without a party, who is conspicuous on this occasion.

I do not intend, as I said before, to answer all things which may possibly be said, but I do ask that the House will consider this bill, and if there is anything recommended here which the country can do without, let amendments to that effect be offered, I care not from what side. I should be glad to reduce the expenditures and still carry on the Government with proper energy. Until we get through this bill I hope gentlemen will forbear putting in political speeches, and until we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where all of us, perhaps, will be willing or disposed to discuss all these questions in a political point of view. I shall be glad to hear the gentleman from New York upon this bill if he does not go off into political topics.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. PENDLETON. I desire to propose an amendment to line twenty-one, and I desire to call the attention of the chairman of the committee to it, as he allowed the line to be passed without noticing it.

Mr. STEVENS. Some gentlemen were talking to me, and I did not notice the reading.

Mr. PENDLETON. I will give way to the gentleman, and allow him to offer the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out in line twenty-one the word "one" where it first occurs, and insert "four," and strike out "four" and insert "one;" so that the clause will read:

In the First Comptroller's office, five clerks of class four and four of class one, substituted for one of class one, $4,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out lines fifty-eight and fifty-nine, as follows:

For compensation of the surveyor general of Illinois and Missouri, $1,668 48.

I presume that if the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will look into the law he will not object to the amendment. According to my recollection, he will find there is no such office—that it was abolished some years since. The last Congress refused to make this appropriation upon that ground. I know it has been before Congress several times, and has been generally rejected, if rejected at all, upon the ground that the office by the terms of its own limitation under some former act had expired. I cannot at this moment call to mind the act under which the office ceased to exist. I am certain that the time has long since past, and that there is no such office in existence as surveyor of the two States of Missouri and Illinois. I move to strike out the section, therefore.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I think the gentleman from Indiana is mistaken. Authority, I think, was given to close up the office as soon as certain records could be brought up; but it was utterly impossible to bring up the records of the office within the time limited, and it has been extended from time to time, and last Congress made a provision for it. The gentleman is mistaken. I recollect very well that it was upon my own motion that this appropriation was made at the first session of the last Congress.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe the appropriation was not made at the last session of the last Congress.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I do not know in regard to that. I know that at the first session of the last Congress the appropriation was made. I do not know whether I made the motion myself, but I was instrumental in having it made by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, for the reason that it was impossible to finish the business of the office and bring up the records properly showing the titles to the lands in those States within the time limited.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would ask the gentleman if the law did not put an end to this office within a given period, and whether that period has not elapsed some years since?

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I do not recollect the language of the act. My impression of it is that it discontinued the office, leaving it discretionary with the Commissioner of the Land Office to continue it until these records should be properly brought up.

Mr. HOLMAN. It seems to me that this appropriation ought not to be made. I know that it was not made by the last Congress at its last session.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. It seems to me that it ought to be made, because this surveyor general has been retained in his position, has been fully occupied, and has performed the work, and the Government ought not to expect work from an individual without payment.

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] that he withdraw his amendment, and move to insert after the word "Missouri" the words "the office to be closed hereafter," and I will state the reason. I remember that the last Congress consolidated our land business in these two States, supposing that the work would be ended by this time. But from the report of this officer, on page 7 of the estimates, it will be found that we have already given instructions for the office to be closed and discontinued, and the archives, the original records, given over to the recorder of land titles in Missouri. But as, in order to wind up the whole business and transfer these records, it would require the sum here asked for, I think we had better pay it, and put in a provision under which no further appropriation can be made.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania submit that amendment? It would take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana to strike out.

Mr. STEVENS. I will offer that amendment. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now withdraw the motion to strike out.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert after line seventy-two, the following:

For salary of an additional Secretary of War, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following clause:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for fuel, and equipment and recruiting, in the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, $2,000,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I desire to call the attention of the committee to this expenditure for fuel. I suppose it is necessary, but I wish we had more information on the subject than we have in the public documents. We are called upon by this bill to appropriate $2,000,000 for this purpose, and in the naval bill there is an appropriation of $3,840,000, so that the House is called upon at this session to appropriate $5,840,000 for fuel. My impression is that this expenditure is not very well managed or it would not be so large. If the gentleman has any documents on the subject, I should be glad if he would communicate them to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I have here some documents from the Department, showing the reasons why this expenditure is necessary, and I ask that they be read.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 18, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to invite the attention of the Committee on Naval Affairs to the inclosed communication dated the 12th instant, from the Chief of the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting, in reference to deficiencies in the appropriations for "fuel" and "equipment." It is stated that the sum of $2,000,000 will be required to meet the deficiencies for the current fiscal year, of which sum $1,500,000 are required for "fuel," and the remainder for "equipment."

Very respectfully, &c.,

GIDEON WELLES,

Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. H. RICE, Chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

BUREAU OF EQUIPMENT AND RECRUITING,
WASHINGTON, January 12, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to state that the sum of $2,000,000 will be required to meet the deficiencies in the appropriations for "fuel and equipment" during the remainder of the fiscal year. Of this sum, $1,500,000 are required for fuel, &c.

Inclosed is an exhibit showing the expenditures under the appropriation for fuel for the Navy to 30th December, 1863, inclusive.

Our increasing Navy and the contingencies of war render it impossible, with a proper regard for economy, to estimate in advance for the actual requirements under these appropriations.

The appropriation asked for is based upon the actual expenditures of the last six months.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

H. N. SMITH,

Chief of Bureau, ad interim.

Hon. GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert after the word "dollars," in the eighty-second line, the following:

For salary of commissioner to codify the naval laws under joint resolution of March 3, 1863, $3,991 67.

Mr. BROOKS. Have the laws been codified already?

Mr. STEVENS. The last Congress passed an act creating a commissioner for this purpose with a salary of $2,000.

Mr. BROOKS. Has the service been rendered?

Mr. STEVENS. The commissioner has been laboring up to this time on this business, and is still engaged in it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to strike out the following clause:

For salary of the minister at Salvador, from April 16, 1863, to June 30, 1864, at $7,500 per annum, $9,682.

I offer that amendment upon the principle stated in my opening remarks.

The committee proceeded to divide.

Mr. STEVENS. Perhaps the gentleman is not aware that this appointment was made in pursuance of an act passed April 16, 1863. No, I am not sure as to the date.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee is now dividing, and no debate is in order.

Mr. BROOKS. I hope the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will be permitted to explain.

The CHAIRMAN. By unanimous consent the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be heard further on the subject. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought I had the right act under which the appointment of this minister was made, but on looking over it I find it is not what I wanted.

Mr. BROOKS. I think the gentleman will not find any authority for the appointment of this minister except our appropriation made the other day in the consular and diplomatic bill. I think that is the first authority given for it by Congress. In my impression the Secretary of State has created the post without the least authority whatever.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was rejected.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I desire to know from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means why the committee has not reported the appropriations asked for by the Bureau of Provision and Clothing for the Navy.

Mr. STEVENS. The chief of that bureau was before the committee, but he produced no authority from the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I placed in the hands of the Committee of Ways and Means last week a communication on the subject.

Mr. STEVENS. We asked for an explanation.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. My opinion is that the explanation accompanied the request. The bureau asked for $350,000. I think the communication stated why it should be appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. The head of the bureau was before us, but the Committee of Ways and Means generally require a communication from the Secretary. We asked Mr. Bridge to bring us a communication from Mr. Welles—we could not agree to act on a communication from a mere subordinate—and he promised to do it.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. Do I understand that the communication from the chief of bureau was not indorsed by the Secretary of the Navy?

Mr. STEVENS. It was not.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the following lines:

For the payment of Ephraim Sweet, for services as superintendent of the custom-house at Belfast, Maine, $992.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope the amendment will not be adopted. If it were merely a private claim for an unadjusted account, the gentleman might very properly move to strike it out. But, as I understand it, it is a balance due to this gentleman for services performed by him, which compensation is paid in the nature of a salary. The account was adjusted at the Department, but there was a deficiency in that particular fund, so that the man who had performed this service was not paid. It is, in fact, no more a private claim than are any of these deficiencies appropriated for the purpose of paying clerks or Assistant Secretaries of War. I trust the amendment will be rejected.

Mr. HOLMAN. Will the gentleman please to state how the claim arose?

Mr. PENDLETON. I am not able to state. The recommendation was sent in from the Treasury Department, embracing the statement that I have made, that it is only a private claim so far as any claim for services rendered under a legislation which provides compensation can be considered private.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw the amendment. The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to amend the appropriation for the Capitol extension by striking out "$150,000" and inserting "$50,000." I believe we can dispense with this appropriation. I am confident the country requires that we should begin to economize and vote no more money than is absolutely necessary. I admire this beautiful building as truly as any citizen of the Government. Its fluted columns and polished marbles address the taste; but is there an absolute necessity to appropriate $150,000 for this purpose of ornament? I believe that a portion of this money might go for the payment of extra clerks in the Departments, so that our wounded soldiers and the widows and orphans of the dead may recover their dues from the Government, which has been held back for months because of an inadequate clerical force. The men employed on this Capitol extension should be let go into the field, as my constituents have done, who left their farms, their homes, and their all to go forth to fight. It is as much their duty, strong and stalwart as they are, to do so as it is the duty of any one to fight for his country.

I am in favor of reducing this appropriation, because, as I believe, every dollar which we expend now yields but half the result in war that it would yield in time of peace. Labor is high and the cost of living exorbitant. Every additional workman brought to this city enhances the cost of living here. Many of our clerks are but half paid. They are living on next to starvation prices. I think the completion of these public buildings should be deferred till peace is restored; this, I think, is the policy for the party in power, and it should be inaugurated to-day—this hour; and I shall vote for no more appropriations for Capitol work than may be necessary to preserve the work begun from exposure and from decay.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I ask the unanimous consent of the committee to go back to a part of the bill which has been passed. I stated a few moments ago that the Committee of Ways and Means had not received a letter from the Navy Department. I understand since that such a communication has been received.

There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I move the following amendment:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for provisions and clothing for the Navy, $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move the following amendment:

For the completion of the post office building in Philadelphia, (authority to sell the Pennsylvania Bank building therein being hereby revoked,) $25,000.

Mr. Chairman, I propose in a few words to explain this amendment. It appears that by certain acts and a joint resolution of Congress passed August 18, 1856, March 3, 1857, June 3, 1858, March 3, 1859, June 23, 1860, and March 14, 1862, a certain sum of money, and a lot of ground situate on Second street, in the city of Philadelphia, known as the Pennsylvania Bank property, or the proceeds thereof, were to be used in the construction of a post office and court rooms in that city.

It appears further that the belief was that the money in the Treasury could be applied so as to adapt the buildings then standing on the Bailey and Levy lots to these uses, and the plan and estimates for this purpose were submitted to Congress, and the act of March 14, 1862, was passed, authorizing the Postmaster General to proceed with the work. After it was commenced, however, the walls of the old building were found inadequate, and the city authorities required their removal. This and other unforeseen expenses made the sum of money already in the Treasury insufficient to complete the building. The contractor, however, proceeded with such portions of the work as were indispensable to fit the building for use, and it was so fitted and has been in actual use for nearly twelve months.

The Postmaster General was authorized to sell the Pennsylvania Bank property above mentioned at a sum limited by the law, ($110,000,) but he was doubtful as to the propriety of his applying the proceeds to pay this deficiency under the law which gave him exclusive control of the matter; although the original law, which authorized the Secretary of the Treasury, the Attorney General, and the Postmaster General to erect the building, expressly put the lot in question at their disposal for this purpose. He did, however, put the property in market with a view to placing the proceeds in the Treasury, to be disposed of by Congress; but, having failed to find a purchaser at the price named in the law, the whole matter is now submitted to Congress to decide whether the Postmaster General shall be authorized to sell the lot for the best price he can get, and apply the proceeds, or such part thereof as may be necessary, to the payment of this deficiency, or whether an appropriation for its payment, amounting to about $25,000, shall be made and the lot be reserved for other public purposes.

These facts I derive from the letter of the Postmaster General to this House, and which has been referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. I ask the chairman of that committee to state to the House what has been the action of that committee, if any, on the subject.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a point of order. The amendment repeals a former law, and is therefore not in order.

Mr. KASSON. I withdraw the words to which the objection lies, and present the amendment as a simple appropriation.

Mr. HOLMAN. I make the point that the amendment is not in order as it is modified.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment in order as modified. As originally offered, it was not in order. The amendment is to carry out an existing law, and continues the appropriation for that purpose.

Mr. ALLEY. Mr. Chairman, in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, (Mr. Kasson,) and on behalf of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, I will say to the House that this matter was referred to that committee, and that they, as yet, have had no opportunity for investigation. At the next meeting of the committee it was proposed to bring this matter up. I have given it myself some attention from former service on the committee. I understand fully the facts of the case, which are as stated by the gentleman from Iowa. So far as the committee is concerned, I have had no conference with them. I know not what their action would be, and cannot say a word in their behalf. I can only say so far as my own personal observation goes the facts are as stated, and I think that it is for the interest of the Government to keep the property. That being the case, I think that there cannot be any objection to the appropriation of $25,000 asked for to defray the expenses incurred by authority of law.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

For deficiency in the appropriation for salaries and expenses of the commissioners appointed under the fifth section, act of 16th February, 1863, $3,500.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, that appropriation is in addition to $10,000 appropriated at the last session of Congress. The law referred to created these positions and appropriated $10,000 for the purpose of paying salaries, &c. The three commissioners had $2,500 apiece, making $7,500 in all. If this be passed, the entire appropriation will be $13,500 for this object. I wish to ask, for the information of the House, whether these commissioners have not reported that there is $1,200,000 due to the State of Minnesota? And I avail myself of this opportunity to say that when I was up before I underestimated the amount of the appropriations by this bill. It is $7,170,000. The estimates are only $4,180,581. The bill has already gone $3,000,000 beyond the estimates of the Department. It is necessary for my constituents, and for the public who loan the United States this public money, to state what is likely to be the exact expenditures of the Government. Therefore I have made this statement.

Mr. STEVENS. By looking at the estimates, page 9, it will be seen what items go to make up this amount of $3,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read, as follows:

To supply deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing, $111,000: Provided, That hereafter no printing or binding shall be done for any of the executive departments of the Government without a written order from the head of such department for which said printing may be required; and the Superintendent of Public Printing, in his annual report, shall hereafter be required to report the amount of work ordered and done, with a general classification thereof, for each department.

Mr. STEVENS moved to amend that paragraph so that it will read as follows:

To supply deficiency in the appropriation for the public printing, $111,000: Provided, That hereafter no printing or binding shall be done or blank books be procured for any of the executive departments of the Government without a written requisition on the Superintendent of Public Printing from the head of said department, or for either House of Congress except upon the written order of the Secretary of the Senate or Clerk of the House, for which said printing, binding, or blank books may be required; and the Superintendent of Public Printing, in his annual report, shall hereafter be required to report the amount of work ordered and done, with a general classification thereof, for each department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend in line one hundred and seventy-five, by striking out the word "of" after the word "cases," and to insert in lieu thereof the words, "pending in the;" so that the clause shall read:

For mapping, in cases pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, $9,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BROOKS. I move to amend by striking out of the following clause—

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for ordnance, ordnance stores, labor, and contingent expenses in the Bureau of Ordnance of the Navy Department, $2,740,000—the appropriation of $2,740,000.

We shall soon have the naval bill before us, which will contain appropriations to the amount of $8,300,000 for this same purpose, which, added to this appropriation, will make the appropriations for the Navy Department this year for this one branch $10,000,000. What I wish to call to the attention of the committee, and in justification of the remarks I made upon the taking up of this bill, is that the Navy Department has failed to comprehend this war or its magnitude. For in the documents accompanying the President's message, page 861, the chief of this bureau, Mr. Wise, after showing that the deficiency is $2,740,000, says:

"It will be seen by the above estimates that the appropriations for 1862-63 were $1,040,000 less than the expenditures, and that the appropriations for 1863-64 will be $1,700,000 less than the expenditures, making an aggregate of $2,700,000. It is highly important that this deficiency should be supplied to enable the bureau to meet the necessary expenses for the current year. By reference to remarks under estimate 'C' it will be seen that the deficiency for the current year is based on the expenditures of the last year."

Now, it is evident that if, in going back two years, the Department make out a deficiency in this one matter of ordnance and ordnance stores of $2,700,000, they can have no idea of what the expenditures of this war are to be. I am not speaking to the Committee of Ways and Means, but I am addressing myself to the Administration, and urging that it should try to comprehend the expenditures of this war. No doubt improvement in ordnance and the increase of offices has led to a great deal of this expenditure. In its estimates the Administration should not try to hide from the country what will be its expenditures, but should look them fully in the face and report them to Congress from year to year; and I hope that the appropriations in the Navy bill, soon to come up, will show a full appreciation of the expenses of the coming year.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not feel very much disposed to controvert the remarks of the gentleman from New York. Two years or more ago I took occasion to say to the Administration, and especially to gentlemen on that side of the House, that I did not think they realized the magnitude of this contest. I thought then they ought to have gone on at once and liberated every slave in the rebel States, and put arms into the hands of every one so liberated. I said to the Administration I believed this war would be more expensive and carried on with much greater pertinacity than would seem by our diplomatic correspondence and otherwise was anticipated by the Administration. I agree with the gentleman from New York that they have not always properly comprehended the magnitude of the war, and have not always taken the necessary steps to bring it to a close; and I wish his remarks would stimulate them still further to the desired energy. I do not believe the war is ended, nor do I believe it is to be ended in six, eight, or ten months. I believe still further burdens are to be laid on the people; but that only shows that this appropriation is necessary, a fact which the gentleman does not seem much to controvert. In the ordnance department it is especially difficult to anticipate the amount of money required. A vast number of ships were ordered by the last Congress after the estimates of last year were brought in, and they required such heavy and numerous pieces of ordnance as to render this appropriation necessary.

Besides that there were a great many losses. Many vessels have been sunk and many guns lost; and, what is more, they wear out. I believe the life of iron cannon, constructed of the best material, is estimated at about one thousand discharges. Now take the ordnance before Charleston: they have been continually firing there for the last—I do not know how long, but nine or twelve months; and I believe all this ordnance will have to be laid aside in a very short time. I think each piece has been discharged nearly to the extent that it is safe to discharge it. The peculiar effect of discharges upon iron is such, that after a certain number of discharges they burst, and it is therefore necessary to lay them aside before that number of discharges is reached, or else they will cause great disasters. We make all our heavy ordnance of iron, and therefore they must ultimately be laid aside and their places supplied. Hence the great appropriation necessary for ordnance.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and particularly to that part of them in which he suggests the mode and manner of a more vigorous prosecution of the war—that is, by arming the slaves, and issuing edicts of emancipation. His own President has pronounced this edict as of no more use than the Pope's bull against the comet. It will not amount to anything. Ordinance is the way to end this war—guns and cannon, and not the liberation of slaves, not proclamations of emancipation and declarations that the slaves are free. It is all folly, it is all absurdity to try and delude the people into the idea that that is a vigorous prosecution of the war.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to say a single word, as he seems to be addressing his remarks to me?

Mr. BROOKS. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. I mean to say, as to that emancipation proclamation, that I have never been an advocate of it. I never supposed that the proclamation did any good one way or the other, except that it clarified public opinion. I have always been for going into the rebel States and taking the slaves away and putting arms in their hands.

Mr. BROOKS. Why, what absurdity it is to talk at this Capitol of prosecuting the war by the liberation of slaves, when from the dome of this building there can be heard at this hour the booming of cannon in the distance! And yet you are here, appropriating certainly for ordnance, but, instead of confining yourselves to the legitimate transaction of business, you suggest the liberation of slaves as a means of deciding this war! Why, sir, you cannot go at this day or at this hour to the tomb of Washington with any safety whatsoever, lest you may be apprehended and abducted by the cavalry of Moseby, unless you are guarded by a cavalry corps; it is not safe on this day and at this hour to cross the bridges of the Potomac and go far into Virginia upon your horse or with your team unless you are guarded by a cavalry corps; and the President of the United States feels himself so unsafe at this day and at this hour that he presents a spectacle hitherto unknown in this country—known only at Schönbrunn, in Austria, at the Tuileries, in Paris, at the Horse Guards, in London—that of a cavalry corps at the White House, not for his honor, but to protect him from the operations of guerrilla cavalry. Tell me not that your presidential edicts or your acts of Congress for the emancipation of slaves are fulminations against the enemy! The only fulmination is from ordnance, from guns, columbiads, heavy artillery, Minié rifles. There is no other. Confine yourselves to that mode of ending the war, and it will soon be ended.

The news to-day is that Longstreet, fortified and strengthened by a portion of Lee's army of the Potomac, is again threatening an attack on Knoxville. And think you that Longstreet is terrified by voices in this Capitol liberating slaves, when Lee himself can send twenty or thirty thousand men to the aid of Longstreet, and when, as I said before, you cannot safely cross the Potomac, you cannot go to the tomb of the Father of his Country with any safety without the protection of an armed corps? It is idle to tell the people of this country that the liberation of the slaves will end this war. You cannot befool the public with that idea. Whenever our ordnance goes successfully, where the sword is supreme, there and only there, and not an inch further, is the fulmination of any proclamation or the act of any Congress worth the paper upon which it is written.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I did not intend to say anything upon this subject; but having witnessed for the last two years or more the operations of the armies of the country, and, to some extent, the effect of ordnance and small-arms upon the enemy, I feel it to be my duty upon this occasion to say, that while there is power in these, and while the Government must through these execute its laws and vindicate its integrity, there remains behind this rebellion that which gives it strength and power, which must be overthrown and destroyed on the other side while our armies and our ordnance move in front.

It is true that General Lee is within a short distance of this city; it is true that Longstreet is fortifying himself in eastern Tennessee; it is true that Beauregard is at Charleston; it is true that other rebel forces are in various quarters of this country, bidding defiance to the Government of the United States and its soldiery; but their forces in arms against the Government are maintained and fed by and their very life-blood is drawn from African slavery in the South, and whenever you—and I say it here as a Kentuckian and as a southern man, always having been identified with the institution of slavery, and believing that as a citizen of Kentucky I had a right to it, and so believing still—that whenever you sap the foundation of this accursed rebellion and tear from under the rebels that which has given them strength and power, you destroy the rebellion, and your artillery is effectual. [Applause in the galleries and on the floor, and some hisses.]

Now, sir, I would not touch, here or elsewhere, the rights, the interests, the privileges, or anything else belonging to a Union man, or to any man who has stood for his country in a rebellious State or in a loyal State; but when a man has evinced his hatred to this Government, when he has voluntarily taken up arms against this Government, and when he has brought his artillery to play upon its Constitution and its principles and its liberties, he can demand of me, as a legislator for the people of this country, no privileges in horses, cattle, lands, or negroes. We will take them, when we come to them, by any means we can, and by all means.

The bulwark which prevented the American people, by its Army, from moving down to the South and exercising jurisdiction there—that bulwark, supported by four million slaves—must be removed; and the evidence that we have a right to remove it is that we have a right to crush the rebellion. It was the duty of the Government to do it. The Government would have failed in its duty to itself and to all future generations if it did not, in its power and majesty, sweep away that bulwark of slavery. I thought it my duty, under the circumstances in which I am placed, coming from the country I come from, representing the loyal people who feel as I do, and whose opinions have been expressed time and again to me as mine to them, to make this statement.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by striking out the following clause:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the employ of the House of Representatives, $7,365 19.

I trust that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will furnish some explanation of this clause. I have before me a memorandum of the appropriations made for this purpose for several years past. The appropriation for the year ending 30th June, 1861, was $93,698. The appropriation for the preceding year was $95,818. The appropriation made at last session was $103,487. It is now proposed to add to that sum $7,365 19 as a deficiency, making in all $110,852 19. That is $15,000 more than was ever appropriated for this purpose before. I am not aware that there has been any material increase of clerical force in the office of the Clerk of the House. No gentleman can desire to prevent the appropriation being made, if it be right and proper; but this extraordinary increase requires an explanation.

Mr. STEVENS. I send up to the Clerk's desk, to be read, a letter in explanation of the clause.

The Clerk read, as follows:

OFFICE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES UNITED STATES, WASHINGTON, D. C., January 14, 1864.

SIR: There will be required for the service of the present fiscal year the sum of $7,365 19 to be added to the appropriation "for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the employ of the House of Representatives." A part of the above deficiency accrues by the increased pay of the Capitol police, under the act of July 20, 1854. There will also be required to be added by appropriation to the contingent fund of the House the following sums, namely: $1,866 to the item "for clerks to committees and temporary clerks in the office of the House of Representatives;" this deficiency is created by increasing the number of committee clerks. Forty thousand dollars to the item "for folding documents." The deficiency in this item amounts to $16,000; in addition to which at least $24,000 will be required during the presidential campaign. Six thousand five hundred dollars to the item "for fuel and lights, including pay of engineers, firemen, and laborers, repairs and materials;" this sum will be required to pay the engineers, firemen, and for repairs and materials, the appropriation having been exhausted in the purchase of coal at the increased rates. Eight thousand dollars to the item "for furniture, repairs, and packing-boxes for members;" the appropriation has proved insufficient, owing to the increased price of carpeting and other materials. Eight hundred and thirty-two dollars and seventy-eight cents to the item "for laborers." And $9,000 to the item "for stationery;" this sum will be required to keep up the assortment of stationery and to pay to members undrawn balances of their stationery accounts.

There being of the contingent fund an unexpended balance of an old appropriation "for engraving, electrotyping," &c., of $21,207 59, I would recommend that it be transferred to the "miscellaneous item" of the contingent fund, to meet payments to witnesses and other expenses of investigations by committees.

Very respectfully,
EDWARD McPHERSON,
Clerk of the House of Representatives United States.
Hon. T. STEVENS, Chairman, &c.

Mr. HOLMAN. This letter gives no explanation except of one item. It says that the increase has arisen from the addition of twenty per cent. to the pay of the Capitol police, under the act of 1854. It is very true that the addition was made, but Congress at last session made an appropriation covering it. If it should appear, on examination, that this $7,365 19 should be appropriated as a deficiency, it may go into the miscellaneous appropriation bill, to be hereafter reported; but until there shall have been some examination I trust the clause will be stricken out.

The question was taken on agreeing to the amendment. On a division of the House, no quorum voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. Inasmuch as there appears to be no desire to investigate this item, or to reduce expenses, I presume that I may as well withdraw the amendment.

The amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I rise, although very unwell, for the purpose of making a few remarks in reference to what fell from my colleague [Mr. SMITH] a few minutes ago, and I hope the committee will indulge me.

One MEMBER, (on the Republican side.) Object.

Many other MEMBERS, (on the same side.) Go ahead—no objection.

Mr. MALLORY. My colleague has clearly a right to express his sentiments to this House upon any question, and I shall never quarrel with him about the correctness of those opinions or the taste manifested in their expression. But I intend, on this floor, to utter my solemn protest against the declarations and opinions of my colleague being taken or regarded as those of the State of Kentucky on that subject. The State of Kentucky denies and scorns them, and has, on solemn occasions and whenever she has spoken to the subject at all, given that gentleman and the world evidence of the fact that she does so. That gentleman was elected as a representative of the Union Democratic party of the State of Kentucky, was elected by the same party in that State which elected me, on the same platform, and was sent to represent the same creed that I represent.

A convention at Louisville, in my own district, solemnly enunciated last March to the people of Kentucky, and to the world, the opinions of that State on the great questions of the day. The State of Kentucky, through the Union Democratic party, the predominant party of that State, denounced among other things the policy of the Administration of freeing the slaves of the South as a war measure, or for the purpose of aiding in suppressing the rebellion.

Mr. SMITH. I ask my colleague this simple question: whether the results of the movement of the armies, and the results of the action of the Administration which have been denounced as unconstitutional, unwarranted—

Mr. MALLORY. Make it short.

Mr. SMITH. I ask my colleague whether the people, with all of the facts before them, did not give last August fifty-nine thousand majority for the Union?

Mr. MALLORY. Yes, sir; and fifty-nine thousand majority against the Administration of Abraham Lincoln, then denounced by my colleague himself. He denounced the policy of this Administration, and I dare him to deny that.

Mr. SMITH. I do deny it.

Mr. MALLORY. Then you deny the record. My colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] will please read the resolutions of that convention.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I read four resolutions adopted by the Kentucky Legislature at its winter session, 1862-'63, and reaffirmed by the great Union Democratic State convention at Louisville, in March following, namely:

"Resolved, That our institutions are assailed by an armed rebellion on one side, which can only be met by the sword; and on the other by unconstitutional acts of Congress, and startling usurpations of power by the Executive, which we have seen by experiment can be corrected by the ballot-box. Policy, as well as principle, requires that Kentucky shall await the process of reform, which is slow but sure, and refrain from all unlawful and unconstitutional acts, which have already brought terrible calamities upon the country; while we invoke the aid of all patriotic men to avert the evils that threaten our free institutions.

"Resolved, That this General Assembly now, in the exercise of its right to differ in opinion with the national Executive, enters its solemn protest against the proclamation of the President of the United States, dated 1st of January, 1863, by which he assumes to emancipate all slaves within certain States—holding the same to be unwise, unconstitutional, and void.

"Resolved, That this General Assembly declares that the power which has recently been assumed by the President of the United States, whereby, under the guise of military necessity, he has proclaimed and extended martial law over States where war did not exist, and has suspended the writ of habeas corpus, is unwarranted by the Constitution, and its tendency is to subordinate civil to military authority, and to subvert constitutional and free government.

"Resolved, That this General Assembly binds with pleasurable hope the recent manifestations of conservative sentiment among the people of the non-slaveholding States in their late elections, and regard the same as the earnest of a good purpose on their part to coöperate with all other loyal citizens, give security to the rights of every section, and maintain the Union and the Constitution as they were ordained by the founders of the Republic."

Mr. MALLORY. Now, Mr. Chairman, I can tell this House, after these resolutions have been read, what that convention did mean. I tell this House and the country that the predominant party in Kentucky, whose sentiments you have heard expressed in these resolutions, was the party that nominated and elected my colleague, [Mr. SMITH.]

Mr. SMITH. I will ask my colleague one question, if he will allow me.

Mr. MALLORY. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH. I ask my colleague whether I was not a candidate for election to Congress in the district now known as the sixth district of Kentucky against his late colleague in this House, John W. Menzies? That he knows to be the fact. I ask him further, whether he did not give his support to Mr. Menzies so far as he could outside of his own district? I ask him whether he did not also write a letter to Mr. Menzies in favor of his reelection?

Mr. MALLORY. I did, and I am glad that I had prescience to know what sort of man was being supported against Mr. Menzies. Since the gentleman came here he has shown himself to be what I suspected he was. That election in Kentucky amounts to this: that the Union Democratic party of Kentucky intended to stand by the Government of the United States through "thick and thin," through adversity and through prosperity; that they intended to maintain it by the appropriation of money and the raising of men to put down this rebellion so long as men and money were necessary. That is what that election meant. That party also rebuked, as they said in those resolutions, as unwise and impolitic and unconstitutional, the policy of this Administration in many important respects. The Union Democratic party in those resolutions distinctly denounced the President's proclamation of emancipation, which my colleague considers now as a necessary war measure. They denounced it as unconstitutional, null and void. That was done by those who nominated and elected my colleague. I ask him whether in his speeches he ever dared to avow his approval of the emancipation policy of the President? I want a direct answer.

Mr. SMITH. I will answer my colleague distinctly, that I said in my canvass in Kentucky, that in no act of the President, in no act of the Congress of the United States, in no act or word or deed that could be found on paper had the institutions of Kentucky been touched, and I defy mortal man to show it. I defy my colleague here to show it.

Mr. MALLORY. Answer my question.

Mr. SMITH. I told the people of Kentucky that I would oppose the operation of that proclamation to the Union men of the South, but that so far as rebels in arms were concerned I was not only for taking their negroes, but that I was for taking their infernal lives and crushing them to atoms.

Mr. MALLORY. I have not yet obtained an answer to my question. I ask my colleague whether he ever dared in his district during his canvass to announce that the proclamation of the President freeing the slaves of the insurrectionary States was constitutional, and that he approved of it?

Mr. SMITH. The question was never made in my district whether it was constitutional or unconstitutional. [Laughter on the Democratic side of the House.] I ask my colleague to allow me to say that I am in exceedingly good humor, and I trust my colleague, so far as we are personally concerned, will allow this little debate to go on pleasantly between us.

Mr. MALLORY. Oh, yes.

Mr. SMITH. I ask my colleague in connection with this discussion if he is in favor of and will support a doctrine which will give to these rebels who are in arms in this great conspiracy against the Government of the United States all the rights and privileges he would give to Union men; and if he would make a rendition of their slaves when they have transgressed the laws of their country and only made to yield by the sword?

Mr. MALLORY. I would carry on this war against the armed power of the rebels with all the power this Government can constitutionally muster against them. I would reduce and destroy their armies; I would destroy all resistance to the laws and Constitution of the United States; and then I hope I would have the magnanimity to spare private property and let the people who have been reduced to submission return to their allegiance and enjoy their own property, and live under their own vine and fig-tree. I want no afterclaps, no sanguinary modes of punishing them after the war is over for what they did during the war. I want no ranking left behind. I want, when this war is over, peace and harmony to spread their broad wings over the whole country. I want upon the statute-book no such laws as my colleague would defend—a state of things in which the arms of men would be raised against their fellow-men; a state of things which for ages would make the assassin lurk in secret places to shoot down the man who has in his possession his father's confiscated estate. I want no bloody law upon the statute-book. I want, when peace comes and the rebellion is subdued, all possible peace and harmony to prevail.

My colleague, during the canvass in the district he represents, made many speeches, and my colleague here present [Mr. WADSWORTH] has one which he [Mr. SMITH] made upon this question, and, with the permission of the committee, I will ask that it be now read.

Mr. STEVENS. As these gentlemen seem to be hunting up documents for this discussion, I think they need a little more time, and with their permission I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. MALLORY. I must decline to yield.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I read some extracts from a speech made by General Green Clay Smith, July 28, 1863, to a meeting in Harrison county, Kentucky, as I find them published in the Cincinnati Commercial of July 29, 1863, namely:

"He [Mr. Menzies] charges that I do not stand upon the Louisville platform, and that the convention did not indorse it. I contend it has indorsed it, and that I am the friend of the Union party of the State, its true representative, and he its enemy."

And again:

"I never entertained a moment's thought antagonistic to the action of the Louisville convention; on the contrary, I stand upon the platform of the Union Democratic party of the State, as contained in the resolutions of the Louisville convention."

And again:

"I am opposed to the radical measures of the Administration, and if elected to Congress will pursue a course consistent with these avowals. In the selection of a Speaker for the House I will vote for a war Democrat; and such measures as neither my vote nor influence as a member of Congress can change, I vote to the measure of my ability to effectually defeat by pressing the war to a speedy close, in destroying the armies of our enemies and in the wake of our victorious arms, and see the Constitution and law and order restored in every State of the Union, under which the rights of persons and property will be secured and protected."

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know that I have much to add to that speech [laughter] about my colleague's record, or about the convention which nominated him or the people who elected him.

I will conclude my remarks by saying that my solemn conviction is that Kentucky repudiates the sentiments uttered by the gentleman a few moments ago as completely as she did at that time when he indorsed such condemnation. He has changed; Kentucky has not. He is entitled to make that change, and I do not quarrel with him for having made it. He has a right to do it. Even after he had pledged himself to his constituents to pursue a particular course he has a right to pursue a different course. I do not quarrel with him; it is a matter with himself alone.

A MEMBER. He has no such right.

Mr. MALLORY. I mean to say he has a political right as a member of Congress, and there is no authority to restrain him. We are not talking about a moral right in this House. I am talking about his power under the rules of the House and the Constitution and laws of the United States after he has pledged himself to his constituents to pursue a particular line of policy to come here and pursue exactly the reverse. I do not quarrel with him; he can settle that with his constituents; but I am determined to make here to-day the distinct avowal that Kentucky at the time he was elected repudiated the proclamation of emancipation and the policy of emancipation, and that she repudiates it now.

Mr. SMITH. My colleague who has just taken his seat, feeling, for some cause or other, his inability to answer the position I took, had to call to his aid two other of his colleagues from Kentucky who sympathized with him.

Mr. MALLORY. That is a mistake. I called on my colleague [Mr. WADSWORTH] to read the Kentucky platform and the gentleman's speech. The gentleman himself is the colleague I called to my aid.

Mr. SMITH. At any rate, I have had them all threaten a time on my shoulders during this little debate. But allow me to ask my colleagues here who did not vote with me in the election of Speaker, since they quote my language when I said that I would vote for a war Democrat for Speaker, if the Union party of the State of Kentucky, known as the war Democratic party, did not understand from all of their representatives who have been elected here that they would vote when they got here for a war Democrat for Speaker? That was understood. Now, my colleague [Mr. MALLORY] never was a Democrat—never, but an old-line Whig.

Mr. MALLORY. He was elected as a Union Democrat.

Mr. SMITH. I am speaking of what he was up to the time of this last election. He was always a Whig.

Mr. MALLORY. Will my colleague tell me where, when, and how the Union Democracy of Kentucky ever imposed upon their representatives in Congress the duty of voting for a war Democrat for Speaker?

Mr. SMITH. I thought the gentleman had said so, and he quoted my speech as evidence of that fact. If it is not true, I am exempt from the charge made against me by my colleagues.

Mr. MALLORY. I quoted your speech for another purpose. I quoted your speech to show that you disapproved and denounced the emancipation proclamation, and the reading of the speech showed that you did pledge yourself in that speech to vote for a war Democrat for Speaker. I have not said one word about it; I had forgotten it, overlooked it. The gentleman has lugged it in himself now, or it came in first in his own speech. I never heard of any pledge given in Kentucky to vote for a war Democrat for Speaker before this gentleman made it in that speech.

Mr. SMITH. I admit that I made a pledge to vote for a war Democrat for Speaker, but when I came to the capital, a stranger as I was, unknown, as I was, to almost every man in this House, I looked around to see where there was a war Democrat that I could vote for. When I came to examine the operations of the caucus that met here which was considered a Democratic caucus, I found that the gentleman who received the largest number of votes in this House for Speaker was a man whom I opposed in Ohio in the election there, and spoke against—I mean Mr. Cox.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is out of order in calling any member by name.

Mr. SMITH. I beg pardon. I should have said Mr. Vallandigham. [Laughter.] He elected in the State of Ohio for Mr. Vallandigham, who was an anti-war man, who was against voting men or money to put down this rebellion. I saw that he was presented by a majority of the Democratic party here so far as I could hear, and my constituents had directed me not to vote for such a man. I found that there were other men suggested and nominated in this House by that same Democratic party who were, in my judgment, identified with him. I found also that members from New York who are opposed to voting men or money for the suppression of this rebellion were in that caucus, and therefore, as a Democrat, I could find no war Democrat to vote for, according to the old acceptance of the term. [Laughter, and cries of "Good!"]

Mr. MALLORY. My colleague will allow me to ask him whether he did not go into the Republican caucus that nominated the Speaker when he got here?

Mr. SMITH. I say to my colleague distinctly that I never saw in the papers in the city of Washington or anywhere else that a Republican caucus was to be called.

Mr. MALLORY. Did not the gentleman go into it?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir; I went into a Union, an unconditional Union caucus. [Shouts of "Good!" "Good!" from the Republican side.]

Mr. MALLORY. Did the gentleman go into the caucus which nominated the present distinguished Speaker of this House?

Mr. SMITH. Yes, sir, I did.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask the gentleman another question, and then I am done. Did he ever go into the other caucus to find out whether there were war Democrats there or not?

Mr. SMITH. No, sir; because I smelt the atmosphere and discovered its character before I got in. [Laughter, and cries of "Good!"]

I find to-day in the distinguished gentleman who occupies the Speaker's chair a Democrat according to the true and patriotic acceptance of that word, and he is a man that I am proud to stand by because he is for the Government and the Constitution and the Union—a man who has never stood up for a man or a party opposed to this war or to this Government. Upon that issue I am willing to go before my constituents, and upon that issue I am willing to stand or fall.

Mr. MALLORY. I desire to ask the gentleman one more question. I ask him if he did not, in advance of his arrival in the city of Washington, and at the time he stood upon his pledge to vote for a war Democrat for Speaker, write a letter to some gentleman here—I do not know whom—some gentleman of the Republican party, or of this great Union party, as he calls it, or to some gentlemen of that clique, or party, or whatever he may choose to call it, in which he pledged himself to vote for SCHUYLER COLFAX, or some other Republican, for Speaker?

Mr. SMITH. I answer the question by saying that if I wrote such a letter to anybody at any time I do not recollect it. I do not recollect at this time, ever having written such a letter.

Mr. MALLORY. Ah! Mr. Reporter, write down for him as his answer, non mi ricordo.

Mr. SMITH. I will now ask my colleague a question: whether the people of Kentucky have not, by their votes and by their action, repudiated the Vallandigham, anti-war, anti-money, and anti-men party of the North?

Mr. MALLORY. The people of Kentucky, as I said, have pledged themselves to sustain the war by furnishing men and money.

Mr. SMITH. I want a direct answer from my colleague.

Mr. MALLORY. I mean to say that if the Vallandigham party, or any other party in the North, opposed the furnishing of men or money, the Union Democracy of Kentucky was against that party.

Mr. SMITH. Then I ask my colleague this further question: what right he had to be in a caucus with men who supported that party in the recent election?

Mr. MALLORY. I was never in that caucus. I did not go into that Democratic caucus. I have no obliviousness about the matter, no non-recollecting anything about it. I did not go.

Mr. SMITH. Then I will ask my colleague another question—what his name is doing on that national committee?

Mr. MALLORY. Mr. Chairman, I am now acting with the northern Democracy, as I was pledged to do by the platform of the Union Democracy of Kentucky, which has been read here to-day by my colleague, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] and to which he is pledged, too.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, my colleague has been in Congress four or six years, and understands how to give evasive answers better than

I do. So far as I am concerned, this matter is closed. The people of Kentucky, my colleague's remonstrance to the contrary notwithstanding, are to-day, as they were in the beginning of the war, in favor of crushing the rebellion by every means, whatever it may be. I speak now of the Union party of Kentucky, for we have a Democratic party there which would not be trusted by Union men further than one could throw a bull by the tail. [Laughter.] I opposed that Democratic party. It was the distinct understanding of the Union men of Kentucky, and is to-day, that whatever stands in the way of the Army of the Republic must be removed, and that the Government must triumph.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, my colleague [Mr. SMITH] has made the remark that he had on this occasion two or three of his colleagues on his shoulders. I understand that remark to embrace me as one of the three on his shoulders. I must deny the soft impeachment. I was not present when my colleague [Mr. SMITH] got up here to unsay all he had said in Kentucky, and to take back all the pledges he had given to support the platform of the Union Democratic party of our State. Had I been present when he rose to make his avowals—I came in too late to understand their drift—I should have felt, I trust, that just indignation at his betrayal of the Union party of Kentucky as not to have waited for my colleague, [Mr. MALLORY,] burdened with the weight of illness, to respond and to defend the State from the position assigned to her. Let the gentleman [Mr. SMITH] speak for his own constituents. Let him speak for those who practiced a great fraud upon the Union Democratic party of Kentucky in his nomination; but let him not speak for the people of Kentucky.

I do not propose to examine the value of his present opinions. All that I now complain of is that he was not understood when the convention nominated him, and when the party voted for him. He should have declared then what he has avowed to-day, in order that the Union party in Kentucky might have put in the field a candidate to oppose the positions which he now assumes. If he had, after that, been elected, I should not have reproached him with any speech he might have made. But now I do arraign him, here on this floor, as being unfaithful to the pledges which he made to his party, and as one who has betrayed the pledges that he gave to the electors of Harrison county, the promises that he would oppose the radical measures of the national Administration, and particularly its unconstitutional emancipation policy. I find him here now indorsing that policy; I find him indorsing the radical measures of the Administration, and going even a bow-shot beyond anything the Administration has yet attempted. I find him here, sir, instead of redeeming that pledge that he would vote for a war Democrat in the election of a Speaker, voting for an avowed supporter of the radical policy of the Administration, and a member of the Republican party. I find him voting with those men on many radical propositions which the Legislature of Kentucky and the State convention had denounced as unconstitutional. I find him here, sir—

Mr. GRINNELL. I call the gentleman to order for calling the Speaker a revolutionist.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I take it back. I did not mean it in any offensive sense. But if this is not a revolution I do not know what is. [Laughter.] No one has more respect for the Speaker personally than myself.

But let me return to the point that I make against my colleague. The doctrines that he now avows may be right or wrong; I do not discuss that; but he did not give the people of Kentucky or the Union Democracy in his district an opportunity to send a man here of different principles. They thought that my colleague stood with us upon the platform of the Union Democratic convention which had been held at Louisville. He was nominated by us and he was our candidate. Our adherents sustained him against Mr. Menzies, my colleague of the last Congress. He was sustained simply because he was the nominee of the Union Democratic party. Had Mr. Menzies received the nomination he would have been sustained in the same way. But my colleague was not elected because the people had a preference for him personally. Had John W. Menzies been the candidate of the Union Democratic party, and my colleague the Administration candidate, the latter would have been routed "horse, foot, and dragons." The point I make is not that my colleague is wrong in his present opinions, or that he has not a right to hold them, but that he did not afford an opportunity to the people of Kentucky in his district, by a frank and manly avowal, to send a member who would represent them faithfully. That is the cause of quarrel and the extent to which it goes. Having made these statements, I will not detain the committee with further observations.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, I will not detain the House long. I beg pardon for having consumed so much of its time already. I accept the point made by my colleague, [Mr. WADSWORTH,] and in 1864 let us go before our people for their judgment. He has further alluded to things which it is necessary for me to answer. The Louisville Journal, the leading paper of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, and claiming to be the representative of the people there, opposed me, and denounced me "from pillar to post." My district is composed of ten counties, and has one hundred and twenty thousand inhabitants. Two or three handbills to every man, woman, and child of that district were distributed from the office of the Louisville Journal against me, and in favor of Mr. Menzies, because they said that he was the Union conservative Democrat of that district, while I was a radical. Not a paper in my State advocated my election. I went before the people on principle, nominated by a convention that the Louisville Journal denounced as radical, republican, and everything abominable in the sight of the people of Kentucky. With that issue I went before the people—for unconditional Union—and I rode over all opposition. I was returned by a majority of 5,040. I do not know now a man who was running for Congress who was in favor of my election. I know the influence that the State government brought to bear against me. It was nothing but principle, a sublime love of country—principle and devoted patriotism and everlasting philanthropy that made me their Representative over the late Representative from that district, who did not vote for the appropriation bills to carry on the war.

Let the issue be made between us before the people. The gentleman has thrown down the gauntlet. The war is waged. Let it go to the people of Kentucky to be decided in 1864. Let them decide in 1865 whether they will indorse us as members of Congress. I speak for my people. I have seen and communicated with them. I say to my colleagues that I have in my possession letters from the best and truest men of Kentucky—men who own more negroes than all of us put together—who indorse me for voting for the present Speaker, [Mr. COLFAX,] in voting, as my colleague said, for an "abolitionist for Speaker." I have not yet received a single letter reproving me for voting as I did. They also indorse my resolution, and they indorse my position generally. I believe that they will indorse me hereafter.

Mr. MALLORY. Who are those extensive slaveholders?

Mr. SMITH. If my colleague will call at my room I will tell him. These are private letters, and I do not know that I am at liberty to give their names in the House of Representatives.

Mr. MALLORY. If they are private letters the gentleman ought not to have alluded to them in the committee.

Mr. SMITH. I only alluded to them incidentally to show that I had been indorsed in my course, and as I know by the best of men. I know my position is right and just, and knowing it I will defend it here, believing as I do my people will appropriate my course.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope I will be pardoned for saying one word before this discussion is permitted to close. It would seem, from what has been said by my colleague, [Mr. MALLORY,] that all the members from Kentucky who voted for the present Speaker [Mr. COLFAX] were recreant to their State and their duty. I wish to understand these gentlemen, and whether they intended to include in their remarks every gentleman upon this floor from Kentucky who had the independence to vote for Mr. COLFAX for Speaker? I ask the question for the reason that I have been denounced by the Louisville Journal and other papers in Kentucky with violating my pledges upon that subject. Standing here and listening to this debate, and to the insinuations thrown out by those gentlemen, I desire to know whether I am included in their remarks, and am charged by them with violating my pledges? If I am I want them to say so.

Mr. MALLORY. I have not, in the most remote way, directly or indirectly, alluded to the gentleman. In replying to my colleague, [Mr. SMITH,] I replied to his sentiments and I repudiated them, and I read from his speech in which he pledged himself to vote for a war Democrat for Speaker; and then I showed that he voted for Mr. COLFAX. I do not know what the views of my colleague [Mr. CLAY] are; whether he approves the proclamation of emancipation or not. I do not know anything about it, because he has said nothing. Therefore I beg he will not suppose I had any allusion in the world to him.

Mr. CLAY. I am very glad to hear the gentleman's candid explanation upon that point. But as I am upon the floor I wish to make an observation or two, so that I may stand fair before my constituents and the world. This very question as to whom I would vote for as Speaker of the House of Representatives was put to me on every occasion in my State, and I replied emphatically that I would make no pledges, that I would not pledge myself to vote for a Democrat or for a Republican; that I intended to do what I thought right and proper under all the circumstances when I got here. I did not know the opinions of these gentlemen, and I thought I would be doing injustice to myself and to my constituents by making any such pledge; and therefore I told them I wished it distinctly understood that I made no pledges. Indeed, I pledged myself that I would not make any pledge upon the subject. Some of my constituents who never heard me speak have denounced me as violating my pledges—pledges which I never made—and that denunciation has been followed up here to some extent.

Mr. MALLORY. I will ask my colleague—for I have heard that he said so—whether he did not, in the city of Frankfort, which is in his district, pledge himself during his canvass that he would not vote for a Republican unless he saw from actions here that something like an indefinite postponement of the organization of the House would be the result of his not doing so; but that in that event, and that event only, he would do so?

Mr. CLAY. I made no such pledge whatever. More than that, I stated I would not make any pledge. I stated it everywhere; and I felt at liberty here to canvass every claim and to vote for the best candidate, as I thought the interest of the country required. I have no concealment to make in regard to my views. I have never attached myself to one side or the other. I am independent; I mean to vote for measures as they come up according as it seems to me best and for the interest of my country, disregarding all party ties and party feelings, for I cannot say that I cordially agree with either side of the House.

I must say, so far as the Democratic party is concerned, my prejudices are rather against them. I had always been against the Democrats; and the leading Democrats of my State have mostly turned out to be rebels, and a majority of them are now in rebel arms. I mean the Democratic politicians of my State. Such being the case, my prejudices were rather against them; but I did not know what they would be elsewhere, and I reserve my right to determine the matter when I reached here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In what I said there was no allusion to the gentleman, because I understood him to stand upon the State platform, and to still stand upon it. I would inquire of the gentleman if I am not correct in that understanding.

Mr. CLAY. I voted for the platform in the Legislature and in the convention, and intend to be governed in my judgment by the State platform as laid down as far as it is applicable to the times. I have made no repudiation of it, and I have given no vote which will not justify me in standing upon it. But these gentlemen seemed to arraign my colleagues as violating their pledges, because they voted for the present Speaker. The papers in my State take that ground, and these gentlemen seemed to follow in the same direction, and I wanted to know whether they meant me or not.

I take the opportunity to explain myself now that I may not be misunderstood upon this subject. I do not intend to create any ill feeling between my colleagues and myself. I desire to have the friendliest relations with all of them. Yet, gentlemen, I intend to act here for myself, not to be governed by anybody, to exercise my best judgment on all these questions, and to go home and face my constituents like an honest man, and tell them that I have done my duty according to the dictates of my own judgment.

I have made these remarks because this subject sprung up incidentally here. I should not have alluded to what has been said in the newspapers if it had not been for the course of my colleagues this evening. I intended to have passed it by, but as the question has come up here, I wished the House and the country to know my position, that there may not be any mistake about it.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to cut off this interesting debate, and I trust nobody will think that I have done so prematurely. I have been very willing to let Kentucky express her sentiments here. She is loyal. She supports the Administration in everything by voting for every measure for which the Administration asks unless she deems it unconstitutional. She did so in the last Congress, and for some time she controlled the operations of the war by having the ear of the White House. I am glad that this debate has sprung up, so that the Executive may see how far the gentlemen from Kentucky ought to be consulted; and more particularly the loyal men of Kentucky who stick by their pledges. In order that we may have time to reflect upon the matter, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being bill of the House No. 156, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. HOLMAN, (at twenty-five minutes after five o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

OATH OF OFFICE.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, the Senate having yesterday decided that the act of July 2, 1862, is within the power of Congress, and that its provisions include members of this body, and the Senate being the constitutional tribunal in which is vested exclusive and final jurisdiction over its organization of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its members, in compliance with that decision I am now prepared to take the oath prescribed by the act. When I have done so, I shall ask from the courtesy of the body the privilege of occupying its time for not exceeding fifteen minutes in the submission of some remarks with reference to my personal action under the decision, and the reasons by which it is controlled. It is the first occasion on which I have ever asked the indulgence of the Senate for an explanatory statement, and it shall be the last.

Mr. RICHARDSON. Mr. President, there is a law requiring this oath to be administered. About the policy or the constitutionality of that law I have but a single word to say. I have no objection to the oath; I can take it and shall take it, but I question the policy of administering any other oaths than those that have been administered during the entire previous existence of our Government.

Messrs. BAYARD and RICHARDSON stepped forward to the desk, and the Vice President administered to them the oath of office prescribed by the act of July 2, 1862; and it was also subscribed by them.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to make some remarks personal to himself. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator will proceed.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President, in the course of the debate upon the rule adopted yesterday by the Senate, I stated that the body having exclusive jurisdiction over the subject, I should hold myself bound by its action, and that but one alternative remained if the rule was adopted: either to comply with the decision or relinquish my seat in the Senate. Subsequent reflection has convinced me I was partially in error. Another course is open: to submit to the decision and resign.

The gravest consideration has induced me to pursue this latter course; and in a brief period my connection with this body, which has lasted nearly thirteen years, will cease.

I desire to assign the reasons which control my action. Without any decision upon the constitutional validity of the act of July, 1862, all the members of the Senate and House to whom it applied belonging to the political party with which I have acted have voluntarily taken the oath prescribed by that act, deeming, doubtless, that the constitutional questions involved were of less moment and the precedent made less dangerous than they seemed to my mind. I could not but reflect that this unanimous action of those with whom I coincided in general political views might give cause even to men unbiased by the perverting influences of political or personal hostility, who did not know me personally, to doubt, if not to believe, that I declined to take the oath for reasons other than the consideration that, in my judgment, it was a dangerous innovation upon fundamental principles of the Constitution.

As I believed that the law had been passed without full discussion, and as a decision on its validity by the proper tribunal had been waived at the special session when I was not present, I was content to leave others to their own action, and govern mine by my convictions of duty. The decision has now, however, been judicially made, after hearing my objections to the act and the oath it imposes, and that decision, though in my belief a dangerous precedent, is obligatory to the extent of taking the oath, as I have already held the seat for nearly one year since my reelection.

Sir, I admit that I covet the approbation of the good, the wise, and the reflecting, and would not willingly subject myself to their censure or to reasonable suspicion as to my motives of action; though I am utterly indifferent to those calumnious, groundless, and vindictive attacks to which every man in public life, even in less excited times, is subjected by personal malevolence or political hostility. But though I desire such approbation, I have never made either opinion or popularity my standard of action, but my own sense of right and duty; and I owe a respect to my own sincere convictions of public duty which I will never sacrifice. Many of you are aware that before civil war commenced I expressed fully my views as to the course of action which I thought the welfare and prosperity of the whole country required after the secession of seven States. Those views differed from the course pursued subsequently by the Administration, and its course was approved by a majority of Congress, and indeed by the people at large after their passions had become excited by actual war.

I told you then that I did not consider secession a constitutional or reserved right of the States, but an act of revolution; but a revolution by organized communities—not rebellion in the modern sense of the word, but only in its old Roman sense—the revolt of a people. I told you, also, that, in my judgment, conciliation, and the removal of real or even apprehended grievances or dangers, and not coercion by arms, was, in such a crisis, the true policy of the statesman; and that the framers of the Constitution had wisely left such a state of affairs without any provision as one of those “mortal feuds” which, in the language of Hamilton, “when they happen, commonly amount to revolutions and dismembersments of empire.” I admitted that secession was a breach of the compact by which the Federal Government was established, and that it rested with the United States to determine whether they would and could, by war, compel the seceding States to repair the breach, or whether the act by which they severed their political relations with us should be assented to, and a peaceful separation permitted, in the hope that past memories and the ties of blood and marriage, with continued commercial intercourse, might in a few years restore those seven States to the Union; similar influences having at the origin of the Government induced North Carolina and Rhode Island, after a year's delay, to become members of the Union, though the former had in the first instance rejected the Constitution, and the latter had refused to be represented in the Convention. I may be pardoned here for quoting a short extract from a speech I made on the “condition of the country,” in March, 1861, as illustrative of my opinions before the sword had been drawn:

“You may attempt by war to keep the States united—to restore the Union; but the attempt will be futile. Conciliation and concession may reunite us; war, never! The power may be exercised for the purpose of punishment and vengeance. It may be exercised if you propose to conquer the seceding States, and reduce the nation into a consolidated nation; but if your intention be to maintain the Government which your ancestors founded—that is, a common Government over separate, independent communities—war can never effect such an intention.”

I preferred then peaceful separation to civil war as the lesser evil, but the Administration and the dominant party decided to resort to an enforcement of the laws by the coercion of arms, as against an insurrection. Civil war has since raged, and its events and consequences have strengthened my convictions that the prosperity of my country and the happiness and morals of the people cannot be promoted by its continuance. To these views an overwhelming majority of Congress is opposed, and, so far as the elections of the past year can be accepted as evidence of public sentiment, that majority is sustained by the people. It is true that new questions have arisen in the progress of war as to its mode of conduct and object, and have produced conflict of opinion among the people. But on the question of peace—even by temporary separation if essential—the Democratic party with which I have been connected is divided, and many of its leading and most influential adherents indulge in the visionary idea that a common Government, based on “the consent of the governed,” over separate political communities, with diversified habits, manners, customs, and institutions, can be restored and maintained by the sword, without the abandonment of a federal and its conversion into an imperial and centralized Government. So thought not the President of the United States or the Secretary of State on the 10th of April, 1861, before war had begun, and to my mind such an idea is a delusion and a mere chimera. I have also the fixed opinion and belief that the life of a nation depends upon the preservation of its liberties, and not upon the extent of its dominion. Standing therefore almost alone in this body, I have lost the hope that I can longer be of service to my country or my State. Never an ambitious man, the passion of ambition has with the advance of life so diminished that I prefer the repose of private life to the embittered contests of the political arena in these tempestuous times.

I have lived to see the elective franchise trodden under foot in my native State by the iron heel of the soldier, and “Order No. 55,” not the people of Delaware, represented in one Hall of Congress. I have lived to see her citizens torn from their homes and separated from their families on the warrant of a self-styled detective, without any charge expressed on its face, and without any known accuser; and then, without hearing or trial, these citizens banished from their State, beyond the protection of the laws, into a State in which the laws of the United States are now neither enforced, nor enforceable. Yet in the State of Delaware the courts have been always open, and at no period has there existed the semblance of a conspiracy or combination to resist the authority of the United States. Such an allegation is a gross calumny, and utterly groundless, come from what source it may.

And now, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States have, by their decision enforcing an expurgatory and retrospective test-oath, repugnant to both the letter and spirit of the Constitution, made a precedent which, in my judgment, is eminently dangerous, if not entirely subversive of a fundamental principle of representative government. Under these circumstances, with my construction of the Constitution, having held the seat, I am bound to submit to your judicial decision as to the validity of the act of July, 1862, and have therefore taken the oath it prescribes. I cannot doubt that the precedent now made will be followed, and yet I regard all test-oaths as useless and demoralizing acts of tyranny. It has been as truly as beautifully said by a brilliant and distinguished advocate:

“They are the first weapons young oppression learns to handle; weapons the more odious since, though barbed and poisoned, neither strength nor courage is necessary to wield them.”

With a firm conviction that your decision inflicts a vital wound upon free representative government, I cannot, by continuing to hold the seat I now occupy under it, give my personal assent and sanction to its propriety. To do so, I must forfeit my own self-respect and sacrifice my clear convictions of duty for the sake merely of retaining a high trust and station with its emoluments. That will I never do, but, retiring into private life, shall await, I trust with calmness and firmness, though certainly with despondency, the further progress of a war which it is apparent to my vision will in its continuance subvert republican institutions, and sever this Federal Union into many arbitrary Governments.

Among these wars for dominion will arise and continue until, from exhaustion, the different divisions subside into separate nationalities, leaving not the vestige of a republic remaining. If the lessons of history be not deceptive and valueless, such will be the inevitable result of protracted war; for a single centralized Government over so vast a territory, inhabited by so intelligent and energetic a people, could it be organized through military genius and power, and be successful for the hour, would not outlive the generation in which it was established.

I close these remarks with the language in which a historian of the Constitution so eloquently portrays the universal sentiment of the American people (alas! how changed now) at the time of its adoption, and the great object they intended to accomplish in thus cementing more firmly a Federal Union:

“They beheld that republican and constitutional liberty which with all that it comprehends and all it bestows was not only altogether lovely in their eyes, but without which there could be no peace, no social order, no tranquillity, and no safety for them and their posterity.

“This liberty they knew must be preserved. They loved it with a passionate devotion. They had been trained for it through a long and exhausting war. Their habits of thought and action, their cherished principles, their hopes, their life as a people, were all bound up in it; and they knew that if they suffered it to be lost there would remain for them nothing but a heritage of shame and ages of confusion, strife, and sorrow.”

THE VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires the attention of the Senate for a moment in relation to the construction which is to be placed upon another portion of the rule which was adopted yesterday. The first clause of the rule, without reading it, provides that Senators elect shall take and subscribe the oath in open Senate; and at that point in the rule is a period; it is the end of a sentence; and the concluding portion of the rule seems to be somewhat distinct from the first portion of it, and is in these words: “it shall also be taken and subscribed in the same way by the Secretary of the Senate.” The Secretary of the Senate is confined by indisposition to his room, and is not able to be present. If he is included within the rule, he will, as he notifies me, take and subscribe the oath on his first appearance here when he shall be able to appear. The first question that arises to the Chair is whether he is included in the rule. He was elected the Secretary of this body before the date of the law which prescribes the oath; and do the Senate mean to prescribe a different rule to the officers of the Senate from that which is prescribed to Senators? The rule declares emphatically that the Secretary shall take the oath in the same way. The Chair surely is not able to determine whether the rule applies to the Secretary or not.

The next clause of the rule is: “but the other officers of the Senate may take and subscribe it in the office of the Secretary.” The Chair is informed that all the officers of the Senate, if the clerks under the Secretary are to be regarded and denominated as officers, are ready to take and subscribe the oath if, in the judgment of the Senate, they come within its provisions. There is an obscurity in the language, which leaves the Chair in doubt, and he hardly knows how to administer it.

MR. SUMNER. I doubt if upon reading the rule it can be said that there is obscurity in the language. Its obvious effect as it seems to me is simply to give validity to the existing act of Congress. It does not undertake to go beyond that existing act of Congress. Now, if we refer to that act, we find these words:

"That hereafter every person elected or appointed to any office of honor or profit under the Government of the United States, either in the civil, military, or naval departments of the public service, excepting the President of the United States, shall, before entering upon the duties of such office, and before being entitled to any of the salary or other emoluments thereof, take and subscribe the following oath or affirmation."

The statute is limited in its operation to those "hereafter elected or appointed," and the rule obviously is confined to an enforcement of the existing statute.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will, then, if there be no objection on the part of the Senate, give to it that construction, that it applies to such officers of the Senate as have been elected or appointed subsequent to the passage of the law prescribing the oath.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 19th instant, information in relation to the contracts of Shepherd & Caldwell to carry the mails on certain routes; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 18th instant, a statement of public books and documents in the custody of the Secretary of the Interior, which, by a joint resolution of Congress approved March 3, 1863, were set apart for distribution; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a message of the President of the United States, communicating, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of the 20th instant, a report of the Secretary of State, with accompanying papers, respecting the recent destruction by fire of the church of the Compañia at Santiago de Chili; which, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of Warren Chapman and others, praying that the enrollment and register granted June 13, 1862, to the steamer Mohawk may be legalized; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. TEN EYCK. I present the petition of Solomon Andrews, of Perth Amboy, New Jersey. Mr. Andrews claims to be the inventor of a method of navigating the air, and has devised a machine for that purpose, which has been, as he states, successfully tried. He further states that he has a model ready for exhibition in the city of Washington, and that he believes it capable of doing great service to the country in the present war. He therefore respectfully prays that Congress may cause the invention to be examined, and, if shown to be successful, may direct its use by the armies of the United States. As it is connected with matters of war, I ask that the petition be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be so referred.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. POMEROY, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of an appropriation of lands to endow female colleges in the several States, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 54) to incorporate the Metropolitan Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, reported it with amendments.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 15) to incorporate the Washington City Savings' Bank, reported it with amendments.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 50) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1865, reported it without amendment.

Mr. ANTHONY, from the Committee on Printing, to whom were referred a motion to print additional copies of the message of the President of the United States, communicating the report of Hon. J. A. Wright, commissioner to the Exhibition at Hamburg, and a motion to print additional copies of the report of the Secretary of State, communicating a report of Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles on the resources of the United States presented to the Statistical Congress at Berlin, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That fifteen hundred copies of the message of the President, communicating the report of Hon. Joseph A. Wright, commissioner to the International Exhibition held at Hamburg, and of the report of the Secretary of State, communicating the report of Hon. Samuel B. Ruggles on the resources of the United States, presented to the International Statistical Congress at Berlin, be printed for the use of the Senate.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. LANE, of Indiana, it was Ordered, That Charles Anderson have leave to withdraw his petition and other papers from the files of the Senate.

BRIDGE AT ST. LOUIS.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, or on some subsequent day, I shall ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi river at the city of St. Louis. The object of giving notice thus early in the session of such intent is, that all interests likely to be affected by this great enterprise may have an opportunity of being consulted, that consideration of its bearings upon an unbroken line of transfer between the oceans may be had in advance, and that coöperation shall be thus secured among all who are to be benefited by its speedy erection.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. POMEROY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 73) to enable the trustees of Blue Mont College to perfect the title to their lands; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 74) to secure homesteads to persons in the military service of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HARLAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 75) for the relief of George T. Wiggins, of Keokuk, Iowa; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed the following bill and joint resolutions of the Senate:

A bill (No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson;

A joint resolution (No. 3) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker, Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac;

A joint resolution (No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside and the officers and men who fought under his command; and

A joint resolution (No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt.

PURSUIT OF INDIANS IN BRITISH TERRITORY.

Mr. RAMSEY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not incompatible with the public interests, copies of the correspondence with the authorities of Great Britain in relation to the request made in the year 1863 that permission might be given to the military forces of the United States to pursue such hostile bands of the Sioux Indians, engaged in actual warfare, as might cross the international bounds into the Hudson's Bay territories.

EXCHANGE OF PRISONERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. A resolution submitted by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. DAVIS] on the 7th instant is now before the Senate in its order, and will be read.

The Chief Clerk read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to furnish the Senate with a copy of all the correspondence between the authorities of the United States and the rebel authorities on the exchange of prisoners, and the different propositions connected with that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment pending, submitted by the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. ANTHONY,] to insert after the word "requested" the words "if not, in his opinion, incompatible with the public interest."

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

MILITARY INTERFERENCE WITH ELECTIONS.

The Senate next proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted yesterday by Mr. POWELL:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to transmit to the Senate all orders or proclamations in his Department concerning elections, issued by military authority, in the States of Kentucky, Missouri, Maryland, and Delaware.

The resolution was adopted.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no other morning business, and, with the consent of the Senate, the Chair will call up the special order which was assigned for one o'clock to-day.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WILSON on the 8th instant:

Whereas Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, did, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions in which, among other things, it is declared that "the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands," thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States, and those in authority, who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union, and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States, and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President—

Mr. DAVIS. Before the Senator from Michigan proceeds, I will ask his courtesy to desire that a note which I addressed to the committee in relation to that resolution shall be first read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be read.

The Chief Clerk read, as follows:

WASHINGTON CITY, January 20, 1864.

SIR: I was taken wholly by surprise at the presentation of the resolution to expel me from the Senate. I had not expected, or even thought of any resolution which was made the ground of that proceeding, or any one, or the whole of the series producing any such movement. I therefore avowed, in substance, distinctly, that the mover of the resolution for my expulsion interpreted the resolution on which he based his erroneously and injuriously to me. That in offering those resolutions I had no purpose to invite the Army to mutiny, or the people to sedition, or any violence whatever; but it was to exhort the whole people, North and South, to terminate the war by a constitutional settlement of their difficulties and reconstruction of the Union; and that the series of resolutions would not fairly admit of any other construction; all of which I now reaffirm.

I am prompted to make this disavowal again, in this form, to place it upon the records of the Senate, it having as yet only appeared in the report of its debates. And with this note, which I request you to lay before the committee, I submit the case on my part to its action.

Yours, &c.,

GARRETT DAVIS.

The Chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, the temper exhibited in the letter of the honorable member from Kentucky just read from the Chair seems to indicate certainly to my mind a regret that his resolutions have placed him in this unpleasant predicament; and I desire now to say to the Senator from Kentucky that, if such be the fact, and he desires leave to withdraw the resolutions which are the foundation of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts for his expulsion, I shall certainly be very happy to grant him the leave so far as I am concerned, and I presume that will be the universal sense of the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Michigan has passed, I suppose, that I may respond to his suggestion. Having declared generally the meaning of those resolutions, I adhere to them. I will never withdraw them, never, never.

Mr. HOWARD. Under the circumstances, sir, before proceeding with the remarks which I had intended to make upon this subject, I will offer an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, which I now send to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the amendment, which was to strike out of the resolution the word "expelled," and insert in lieu thereof the words "censured by the Senate."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question will be on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I deeply regret that a sense of duty as a member of this body should require me to act the part I am about to act in reference to the Senator from Kentucky. I have known him for more than twenty years. I had the pleasure to be associated with him as a member of the Twenty-Seventh Congress, and during that turbulent and agitating period I had occasion very frequently to admire his frankness, his patriotism, and his devotion to his principles—principles in which I sincerely sympathized with him. We were both acting in promotion of the same political objects, both in the same political party, and I confess, sir, that when I look back upon those ancient scenes, my feelings are hurt to be obliged to throw myself into a position of antagonism to him who was then my friend and political associate. But for all this, sir, he must pardon me, at least excuse me; I feel that there is a duty due from me to this body and to the country, and that duty impels me to take a somewhat particular notice of the series of resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky which form the foundation upon which is based the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts for his expulsion.

On the 5th of January the honorable Senator from Kentucky presented to this body a series of very singular resolutions, and asked the Senate to order them to be printed. The Senate made the order. They were printed at the public expense, and are now pending before us. They are resolutions intended for consideration; we are asked to pass our judgment upon them. We are asked to vote for them, and to adopt them as the sentiments of the Senate of the United States, one of the legislative branches of the Government. In the course of this singular series, the Senator from Kentucky, after alleging various grounds of complaint against the Executive Government of the United States and the action of what he calls the dominant party in the loyal States, uses this language:

"Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilsmen in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter; and to restore their Union and common Government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates."

And it is for the utterance of the sentiments contained in this clause which I have read that the Senator from Massachusetts offered the resolution for his expulsion. Now, sir, I think I may say, without vanity, that I am too old and too well acquainted with the import of the English language to find it necessary to resort to dictionaries, whether English, French, or Latin, for the purpose of ascertaining the meaning of the word "revolt." It is not capable of discussion or dispute in the connection in which it is used in this sentence. The implication is plain and irresistible that the word "revolt," as used here, is a revolutionary rising against the Government of the United States; an insurrectionary, violent, and bloody rising against the Government of our common country. Such I regard as its meaning. The school-boy in the gentleman's own State, fifteen years old, is just as capable of giving the true interpretation of this language as he is or as I am.

He is under no misapprehension in regard to it. When he hears the word "revolt," in this connection, the idea at once and irresistibly suggests itself to his mind that the thing intended is a violent, unlawful revolution against the Government, a bloody insurrection, the object and aim of which are the entire subversion and overthrow of the Government of the United States as now administered.

Sir, I cannot sit in my seat in this body and allow sentiments of this sort to be uttered without expressing my rebuke in some form or other. We are engaged in a war, a civil war; if you please, sir, a fratricidal war; a war which is exacting from us the exertion of all the faculties of the Government, the people, the nation; a war not merely for the restoration of the Government in the insurrectionary districts, but for its preservation and perpetuation for all time to come; a war which is covering our land with blood. It has already drenched the fair fields of Kentucky with fraternal blood. There, as in other places, brother rises up in arms against brother, son against father, and father against son. The issue is simply this: whether we shall maintain the authority of the Government of the United States as established by the Constitution, or whether we shall abandon the struggle, giving the rebels their way, and finally succumb in our effort, thus acknowledging that there is not in the Government of the United States vigor sufficient to maintain its own authority, its own existence. It is at this anxious moment, in the midst of this deadly struggle, that the Senator from Kentucky asks the masses of the people to rise against their rulers in tumultuous insurrection, and by a revolt hurl them from power.

But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky denies that such a meaning is fairly to be imputed to his language. I intend to treat both him and his resolutions fairly; and in what I have to say I shall observe the plain duty incumbent upon me, to confine myself exclusively to the record which he has made of his own opinions; that is, to the resolutions he has submitted to the Senate. The Senator from Kentucky declares in a speech which he made to the Senate by way of comment on these resolutions:

"Now, Mr. President, I ask gentlemen to read this whole series of resolutions. I deny that there is a sentiment or an exhortation in them inviting to insurrection, rebellion, or war, or military violence."

He then proceeds in the course of his remarks to read two of his resolutions, and again declares:

"I utterly controvert the position that there is any insurrection invited or stimulated in these resolutions, or in any one of the series. The resolutions institute, or attempt to institute, a bold and a frank investigation of the principles and measures of this Administration," &c.

Mr. President, the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky are before this body subject to be acted upon, and he is desirous that we shall act upon them. It is not for him, having thus written out the instrument and submitted it for our consideration, to set up to be its sole expositor. He is not at this stage of the proceeding to be allowed to give it his own particular gloss or peculiar comment. It is for us as well as him to construe and interpret the instrument; and he must certainly have the charity to believe that some of us at least are equal to himself in the power of analysis in matters of language, and that we are as able as he to comprehend the meaning which this written instrument expresses. I cannot, for one, accept his commentary. I must be bound by the meaning as expressed in the instrument, and not in the commentary.

I shall now ask the indulgence of the Senate for a few moments while I call their attention to a few clauses and expressions contained in this series, for the purpose of ascertaining, if possible, from those clauses and expressions, what were and are the Senator's real opinions and sentiments, his real design in offering the resolutions; and I will begin with the very sentence which is the foundation of the resolution now before us. The Senator from Kentucky says:

"Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands."

The people North and the people South ought to do this. They ought to take this great matter, that is the war, the question of the continuance or discontinuance of the war, into their own hands. Can it be doubted that the meaning of this language is, that it is the duty or the right of the whole people North and South to take the matter of this war into their own hands, without any reference to legislation, without any reference whatever to an election, or to any other matter or thing, and to dispose of it in their primary popular capacities without reference to law, Constitution, or anything of the kind? It seems to me there can be no doubt of it. The people North and the people South are called upon to revolt against their war leaders. Who are their war leaders? Not solely the President of the United States and the Executive Government, but both Houses of Congress. The Congress of the United States have the power to control this war in all its particulars. The Congress of the United States vote supplies of men and money for the prosecution of the war; and if there are war leaders, it is as plain that the two Houses of Congress come within this category as that the President comes within it. The Houses of Congress are war leaders. The President is a war leader. His generals in the field are war leaders. The Senator from Kentucky invokes the people North and the people South to rise and revolt against their war leaders, and take the issue of this war into their own hands, without reference to law, without reference to the action of Congress, or to any other instrumentality known to the Government. He proceeds:

"And elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilsmen in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter; and to restore their Union and common Government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates."

How is this convention to be elected? He calls upon the people in their original capacity, both at the North and at the South, to revolt, to take the question of this war into their own hands, and elect a national convention. The Senator from Kentucky knows well enough that it is not competent for the people of the United States, whether at the North or at the South, to elect members of a national convention for any purpose whatever without the consent of Congress. There are but two modes of amending the Constitution. The first is, where the Congress shall recommend or propose certain definite amendments to be acted upon by the various States. The second mode, where two thirds of the several States of the Union call upon Congress to call a national convention; but no national convention can possibly exist, let me tell the Senator from Kentucky, without the consent of the body of which he and I are members.

This resolution entirely ignores those legal forms required by the Constitution. Instead of calling upon Congress to summon a national convention, instead of calling upon the State Legislatures to instruct Congress to do this, the Senator from Kentucky calls upon the people to rise in their primary capacity and meet in national convention and so amend the Constitution as, in his language, "to restore the Union and Constitution upon the great principles of liberty and compromise adopted by Washington and his associates."

That clause of his resolutions is plainly no appeal to any constitutional mode of altering the Constitution, but one directly to a revolutionary mode of doing so. Where would it end? Who could control the results? Who would be under an obligation to obey the final decree? What people are to be called together in national convention for this great purpose? Would the Senator from Kentucky allow the rebels in arms to participate in this convention? Certainly he would! Certainly he invites it! The resolution recognizes the right of the rebels in arms to participate in this "election" as much as the loyal people at their quiet homes. It would appear from this that so far as the Senator is concerned, he is just as much attached to the rebels now seeking to destroy the Government of his country, and to expel him from his home and his fireside, as to the loyal portion of the population now endeavoring to resist their bloody violence. Sir, this is a spirit of charity toward the rebels, I confess, in which I do not sympathize. I do not understand that kind of loyalty which occupies an attitude of indifference between parties like those now engaged in deadly combat the one against the other. Such a position of neutrality is monstrous; it is hostility. There is no middle ground or post of indifference which can be occupied by any true man. In this contest he who is not for us is against us.

But, sir, the animus and purpose of the Senator from Kentucky are further developed in the few passages from his resolutions which I shall now proceed to read. He says:

"That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted"—

That is, destroyed, annulled, put out of existence—

"for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage."

I will not pause to inquire into the pretended facts which in the mind of the Senator from Kentucky may serve as a foundation for this strange assertion. I read it for the purpose of showing the animus of his resolutions, for the purpose of showing the very thing he had in view when he called upon the people North and the people South to revolt against their war leaders. One of the reasons for this revolt is,

"That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage."

If this be founded in truth, if there be evidence of the fact implied in this declaration, then this complaint against the Government of the United States may be regarded as well founded. The complaint is that the Government has subverted these precious privileges belonging to the American people. If the Executive Government has thus subverted and destroyed these privileges, it would follow not only in the mind of the Senator from Kentucky, but in that of every freeman, that the Executive Government itself ought to be brought to justice in some form or other. But whether true or false, it is one of his reasons for invoking the masses of the people of the United States to revolt against the authority of the Executive Government and the authority of Congress; he believes it to be true, and so believing recommends—what every freeman of proper spirit would recommend in case no other remedy were practicable—a revolt against the intolerable oppression.

I may be imperfectly informed upon the subject of this alleged suppression of the freedom of the press and of speech; it is very possible that I may not possess all the information upon this subject possessed by the Senator from Kentucky; but so far as I have been informed, and so far as I believe, there has been no case, and I challenge the Senator from Kentucky to produce a single case where there has been any attempt on the part of the Executive Government, in wielding the military power of the nation, to suppress any newspaper or suppress free speech in any form whatever, where that free speech has not indicated a heart at war with the Government of the country and a sympathy with the traitors in the field—not a case! Is that the kind of free speech which is so near and dear to the Senator from Kentucky? Would he, if the question were put to him to-day, say to every editor within the limits of the United States, whether loyal or disloyal, "I shall not by any means be displeased to have you denounce the Government of your own country, and by means of your press to stir up insurrection and resistance to the authority of your Government?" Would he say to any editor that such conduct was proper or even allowable? No, sir; he would not. It is impossible that a loyal man could hesitate for one moment on such a question.

Freedom of the press! Sir, what is it? What is that peculiar franchise or privilege which we mean by the "freedom of the press?" The Constitution declares that Congress shall pass no act abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. I need not say to the Senator from Kentucky that the sole meaning and intent of that clause is, that there shall be no censorship of the press exercised before publication. It was simply intended as an abrogation of that prerogative of the Crown of England by which, in ancient times, the king assumed the power of licensing the printing of books, and prohibiting the publication of any but such as were protected under his license. What do our leading statesmen and jurists say on this subject? Let me read one word. Justice Story, in his Commentaries, remarking upon this same clause, the freedom of the press and the freedom of speech, uses this language:

"It is plain that the language of this amendment imports no more than that every man shall have a right to speak, write, and print his opinions upon any subject whatsoever, without any prior restraint, so always that he does not injure any other person in his rights, person, property, or reputation, and so always that he does not disturb the public peace or attempt to subvert the Government."

This language does not seem to justify the idea that a restraint upon a disloyal press, vomiting forth its treason day by day, stirring up discontent, mutiny, and even violence among the loyal people, is a violation of the Constitution of the United States, or a violation of the freedom of the press. Like other rights, this is to be used in subordination to the public welfare—used to support and not to destroy the Government; and he is little better than a madman who claims to use it for the very purpose of breaking in pieces the shield by which it is protected.

But, again, the Senator from Kentucky, to justify his invocation to the people North and the people South to rise in revolt against their Government, uses the following language. Speaking of the Executive Government of the United States, he declares that—

"It has ordained at pleasure a military despotism in the loyal States, by means of courts-martial, provost marshals, and military forces, governed neither by law, principles, nor rules, from whose tyranny and oppressions no man can claim immunity; all of which must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people."

"All of which"—that is, courts-martial, provost marshals, military forces—"must be swept away"—not by law, not by an honest peaceable election, but "by the sovereign people." Sir, I regard this as a direct invocation to the people of the United States to rise in insurrection against their Government for the purpose, among other purposes, of abolishing and doing away with courts-martial. Courts-martial are to be "swept away by the sovereign people." I ask the Senator from Kentucky to inform me in what way the sovereign people are to sweep away courts-martial and provost marshals and military authority? In what way is he to reach this object? In no other but by mobocratic violence. Courts-martial are a part of the Constitution of the United States. The Senator need not be told that they are as much provided for, and their existence and functions as completely guaranteed, by the Constitution as are civil courts for the trial of issues between man and man, or for the punishment of crime. An amendment of the Constitution of the United States declares, what was not embraced in the old Constitution, that

"No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service, in time of war or public danger."

How are the sovereign people to change that clause of the Constitution; how but by rising in revolt against the Government of the United States, and their constituted authorities? Can Congress by any act of legislation abolish courts-martial, whether they are good or whether they are bad? No, sir, the Constitution has guaranteed their existence; and I beg to inquire of the Senator from Kentucky in what way he would administer justice and punish crime in the military or naval service of the United States if not by means of courts-martial and provost marshals, for the purpose of performing the functions properly pertaining to them? Sir, this is a declaration directly against the Constitution of the United States. It invokes insurrection. It was intended to invoke insurrection for the purpose not of preserving the Constitution, for the Constitution preserves courts-martial, but for the purpose of overthrowing the Constitution. Such is the blind hatred, it would seem, of some persons—I wish I could except the Senator from Kentucky—against courts-martial.

But all this, it seems, "must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people." What sovereign people? The "people of the North and the people of the South?" the rebels as well as the friends of the Government? It would seem so. What is meant by "sovereign people" in this connection? Plainly an unorganized tumultuous gathering. This Government is a representative democracy; a Government in which the people acting in their primary capacity have nothing to do with the enactment of laws. That duty is performed by their representatives chosen according to the forms prescribed by the laws where the elections are held.

Again, sir, the Senator from Kentucky declares "That as the Constitution and laws afford no means to exclude from the office of President a man appointed to it by military power, or who is declared to be chosen to it by reason of the suppression of the freedom of election, as by the exclusion of legal voters from the polls, or by any other means, the people of the United States would be incompetent to defend and unworthy to have received the rich heritage of freedom bequeathed to them by their fathers, if they permit that great office so to be filled, or in any other mode than by their own free suffrages."

We are to have a presidential election in the coming November. A President is to be elected, not by the people, but by electors chosen for that purpose by the people. The Senator from Kentucky had this fact in view. He was aware that the people do not choose the President. They choose the instruments who choose the President. If I understand this resolution properly, its meaning and intent is this: that in case any portion of the people of the United States shall, after this election, take it into their heads that there was military interference at the polls, that the Army or the military officers of the Army had in any way interfered in the elections held by the people for the choice of electors of President, then it will be the right of that discontented portion, however few or however numerous that portion may be, to declare that the election of President under such influences is void; that the President-elect will have no right to assume the presidential functions, and must be prevented by force if necessary. A more direct invocation to violence and bloodshed, a more direct appeal to the discontented or defeated portion of the people of the United States, cannot be made. It is declaring almost in so many words that "if you, the dominant party, shall elect a President, and at the polls where this election is held military power shall have been introduced for any purpose whatever, we, the defeated party, will rise in rebellion and prevent, by force, your President from being installed in office."

In order to cap the climax and to give emphasis and point to this strange revolutionary sentiment, the Senator says that unless the people of the United States shall thus resist they will be "unworthy to have received the rich heritage of freedom bequeathed to them by their fathers." Sir, our fathers bequeathed to us a Government of law. Our fathers did not bequeath us a Government by an unorganized and infuriated mob. This is not the sort of constitutional freedom and compromise which the gentleman mentions in another resolution as having been handed down to us by Washington and his associates. Washington and his associates resorted to no popular violence. They made no invocations to unorganized popular assemblages. They were law-abiding statesmen. They were the fathers of the Constitution. Nobody was more sensible than Washington of the necessity of preserving order under the shield of law. But here the Senator from Kentucky, forgetting, as it seems to me, that he is acting under a Government of law, utters an appeal for the future, and says to the defeated party, after the election of 1864 shall have taken place, "if you are defeated, and if you declare that that defeat was in consequence of the interference of military force, it will be your duty as freemen to interfere by violence and to prevent the installation of the President and totally disregard the election." If that be not a revolutionary sentiment, an unconstitutional sentiment, I am not able to perceive what will be. It is because the Senator from Kentucky foresees, or professes to foresee, this interference, that he calls upon the people North and South to revolt against their war leaders and take this matter into their own hands.

Again, in this indictment against the Executive of the United States, the Senator from Kentucky alleges that "[His (the President's) project is] to continue the war upon slavery by his further usurpations of power, and to get together and buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers in the rebel States, give them possession of the polls by interposing the bayonet, as in Maryland, Delaware, and portions of Missouri and Kentucky, and to keep off loyal pro-slavery voters, and thus to form bastard constitutions to abolish those States."

This is another count in the indictment, that the project of the President of the United States "is to continue the war upon slavery by further usurpations of power, and to get together and buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers in the rebel States." Who compose this "desperate faction" in the contemplation of the Senator from Kentucky? Who are these "mendicants" and "adventurers?" They are those people in the rebel States who come within the purview of the President's proclamation of the 8th of December last. Let us see whether they are worthy to be called "mendicants," "a desperate faction." The President in his proclamation, speaking of the disloyal population of the States in insurrection, says:

"A full pardon is hereby granted to them and each of them, with restoration of all rights of property, except as to slaves, and in property cases where rights of third parties shall have intervened, and upon the condition that every such person shall take and subscribe an oath, and thenceforward keep and maintain said oath inviolate; and which oath shall be registered for permanent preservation, and shall be of the tenor and effect following, to wit:"

Now, what is the test, the evidence of their being "a desperate faction" and "mendicants?" It is the taking of the oath which the President has prescribed in order to enable rebels who have been in arms against the Government to return to their allegiance, and again enjoy the protection of the Government:

"I, ———, do solemnly swear, in presence of Almighty God, that I will henceforth faithfully support, protect, and defend the Constitution of the United States, and the union of the States thereunder; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all acts of Congress passed during the existing rebellion with reference to slaves, so long and so far as not repeated, modified, or held void by Congress, or by decision of the Supreme Court; and that I will, in like manner, abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the existing rebellion having reference to slaves, so long and so far as not modified or declared void by decision of the Supreme Court. So help me God."

Such is the oath directed to be administered to the repentant rebel. The President goes further, and declares as follows:

"And I do further proclaim, declare, and make known, that whenever, in any of the States of Arkansas, Texas, Louisiana, Mississippi, Tennessee, Alabama, Georgia, Florida, South Carolina, and North Carolina, a number of persons, not less than one tenth in number of the votes cast in such State at the presidential election of the year of our Lord 1860, each having taken the oath aforesaid and not having since violated it, and being a qualified voter by the election law of the State existing immediately before the so-called act of secession, and excluding all others, shall reestablish a State government which shall be republican, and in no wise contravening said oath, such shall be recognized as the true government of the State, and the State shall receive thereunder the benefits of the constitutional provision which declares that 'the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the Legislature, or the Executive, (when the Legislature cannot be convened,) against domestic violence.'"

It is this wicked, abominable oath, opening the door for the rebel population to return to their old loyalty, and thus to frustrate the schemes of their leaders, that moves the dislike of the Senator. It would seem that such a return on such terms is regarded by him as a calamity or a disgrace, and therefore he heaps upon them the epithets of desperate faction and mendicants.

This class of persons, the repentant rebels, who, like the prodigal son, having seen the folly of their ways, shall return to their allegiance and take this oath, are to be regarded as the State, or as that portion of the people authorized to reconstruct and alter it from a rebel State to a loyal, Union-loving State. Such are the "mendicants," such the "desperate faction" at which the Senator from Kentucky aims his poisoned shafts in these resolutions. Do these harsh epithets wantonly bestowed upon the repentant rebels for coming back into the Union and acting as a State government indicate a very strong love of the Union, or the Constitution, or the Government, on the part of the Senator from Kentucky? No, sir. If any inference is to be drawn from them, it is one of complete and bitter hostility to them and to the Government of the United States who is ready to receive them; and it is because the Union may possibly be restored by the means pointed out by President Lincoln in his proclamation that the Senator from Kentucky thus calls upon the people of the North and South to rise in revolt against their war leaders. What patriotism! what love of the Union! what hatred of the rebellion!

Again, sir, as further proof of the animus and purpose of the Senator in presenting these resolutions, he goes on to tell us what are the real objects of the class or party he calls the "destructive tives," including Abraham Lincoln, the President of the United States:

"Their real objects are to perpetuate their party power, and to hold possession of the Government to continue the aggrandizement of their leaders, great and small, by almost countless offices and employments, by myriads of plundering contracts, and by putting up to sale the largest amount of spoils that were ever offered to market by any Government on earth. Their object is not to eradicate slavery."

I will say at this point that, so far as I am concerned in this supposition, the Senator from Kentucky is entirely mistaken so far as relates to the insurrectionary districts. I desire to say in all frankness as to those States and those districts which are declared to be in insurrection, that for one I am in favor of abolishing slavery forever; because I think it, not perhaps the only cause, but one great predominating, leading cause of this bloody and wasting war; and I express it as my opinion that the loyal people of the United States will never have permanent peace and tranquillity, never be able to enjoy that peace which once was theirs, if they permit this great cause of disturbance to survive the struggle. For one, I say that I am in favor of the absolute, total, and eternal extirpation of slavery, at least within the limits of the insurrectionary States; and I think the people of the United States will be very unwise if they do not take vigorous and effectual measures for attaining that great object. But the Senator proceeds:

"Their object is not to eradicate slavery, but only to abolish its form and the mastery; to subjugate wholly the rebel States, and utterly to revolutionize their political and social organization."

Sir, we have heard a great deal about "subjugation," and the word is flung in our faces very frequently. It would seem to be implied by the frequent use of the word that there is, or ought to be, something in it extremely inhuman and odious. It is held up as a sort of scarecrow by the sympathizers with the rebellion to frighten off all effort on the part of the loyal people to restore the authority of the Government. I have no hesitation in proclaiming that I am in favor of the subjugation of the rebels and the subjugation of the rebel States; but when I use the word I use it solely in the ordinary sense of conquest. The subjugation of a people is the conquest of a people. The conquest of a people is the deprivation of all their military power. To conquer them is to deprive them of the power of military resistance; but it by no means implies those acts of atrocity, cruelty, and wanton barbarity which persons who use this word "subjugate" mean when they use it as a scarecrow. Subjugation is conquest; no more, no less.

I ask the Senator from Kentucky, I ask every Senator here, what is it that we are now doing in the rebel States? Are we not subjugating them? Are we not breaking up and dispersing their military forces, prostrating their military strength? And what is this but the subjugation of the people? The subjugation of a people is the occupancy of their territory by a military force sent there for the purpose of conquest, for the purpose of overthrowing the hostile government and the hostile power. Although I have read pretty carefully the law of nations and the law of war on the subject of our present difficulties, I have not been able to find any distinction between the conquest or the subjugation of a rebellious territory and a rebellious people and the subjugation and conquest of a foreign territory or a foreign people; and I tell you, sir, that your modern scholiasts will search in vain for any distinction between the two cases.

Sir, what is war? It implies violence, the use of the highest degree of force competent for a people acting as a nation to employ. It is a question of superior strength; and I know of no boundary, no limit to the exertion of the power of carrying on war but the ordinary sentiments of humanity. And I know of no law but the law of war to govern us in our conflict with the rebels. These men have gone out from among us without having suffered wrong. They never felt the weight of the Government, except as it bore upon them with gentleness, imparting blessings and breathing encouragement and a sense of security into their souls. Never has the Government of this country injured the hair of the head of a rebel. They have gone out from among us under the false pretense that they foresaw in the future that they should lose their just political power and influence in the Union. They have drawn the sword wantonly and willfully upon the Government and loyal people of the United States. Carried away with the vain idea, the gross and childish conceit, that one southern man was equal to five northern men, they have advanced boldly into the arena and thrown down the gage of combat. They have thrown as their gage of battle their cherished institution of slavery. I say here boldly, I accept the challenge; I pick up the glove; I recognize the issue. Let us see who will win and who will lose. I would fight this battle out so long as there is a man, woman, or child at the North capable of lifting a musket or pushing a bayonet! [Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Howe in the chair.) Order!

Mr. HOWARD. I would make this no child's play; and let me say to gentlemen on the other side, that the rebels in this war from the beginning have been fully in earnest. They have asked from you no favor. They ask no favor of you now. They meet us with a steady, proud, and haughty defiance, a defiance which on the side of justice would be most magnanimous and praiseworthy, and I honor them, not for their cause, not for their wickedness, but for the proud and indomitable spirit with which they have carried on the war. They mean to fight us still. They intend to destroy us and our Government; or, if they fail in this, they expect to be destroyed; and believe me, there will be few of them that will meet their fate grumblingly or with a whine. They are men like ourselves, proud of their position, proud of their honor, proud even of the wicked cause in which they are engaged. You are not to subdue such men by soft persuasions and delicate rose-scented billets-doux. You must meet them with the bayonet, the cannon, and every other instrumentality allowable in a war. Never have they exhibited to us or the loyal people of the United States the slightest consideration or forbearance, and wherever there has been any indication of terms of accommodation with them they have treated it with contempt. They have spit upon the olive branch which we have held out to them and trampled it under their feet.

But, sir, I am digressing. The Senator from Kentucky says our object is to subjugate wholly the rebel States, and utterly to revolutionize their political and social system. Certainly we shall revolutionize their political system. That is the very object of the war. What is their political system? A political organization asserting its absolute independence of the Government of the United States, and exerting its military power for the overthrow of that Government. Shall we forbear? Shall we not seek to disorganize this political organization? What does the Senator from Kentucky mean when he denounces against us as a fault that we are attempting to destroy the political organization of the rebel States? Is he friendly to that organization? Does his heart yearn toward it; or is his heart in that condition of indifference which sees as little fault on the one side as on the other?

But he goes further. He says that our purpose is—

"To destroy or banish, and strip of their property, all the pro-slavery people, secessionists and anti-secessionists, loyal and disloyal, combatants and non-combatants, old men, women, and children, the decrepit, and the non compos mentis."

Does the Senator in his calm reflection impute either to the Executive Government or to the dominant party a purpose so cruel, so unnatural, so unspeakably brutal, as the destruction of non-combatants, men, women, and children, the decrepit and the non compos; or is it rather the blind madness of party spirit which prompts this gross and calumnious attack upon the Government of his country and the loyal party now in power? Charity toward him would lead me to impute the latter motive and not the former.

Again, he says that the purpose of this party and of the Government is—

"To proclaim a mock freedom to the slaves, but by military power to take possession of the freedmen and work them for their own profit; to do all this, and also to enslave the white man, by trampling under foot the Constitution and laws of the United States and the States, by the power of a subsidized Army, and lest it—"

That is, the subsidized Army—

"should falter, by hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries, organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General."

If these atrocious schemes are entertained by the executive Government, as they are here indicated, then it would be the right of the American people, the right of any community, to rise in arms against so unjust and tyrannical a Government. "A subsidized army?" Our Army, it seems, according to the ideas of the Senator, is not a patriotic Army; it has not volunteered or taken the field from any patriotic motive, but merely for pay; and "lest," in the language of the Senator, this Army of white volunteers should falter in prosecuting the war for the purpose mentioned in the resolution, we are to resort to "the hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General;" that is to say, the black troops which we have thus far raised and now have in our employment and service are organized for the base and tyrannical purposes mentioned in those resolutions—not for the laudable and patriotic purpose of overcoming the rebellion, but for the purpose of upholding plunderers, spoilsmen, office-holders, office-seekers, and the entire flock of vultures so vividly and angrily described by the Senator.

If all that is said in this series of resolutions be true, (and I am not now discussing the truth of it, for that would lead me into too broad a field,) it would not only be the right, but it would be the duty of the American people, as a free people, not to wait a moment, but to seize the sword of rebellion and insurrection, drive the harpies of tyranny from power, and establish some government which would protect our rights and our liberties. But it is entirely manifest that under the influence of this blind fanaticism of party, which I fear has too powerful an effect on the mind of the Senator to allow his intellect to have its free and unbiased action, he has been betrayed unconsciously, I hope, into the expression of opinions, and into invocations to civil war and insurrection in which no man in his sane moments would have indulged.

Again, there is another ground of complaint; another premonition of the Senator's purpose, in his second resolution, in which he says:

"So the President of the United States, and the civil and military officers thereof, may commit treason against any State, whose government is in the performance of its duties under the Federal Constitution, by levying war against it, or in adhering to its enemies, giving them aid and comfort, as resisting with an armed force the execution of its laws, or adhering to such armed force, giving it aid and comfort."

The implication is, that whenever the President of the United States shall use the Army or the Navy for the purpose of keeping the peace within any loyal State acting within its constitutional functions, as the Senator says; wherever he shall have occasion to use the military force for the preservation of order, for the protection of the purity of elections, or for the protection of the citizen, he is guilty of an act of treason against the government of the State. It is throwing out before the people the idea that on some occasion—the Senator has not told us where—the President has thus employed the military power of the United States; and that because he has thus employed it he is guilty of treason, and ought to be impeached. This, and nothing short of this, is the fair inference from this otherwise perfectly senseless and gratuitous resolution.

He says further:

"And where, from the presence or apprehension of force and violence or other cause, any election cannot be so conducted"—

That is, according to the laws of the State—"it ought not to be held at all."

"Where, from the presence or apprehension of military or other violence, an election cannot be so conducted, it ought not to be held at all." Was the Senator aware of the full extent and meaning of this declaration? I trust he was not; but I am not sure. What is the import of the language? Plainly this: that in case an election should be held, say, for instance, in the State of Kentucky, and there was either popular violence surrounding the polls, or just ground to apprehend popular violence, or if there should be a military force of the rebels at the polls, threatening to disturb and to break up the election, then, according to the Senator, the election ought not to be held at all. Sir, what doctrine is this? He would rather see a perfect failure of all elections; he would rather see his State disorganized; no members elected to the House of Representatives or to the Senate of Kentucky; no members elected to the Congress; he would rather see all government fall into ruins than that any military force should be employed at the polls to protect the honest voter, or even to protect the judges of the election in the discharge of their duties. Did the Senator from Kentucky mean this? He has certainly expressed it. A more anarchical sentiment could never have been uttered; a sentiment more incompatible with the object of any Government, civilized or savage; and yet the Senator declares that "where, from the presence or apprehension of force, violence, or other cause, any election cannot be so conducted, it ought not to be held at all."

Mr. President, I have now finished the observations I have felt it my duty to make on this series of resolutions. I look upon them as inviting, in the most direct and urgent terms, the masses of the loyal people of the United States to rise in insurrection against the Government and eject from their places the executive officers who now have charge of it, and to institute a revolutionary Government. Is it not so? I defy any man to read those rickety and almost crazy resolutions and not come to the same conclusion. Sir, I think that a gentleman who claims so much credit to himself for profound knowledge of the Constitution, who is so strenuous in the assertions of his respect for law and order, who is so frequent in his imputations against others of failing to entertain a similar respect for them, ought to pause in his career; and I, for one, will never agree to permit such sentiments to pass unnoticed or uncondemned so long as I have a place in this body.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I could have wished that the honorable member from Massachusetts, by whom this resolution was offered, had not deemed it his duty to present it; and I think if he had consulted with his friends on both sides of the Chamber perhaps he would not have offered it. On every account it is exceedingly desirable that we should avoid as far as possible every occasion for unnecessary excitement; and above all should avoid taking any step that may be likely to produce a conflict between the Government of the United States and the government of any one of the States. To expel a Senator is a very grave matter; and there is additional gravity in it if it be probable that the opinion expressed by the Senator, and which is the cause of his expulsion, may be shared in by the government of the State he represents. I admit that there are causes which should lead to the expulsion of a Senator, but they ought to be very plain and obvious, addressing themselves to the intelligence and to the assent of all true men of the country.

The resolution offered by the honorable member from Massachusetts rests, and upon its face is made to rest, exclusively upon what he supposes was the treasonable character of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky. Mere differences of opinion between the Senator from Kentucky and the Senator from Massachusetts would not, I am sure, in his own judgment, have led him to offer such a resolution. It is because he is satisfied, and thinks that in that he cannot be mistaken, that in the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky there is the plain avowal of a treasonable purpose. Nobody, therefore, I am sure, would be more willing than the honorable member from Massachusetts to vote against his own proposition if he could be satisfied that there was nothing in the resolutions offered by the honorable member from Kentucky liable to the construction which he gives to them. It is therefore my purpose, in the very few remarks which I rise to address to the Senate, to inquire whether there is in those resolutions taken together, or either of them considered by itself, without referring to its context, any treasonable opinion; or, to state it in different words, whether the Senator has gone beyond the latitude which a Senator has a right to occupy.

Freedom of speech in this body is secured by constitutional guarantee. Freedom of debate is of course secured in the same way; and as a consequence from it freedom of opinion is likewise guaranteed, unless you adopt what in my judgment is a very unconstitutional view of the Constitution of the United States, and the obligation which it imposes upon citizens and members of Congress, that the Government of the United States consists alone in the Executive of the United States, and that he who impeaches the conduct of that Executive is to be assumed as assailing the Government of the United States, and disloyal because he does assail the Government of the United States. As far as my reading goes, it was never pretended until lately by any member of Congress, or by any member of the executive of the United States, or by anything to be found in any of the newspapers in the country, that there was any disloyalty in calling in question the constitutionality of the conduct of the Executive. Nobody will now dispute, or does dispute, that there is no unconstitutionality in calling into doubt the policy which the Executive may think proper to pursue, and until the times in which we live I have never understood that there was anything disloyal considered as existing merely because a member of Congress or a citizen of the United States not holding the relation that a member of Congress does to the Constitution of the United States, denounces the conduct of the Executive. It seems from that article of the Constitution which provides for a Senate and House of Representatives to be termed the Congress, vesting in that body nearly all the powers of the Government, so far as the policy of the Government is concerned, as there is rarely ever any policy which must not grow directly or indirectly out of congressional legislation, that it was not the purpose of our forefathers to give to the legislators the authority to call in question the conduct of the Executive. On the contrary, I have supposed that we were placed here as the guardians of the people of the United States, to watch the conduct of the executive branch of the Government; to denounce, if any member thought they were going beyond the limits of their own authority, their conduct; to keep them within their legitimate limits.

In the war of 1812, as will be seen by a reference to the debates which are handed down to us in the Annals of Congress, you will find that hardly a subject was debated involving the policy of that war in which the Executive was not denounced, and denounced in the most acrimonious terms; but nobody at that time of day thought of offering a resolution in either branch that the member who so denounced the Executive should be expelled.

In the Mexican war, this Chamber, or the Chamber at that time occupied by the Senate, was electrified by the eloquence of a Senator from Ohio, who was bitterly opposed to that war, who charged it as an unauthorized act on the part of the Executive, with which Congress in its origin had nothing to do, and invoked in words of burning eloquence, as a boon which he hoped Heaven in mercy would grant to the American people, that the soldiers in the armies of the United States who were ordered to invade Mexico would be met by bloody hands and hospitable graves. Nobody dreamed of offering a resolution to expel that Senator; and the body was composed then of men just as anxious to keep the Constitution from being unnecessarily invaded and just as determined to put down treason as we can challenge for ourselves.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the Senator will allow me, I think he does unintentional injustice to the distinguished gentleman whom he quotes. I think he said, if he were a Mexican he would so welcome the invader; not that he as an American hoped they would be so welcomed.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator may be right as to the particular phraseology; but I do not see much difference between them. If our armies are to be sent into Mexico, and a Senator of the United States says to Mexico, "Meet them with bloody hands and hospitable graves, that is your duty," I rather think, according to the modern doctrine, it would be considered as giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and the party who indulged in it would be subject to the modern law of expulsion.

But in a war as among ourselves—I mean among the people of the United States, having no foreign operation—when the President of the United States thought proper, and I have no doubt he was sincere in the belief that he had the authority, to remove from the Bank of the United States the deposit of the public funds, and dismissed one Secretary who refused upon conscientious ground to do it, and selected another who had no such conscientious ground, and by whom the removal was ordered, there were no words of burning import known to our language that were not hurled day after day upon the head of the then President of the United States by the most distinguished men of this body. It went to such an extent that it awakened the ire of the incumbent of the presidential chair, and he sent to Congress a protest, in which he assailed the conduct of the Senate, not so much upon the ground that, independent of the particular function with which they were clothed by the Constitution of the United States of trying impeachments, they had not a right to assail his conduct to any extent they saw proper, but that because they were to be his judges upon an impeachment, and because the acts assailed, if correctly assailed, were acts for which there should be an impeachment, he protested against it. Whether he was right, or whether the Senate was right, is a matter not before us.

But, Mr. President, if we take counsel from the mother country, and go into the Houses of Parliament, from their very origin, after the principles of liberty were well understood, down to the present hour, we find members of the House of Lords and members of the House of Commons assailing in the broadest terms the conduct, not of the king or of the queen, because the legal fiction is, and the practical result is, that the king can do no wrong, but assailing the advisers of the king. Senators need not be reminded of these things, because these are historic facts that are impressed in early age upon the memory of every American boy. They are the lessons of his youth, and until recently they have become still more impressed upon the memory and sanctioned by the judgment, that it is not only the right but the duty of a representative to assail the conduct of the Executive.

What said Chatham before they resolved and after they had resolved to impose the stamp tax, before they resolved and after they had resolved to impose the tea tax, and when, in order to render those acts of Parliament effective, they resolved to enforce them by arms, and to call to their aid the savages? I have forgotten the precise language; but the Government, or rather the advisers of the king, were assailed in a strain of bitter and indignant eloquence that thrilled through the United States, and served to nerve the arm of every American. Nobody dreamed of censuring Lord Chatham; and when, in a more philosophic speech, just as eloquent, and which will live for a longer period than any words that Chatham has ever uttered, at a subsequent period the conduct of the Government was assailed by Burke in terms as strong as any that are to be found in the resolutions offered by the honorable member from Kentucky, nobody in the House of Commons dreamed of censuring Burke, much less of expelling him. "I rejoice"—I thank my friend from Maine [Mr. Fessenden] for giving me the first word—"I rejoice that America has resisted." Suppose the Senator from Kentucky in his place had said or should have inserted in these resolutions, "I rejoice that the seceded States are in arms defying your power," what would you do? Expel him?

Sir, that was not the freedom that England enjoyed in those days; and what has been the result of that unlimited freedom of debate? Look where England is now; the freest Government on the face of the earth, where private property and personal rights are hedged around more effectually than they are even among ourselves. The power of the king, comparatively, is as nothing when taken in connection with the power of the President of the United States. His policy of to-day, just as may be the opinion of the House of Commons, ceases to be, in spite of him, his policy for the morrow. They speak the public opinion, and the public opinion is potential. They must surrender up the reins of government, and hand them to more acceptable hands. Not so with us. Whether wisely or not is not the question; but it is not so with us. The very spirit which gave rise to and which sanctioned the freedom of debate to which I have adverted, has kept alive the sense of constitutional freedom, which burns now as bright as it ever did in any age of the history of that Government, and brighter.

What is our condition? I am not here to assail the Executive. The Senate, I hope, know that I have never assailed the Executive. As far as any limited assistance that I thought it was my duty to give him extended, it has been freely given. I have differed from political friends as to the propriety of some of the advice which at his solicitation I did give; but I have seen no reason to doubt the soundness of that advice. I happened to be here—if I may be permitted to refer to myself at all—at the origin of these troubles, and every day in association with that gallant old chief who is now wearing honors which he richly deserves. I was with him almost every hour of every day, and among a variety of questions on which he thought the interests of the public depended was the extent or the existence of the presidential power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. The Chief Justice of the United States decided that it could not be done except by Congress. That that was a conscientious opinion by that reverend and accomplished jurist, I have no doubt. With all the respect in which I held his opinions, I differed with him. The President was made aware of that difference. I was requested to write it out. I wrote it out and caused it to be published, and it was afterwards published with my own name to it. I thought then, and I think now, that the President, as he was then situated, had the right to suspend the writ of habeas corpus. I mention this only for the purpose of showing that I am not an assailant of the President. I think he has done wrong. Which of us has not? I think he has been mistaken in a part of his policy. That does not lead me to say a word against his purpose, or to call in question his loyalty, or his devotion to the Government, or the honesty with which he is seeking to put an end to this rebellion.

I say, therefore, to the honorable member from Kentucky that there is very little in these resolutions that would receive my support if they should be before the Senate for rejection or adoption. I think the honorable member is mistaken in some of the constitutional views which are incorporated in these resolutions; and when I say that, I am far from saying that there is to be found in any such mistake any evidence even tending to prove disloyalty upon the part of the honorable member from Kentucky. I am somewhat sorry that he is present, because in some measure it restrains me from speaking of him as I feel. I have known him for years. He denounced with all the power that he could call into existence the annexation of Texas. He denounced the supposed purpose of annexing Cuba. He denounced the Mexican war, though a southern man. To be sure, he did not stand alone; there were a great many others who agreed with him on the same subject; but he was warring against the general sentiment. His love of country and his attachment to the Constitution forced him, as he thought, to take as his motto that policy which the Constitution alone authorized, although in taking such a position he went against the sentiment of his section.

Now, my friend from Massachusetts thinks that he sees in these resolutions not error—if his criticism on the resolutions went to that extent only he and I would be found together—but treason, treason to the United States; a purpose to aid the rebellion. The honorable member cannot know what has been the course of the member from Kentucky since this treason originated. He has passed the years of military duty, I presume. His own State, illustrious for many reasons—the Senate is as familiar with the fact as I am—was invaded by the hordes of these treasonable conspirators. The effort was to force the State out of the Union, to inaugurate another allegiance, to break up the Government, and that "traitor" as he is—according to the view taken by the honorable member from Massachusetts—is found more than a hundred miles from his home with his musket on his shoulder, a private in the ranks, to beat back the rebel invaders. What I say I know of my own knowledge. He boasts not of it. He is too truly loyal; he has too much good taste to boast of anything personal to himself. In the same ranks with him were seven nephews, who looked to him as their friend and counselor, who are now in the Army of the United States—those of them that survive. Two of them I believe have fallen in their attempt to support the Government of the United States.

The honorable member, too, so warm was his patriotism—I hope he will pardon me for speaking of him personally—went to an extent that I thought he was not justified in going. He had a colleague on this floor. He believed, honestly believed, that the sentiments which that colleague entertained were not loyal, and he supported a resolution for his expulsion on that account alone. Their personal relations were always friendly. The private honor of his colleague he never doubted; but he believed he had been led astray by the madness with which he was surrounded, and had proved false in his duty to his country. The Senate took a different view, and I have no doubt correctly took a different view of it. His colleague is here still differing with the majority of the Senate, certainly differing with me individually, upon many questions which grow out of the hour; but in his heart he is just as true to what he considers to be the Constitution of the United States as any man who ever represented the State of Kentucky on this floor.

What else did he do? I do not know that he offered the resolution, but he certainly supported it, for the expulsion of a late Senator from Indiana. What for? For what he supposed to be disloyalty; and what was the evidence of it? Writing an introductory letter to Jefferson Davis, and styling him president of the confederate States, and telling him that the man he introduced was the inventor of some gun, and recommending him to the attention of Jefferson Davis as president of the confederate States. That was conclusive evidence of disloyalty with the honorable member from Kentucky. He made the proposition and sustained it in debate. The Senate sustained it. Was he a traitor then? The facts show he could not have been. Was he an imbecile then? Did he not know what his duty to the Government was then? Everybody knows that imbecility cannot be applied to him. The fact of his having voted and spoken in support of the two resolutions to which I have adverted is conclusive to show that in his opinion a Senator of the United States should not to any extent be disloyal.

Now, what has he done? Up to the time that he offered these resolutions did anybody think of proposing that he should be expelled from the Senate of the United States? A member of some of your most important committees, acting with you upon the many measures of moment that have been before the Senate after he became a member, what indication has he given, up to the moment when these resolutions were offered, that he was not true to his constitutional duty? I never heard of any. He is a party man, and, perhaps, if he will permit me to say so, he carries his party feelings to an imprudent extent. Is he the only member of the Senate who suffers party to carry him beyond the limits to which party should go in a crisis like this? That question almost answers itself. I am not calling into doubt at all the correctness of the conduct of any Senator as far as depends upon the intent which governs his conduct; but I say it most respectfully, leaving myself open to the same remark, that in my opinion, upon various occasions since this war commenced, party has had rather an illegitimate influence. But does that make him who indulges in it disloyal? He might say in reply, the freedom of the country cannot be maintained without parties; the condition of parties keeps alive the spirit of liberty, and restrains the excesses of executive or legislative power.

The honorable member from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] yesterday, in the very excellent speech that he made in support of the resolutions that were then before the Senate, and which was prepared, denounced a law on our statute-book as infamous, as one which did not challenge the assent or the aid of any man with a heart in his bosom and a spark of freedom within his soul. Did anybody dream of saying that he was not to continue a member of the Senate because that opinion, in the judgment of any one Senator who might think proper to offer such a resolution, was unconstitutional? Certainly not.

The honorable member from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE], more than once in discharging what he supposed to be his duty, has called in question not only the capacity, but the honesty of some of the Departments of the Government. He has not assailed the President, but he has assailed the Departments, and the President only acts through his departmental officers. That the honorable member thinks that he has good ground for making the assault, I do not question. I hope it will turn out that the grounds in point of fact are not well founded; but that he entertains the conviction that the information upon which he has acted in so denouncing one of the Departments of the Government is information upon which it is not only his right but his duty to act, I do not doubt. He said:

"I declare upon my responsibility as a Senator, that the liberties of this country are in greater danger to-day from the corruptious and from the profligacy practiced in the various Departments of the Government, than they are from the enemy in the open field."

I do not think so; but he does. I have no doubt there are corruptions. A war like this involving an expenditure of thousands of millions of dollars, is not to be carried on without a considerable deal of picking and stealing; but that any of the higher members of the Government are parties to any corruption of that description I will not believe till forced to believe it by proof that leaves no doubt; and then I will hang my head in shame when I am forced to believe it. Did any one dream of expelling the honorable member from New Hampshire? And yet a speech like that read in the halls of the confederate congress, read at the head of the confederate armies, anybody sees is calculated to give aid and comfort.

But there are other things, Mr. President, to be considered beside the influence of opinion in relation to our own Government, expressed from time to time upon the floor of this body or in the other House. What would be the state of the country if they were prohibited? Suppose the honorable member from New Hampshire is right—I have a right to suppose it—that corruption is to be found everywhere, that no department of the Government is exempt from it, that it is sapping the foundations of our power, diminishing our strength; ought he not to tell it, or is he to wait until the time shall come when all will tumble into ruins by the rottenness of the original foundation; for what is the foundation on which we stand, on which the Government stands? Freedom, not wild and licentious, freedom under the law, freedom secured by the law, freedom restrained by the law; and, as a general rule, a Senator who believes that wrong is being done has not only a right, but it is an obligation, to rise in his place and denounce it.

Now, Mr. President, the honorable member from Michigan has told us—to that extent I agree with his speech, I would not change a word or a letter of it—that war is war. That I admit; and I also admit that subjugation is subjugation by force. The honorable member said the other day, as I understood him—but of course I understood him incorrectly, because he so states—that the subjugation which he meant was that subjugation which might perhaps not be within the power of the Government to accomplish until every dollar of the money and every man of the loyal States was exhausted.

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Maryland will pardon me for correcting him?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. What I said the other day was that I believed the people of the loyal States were not such fools as to lose one hundred and fifty thousand or two hundred thousand lives in the prosecution of this war, and spend a vast amount of treasure, and after that turn around and say to traitors who might present themselves here for admission to this body with their hands dripping with blood, "You are welcome to this body." I believe that was the sentiment which I uttered the other day. I certainly did not say that I would expend the last dollar and the last drop of blood in the loyal States before I would see such an admission as that; but that seems to have been the construction which the Senator from Maryland put upon my words, or rather his misapprehension of my language. I certainly never said any such thing as that. What I mean now to say, and what I do say, is that I would fight this war through for the restoration of the Union and the reestablishment of the Constitution and laws of the United States so long as I could find a man, woman, or child in the loyal States willing to contribute a dollar or able to raise a musket or push a bayonet. That is my opinion.

Mr. JOHNSON. Of course, Mr. President, it was my misapprehension. I know the Senator too well to suppose that he would state away anything that he had before stated to the Senate. He is not in the habit of expressing himself without reflection, and he generally adheres to what he has said, and very properly.

According to the honorable member's statement to-day of what he means by subjugation, there is no difference between him and the Senator from Kentucky, or, as far as I know, any Senator upon the floor. If he means that this war should be carried on until the rebel military power is put an end to, or, in his own language, that the subjugation by war should be carried to the extent of putting an end to the military power of the rebellion, he and the Senator from Kentucky can shake hands. Has anybody heard the Senator from Kentucky say that that military power was not to be broken down; that the rebellion was not to be arrested; that the Constitution of the United States was not to be reinstated? Certainly not.

Now, Mr. President, a word upon the meaning of one or two of these resolutions, and I shall cease to trouble the Senate. I may be mistaken, but I do not think I am, in the opinion that there is nothing in any one of these resolutions that indicates any revolutionary purpose. That they do not meet with my approval, I have already said; and the probability is that they will not meet the approval of any other member of the Senate than the Senator who offers them; but that is not the question. Did he mean in offering them to subvert the Government of the United States by force? I think not. In the first place, it would be dealing very harshly with the member from Kentucky to put that interpretation upon his resolutions, or any one of his resolutions, when he tells you in his place in the Senate orally and in writing that he dreamed of no such thing; it was not in his mind's eye at all; what he meant was that the people should come to the rescue—how? Is there anything treasonable in invoking the people? Whose Government is it? Is it not the Government of the people? If I understood the honorable member from Michigan, there are only two of these resolutions which are obnoxious to that charge. One is the fourteenth resolution, which is "that the present executive Government of the United States has subverted, for the time, in large portions of the loyal States," certain securities of liberty which are enumerated.

What does that mean? Taken in connection with the context, it only means that the Executive has violated the Constitution of the United States. Is that opinion peculiar to the Senator from Kentucky? Have we not heard it said upon this floor with reference to some of the acts of the Departments of the Government? Certainly we have; or, what amounts to the same thing, that, having no authority to expend money except when laws for the appropriation of the money have been passed, the War Department has expended money without such authority, and to that extent has violated the Constitution; but it was justified upon the ground of necessity. What is meant, then, by the term "subverted," as used in this connection, simply is that the President of the United States has transcended the power conferred upon him by the Constitution, and that by so transcending he did for the time subvert the Constitution; in other words, what he did was not under the Constitution but outside of the Constitution.

Then it goes on to speak of the trial of parties charged with crime by courts-martial; and I was a little surprised to hear the honorable member from Michigan say that because the conclusion of that resolution is that all which is stated in the preceding part of the resolution (one of which is the use of courts-martial) "must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people," he considered the Senator from Kentucky as calling upon the sovereign people to violate the Constitution by force of arms, because as he said courts-martial were known to the Constitution and there was no way to get rid of courts-martial except by some authority paramount to the Constitution; and that, consequently, when the people were asked to subvert the trial by court-martial, to sweep it away, it was meant that the people should take the law into their own hands, and by force of arms drive away the President and those who are acting as his judges upon these military courts. If I understand the honorable member from Michigan correctly, he is under the impression that that cannot be done under the Constitution, because courts-martial are known to the military law, and an Army and a Navy are provided for by the Constitution, and that courts-martial therefore are known to and provided for by the Constitution, and cannot be dispensed with.

That is something new to me. Congress have the authority to raise armies, and the exclusive authority. They have the authority to pass all laws and regulations necessary in their judgment to render their armies effective. Have they not the power to constitute a commission to try all offenses of a military description? I should not have supposed, if the honorable member from Michigan had not taken a different view, that there could be two opinions on that question. In the beginning of the Government and during the war of 1812, if Senators will reflect back upon some of the questions which that contest gave rise to, it was the admitted constitutional rule that, although courts-martial were not dispensed with by legislation, they could not be made to try constitutionally any other offenders than those who belonged to the Army and Navy proper; not civilians hanging about the camp, not contractors—

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Maryland will excuse me?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. Do I understand him to convey the idea that in the naval service and the military service of the United States, courts-martial can be dispensed with?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly I do.

Mr. HOWARD. Then the Senator will pardon me for another question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. HOWARD. How will he carry out the provision that in all trials under the laws of the United States except these, the accused shall be entitled to trial by jury? How is he going to carry out that provision? How is he going to call a jury in the military service of the United States?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is a question of expediency, and not a question of constitutional law.

Mr. HOWARD. No, sir, it is a question of power.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will answer the honorable Senator in a moment. The provision to which he adverts was inserted in the Constitution in order to prevent everybody from being tried by courts-martial or any other tribunal that Congress in its wisdom might think proper to adopt. It was inserted for the purpose of securing to every person the right of trial by jury; but upon considerations of policy, looking to the particular character of the naval and military service, it was deemed advisable to take out of that guarantee of trial by jury persons in the military or naval service. But nobody ever dreamed—I speak it with due respect—that it was in the power of Congress to say that persons committing military offenses might not be tried by a jury or by a commission. How is it now? A man commits murder on board one of your ships; he is brought into the United States; the murder is committed upon the high seas; he comes into a district of the United States; do you try him by court-martial? Certainly not. You indict him, try him for murder under the laws of the United States, as you must do, it being an offense committed out of the jurisdiction of a particular State; but it would be something extraordinary that Congress, who are authorized to make rules and regulations for the land and naval forces, could not by regulation provide a different mode of trying offenders in the land or naval forces than the particular mode guaranteed to the citizen who commits some criminal offense, not being a member of the military or the naval service.

The honorable member seems to suppose that in that sentence in one of these resolutions which says that treason may be committed against a State by the President of the United States, there is treason. In what does the treason consist? It has been doubted whether there can be treason as against a State; but the doubt no longer exists. Mr. Justice Story—I speak from recollection—intimates an opinion that as an original question it might be doubtful, not because a State has not the authority to punish treason, but because the same act that constitutes treason as against a State is necessarily an act that constitutes treason against the United States, and as the authority of the United States is an authority paramount to the authority of the States, with reference to the power of trial, the first authority is merged in the second. But that doubt no longer exists. Were not persons tried for treason in the State of Rhode Island? The case came up to the Supreme Court. Did lawyer or judge intimate an opinion that there was no authority to try him who attempted to subvert by force of arms the constitution of Rhode Island? Certainly not. Well, if there can be treason against a State, then every man who comes into a State owes allegiance to it, and if he commits an act which will be treason as against the State, if committed by a citizen of the State, he is equally liable to trial and to punishment. Suppose the President of the United States goes into the State of Kentucky without authority, in the attitude of a dictator, a usurper, seeks to trample upon the rights of Kentucky, to subvert her constitution and laws by force of arms, does he not commit treason? How is he to defend himself? Should he be indicted, he will hold up the Constitution, and say, "Here is my protection; you have no right to interfere with me; I am the leader of the armies of the United States by force of this instrument." The answer will at once be, "That is true; but your power is limited; you have no authority to do any acts except such as are necessary by you to be done in executing the laws of the United States and seeing that the integrity of the United States is subserved, and you have no authority to war as against the constitution of any State." It would consolidate the Government at once, as far as the President is concerned. Members of Congress could not do it with impunity; but according to the theory of the honorable member from Michigan, a President of the United States may march with his cohorts throughout the loyal States or throughout any of the States of the Union, break down their trials by jury, disregard their election laws, set at defiance their constitution, and do it by force of arms, and can do it with perfect legal impunity. I think that in that particular the honorable member is clearly mistaken.

Now, sir, the only other objectionable expression is a word to be found in the thirteenth resolution of the series, and it is principally on the meaning of that word that the honorable member from Massachusetts, who offered the resolution of expulsion, rests the propriety of that resolution. It says:

"That at the beginning of the war, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power professed to carry it on for the Constitution, and to put down the rebellion and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease."

That looks a good deal like truth, according to my recollection of the fact.

"But more than a year ago another, and a paramount and unconstitutional one, the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them."

Then he goes on to state what has been since unconstitutionally done, as he thinks. About that there are differences of opinion, and very honest differences of opinion; and his opinion being that all these acts are acts of constitutional violation he goes on to say that—

"Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war-leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers," &c.

It is said that the word "revolt" as there used necessarily means, and must have been intended by the Senator to mean, revolt by force of arms, the rising up of the people in their might, regardless of constitutional restrictions, putting down the President. Now, in the first place, the honorable member from Kentucky says that he used the word with no such purpose. That, as I think, ought to be sufficient. A man who uses an expression in court which, according to the judge's interpretation of it and the correct interpretation of it unexplained, is a contempt, is always permitted, in every court that I know of, to purge himself of the contempt by saying that he had no such purpose as that imputed to him. Would you apply a harder rule to a Senator? You say he meant it. Why? Because you would have meant it if you had used the same word. But does everybody place the same meaning upon the same language? Since this session commenced have we not been obliged, each one of us, to explain away something that had been misunderstood? We certainly have. Are we not all liable to blunders, if they be blunders, of that description? And when the Senator says to you, "No matter what may be the meaning of the term 'revolt,' as that term may be defined in Webster or Richardson or Worcester, or anywhere else, I tell you, upon my honor as a Senator, I meant no such thing as to convey to the public the meaning which you attribute," ought not that to be sufficient? What would the honorable member from Massachusetts think if he had used an expression that was alleged to be disloyal, disrespectful to the Senate, insulting to any individual Senator, and he was arraigned at the bar of the Senate to account for such an expression, and said that he did not mean what was attributed to him, if the Senate should act upon the assumption that he told a falsehood, that he did mean it, and attempted to avoid responsibility by a false and unfounded explanation? His heart would rise at once almost into his throat, and say that a greater injustice never was perpetrated upon an honorable man than to call in question the truth of his own statement.

And how is this explanation made? By whom is it made? Is the honorable member from Kentucky so forgetful of what is due to himself as a man of honor and a Senator as to seek to retain his place on this floor by a mere pitiful evasion, and above all by a falsehood? I beg his pardon for supposing even hypothetically that such a thing could be said of him. We saw the contrary feeling exemplified this morning. He who has only now ceased to be a member of this body [referring to Mr. Bayard] told you that he took that oath to save himself from the imputation of disloyalty which the public might cast upon him from really not knowing his character, but he intended to resign his post because he believed that the Senate had transcended its constitutional power in exacting that oath at his hands, and because he believed that the precedent was full of evil to the country. He has long been a member of this body, and in every instance when he gave his time and attention to its deliberations one of the most intelligent and effective men in the body, proud of the title, a title that almost descended to him from an ancestor of whom he might if possible be still more proud; but yet he told you, and told you from his heart, as you saw in the words in which he uttered it, that he could not forfeit his self-respect by remaining in this body, and, as he felt that that respect would be forfeited by remaining, he surrendered his trust into the hands of his State. So would the Senator from Kentucky rather, ten thousand times rather, surrender the commission with which his State has honored him than attempt to hold it by a miserable evasion and falsehood. All that he means, therefore, as I understand him, even without his explanation, is that the people of the country are to take the matter into their own hands, and apply for themselves the remedy. How are they to do it? Not outside of the Constitution, but under the Constitution.

But, says the honorable member from Michigan—and the honorable member from Massachusetts who offered the resolution stated, as I recollect, the same thing in the speech with which he opened this debate—the treasonable purpose of the resolution of the Senator from Kentucky is evidenced by the fact that he speaks of the people meeting in national convention. Well, I should like to know if the people have not the right to meet in convention. Cannot the people of the United States, if they think proper, meet where they please, for what purpose they please, if the purpose be constitutional? That is a question that I supposed nobody could doubt about. Do they not meet in national convention, or are not their representatives supposed so to meet, when they nominate a candidate for the Presidency? Certainly. Is that national convention provided for in the Constitution? Certainly not. The whole object of the system which has been in force for the last thirty or forty years, of having national conventions, is merely to embody the public sentiment, and nothing else; and if they have a right to meet in national convention to embody the public sentiment of the country in reference to who shall be President and Vice President of the United States, I want to know if the people have not the right to do the same thing as concerns the policy of the Government. It may be dangerous; it may lead to mischief; and I am not here an advocate of that mode of correcting the alleged grievance if it exist; but I address myself exclusively to the constitutional question, and I appeal to Senators to look at the Constitution and point out any single provision in it which denies the people of the United States the right to meet in convention, or to call it national or international or any other name by which they think proper to baptize it. That national convention is, among other things, "to terminate the war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilsmen in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections," &c.

How are they "to terminate the war?" Through the constituted authorities of the Union bringing to bear upon them the public opinion of the country, telling Senators "what you are doing is leading to ruin," telling members "what you are doing, instead of subjugating the military power of the rebels serves but to coalesce it, to add to it." And I say with all the solemnity with which an opinion can be expressed by a Senator, that in my judgment the ultra measures which now seem to be the favorite measures of the Government, that is to say, the measure of destroying slavery in the States, of enforcing the confiscation laws, of distributing the lands among the loyal soldiers or among blacks, do more to keep alive the rebellion than any one cause, or perhaps all causes combined; and it does it because it gives the means to the leaders of this dreadful rebellion of working upon the fears and the apprehensions of the masses of the people, keeping them up toward the last in order to preserve what they are made to believe, and do believe, are their rights.

I submit, therefore, Mr. President—asking pardon for having trespassed upon the Senate so long, certainly much longer than I intended—that I was very sincere in what I said when I rose to address the Senate, that I could have wished the honorable member from Massachusetts had not presented the resolution which gives rise to this debate, not only for the reasons which I have indicated, but because it was calculated to produce very unkind feelings among the members, illustrated by the passages which passed between the honorable Senator and the Senator from Kentucky, which, I am sure, everybody will agree should always be avoided, if it is possible to avoid them consistent with duty. Our deliberations are sure to be more conducive to the public interest if we avoid all personalities and apply ourselves exclusively to the business of preserving the institutions of the country and putting down the rebellion which seeks to destroy them.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, it is obvious that the Senate is to divide on the question under consideration; and before the vote is taken, I wish to say a few words in explanation of the vote I shall give.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I rise to ask my colleague, as the hour is late, whether he wishes to go on this evening?

Mr. MORRILL. I will do just as the Senate please in that particular. I am at the pleasure of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. WILSON. I hope the motion to adjourn will be withdrawn, so that we may have a short executive session in order to confirm an Assistant Secretary of War.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. WILSON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 26, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The SPEAKER laid before the House certain depositions in the contested-election case of James Lindsay vs. John G. Scott, from the third congressional district of Missouri; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

CLAIM OF GENERAL GARRARD AND OTHERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to the resolution of the House of January 18, 1864, transmitting papers relative to the claim of General T. J. Garrard and others, for the destruction of their salt and salt-works in January, 1862; which was referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to withdraw from the files of the House the papers in the cases of John P. Sherburne, H. Clay Wood, and D. L. Moulton.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is the usual rule to leave copies of the papers.

Mr. ROLLINS, of New Hampshire. I have no objection to that.

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection, leave will be granted for the withdrawal of the papers, if copies are left on file. The Chair hears no objection.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the regular order of business, being the consideration of joint resolution of the House, No. 18, reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, in reviewing this disastrous and desolating war, I am sure that posterity will refer to the legislation of the last Congress as one of the most eventful incidents of our history, which, whether regarded in reference to the magnitude of the questions involved or the interests involved, or indeed the novelty of those questions, was the most remarkable and extraordinary convention that ever assembled in this or any other country, in this or any other age. Precipitately called together to deal with these new and great questions, it would indeed have been extraordinary if it had not made mistakes, and I think it cannot be charged that we criticize too severely either the patriotism or the wisdom of the last Congress when we say that it did make mistakes. The proposition now before the House is one that grows as a natural result, not only of hasty legislation, but of that class of legislation which seeks to accomplish its own objects without reference or regard to the organic law which should control every department of our Government. The joint resolution reported from the Judiciary Committee proposes in effect to repeal the joint resolution adopted on the 17th of July, 1862, which joint resolution was explanatory, or rather constructive, of the confiscation act. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution now before the House.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the last clause of a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862, be, and the same hereby is, so amended as to read, "nor shall any punishment or proceeding under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the estate of the offender except during his life." This amendment being intended to limit the operation and effect of the said resolution and act, and the same are hereby limited, only so far as to make them conformable to section three of article three of the Constitution of the United States: Provided, That no other public warning or proclamation under the act of July 17, 1862, chapter ninety-five, section six, is, or shall be, required than the proclamation of the President made and published by him on the 25th day of July, 1862, which proclamation so made shall be received and held sufficient in all cases now pending, or which may hereafter arise under said act.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. As directly bearing, Mr. Speaker, upon the question of confiscation, it is necessary to go back for a few moments to refer to the circumstances attending the passage of that law. It will be remembered that both Houses of Congress had the question before them simultaneously, that the question was very thoroughly discussed, and that the two Houses disagreed as to the peculiar features of the bill, and a conference committee was appointed between the two Houses. On the part of this House the chairman of the Judiciary Committee and a distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts constituted the committee; and on the part of the Senate a distinguished gentleman from New Hampshire, and another gentleman from New York, constituted the conference committee. About this time, sir, and at the very moment that the confiscation act was being passed through both Houses of Congress, it was suspected that the President of the United States would veto the bill. If it be in order, (as to which I have some doubt,) I desire the Clerk to read what took place in the Senate as part of the history of this legislation.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the resolution."—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Let me interpose

the remark here that this is the clause of the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, which it is now proposed to repeal. The House had adopted a joint resolution and sent it to the Senate, and it was then that this debate occurred.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"Mr. CLARK. I move to amend the resolution by adding:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

"Mr. TRUMBULL. I cannot consent to that amendment. The Senate will observe it is a very important amendment. It provides that you shall confiscate the real estate only for life. What will that amount to? What is a life estate worth in lands in the West, where these traitors chiefly hold their real estate? It is not worth anything; it amounts to nothing. According to the principles of this bill, I think there can be no question about the constitutional power to seize the property of these traitors who have run away. Take the case which I have so often alluded to in the Senate, that of Mr. Slidell, who owns forty thousand acres of land in the State of Illinois. You cannot reach Mr. Slidell to punish him; you cannot institute proceedings against him; he is not in the country; probably never will be in the country; yet he has property in my State which would probably sell for $100,000 some time ago, which would probably sell for $100,000 now. The life estate in that property is not worth anything; it would not sell for anything. It seems to me there is no trouble in reaching that property. I cannot consent to this amendment. I do not wish to take up time at this stage of the session, but I trust the amendment will not be agreed to by the Senate."

"Mr. CLARK. I trust the amendment will be agreed to. It may be sometimes desirable to secure as much as we can, if we cannot get all we wish. I would desire to get the real estate in fee; but if we cannot do that, it may be worth while for us to consider whether we will not take the personal property of the individual and the real estate for life, if we cannot get the estate in fee."

"Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to know by what authority the Senator says we cannot get any more, because if we are acting under a kind of duress, I want to understand it."

"Mr. CLARK. I do not say that we are acting under any duress; but it may be that there may be objections to the bill as it now stands, somewhere, and it may be that an amendment like this will cure the difficulty and enable us to get over it. I suggest to Senators whether it may not be better to adopt the amendment in that view of it, rather than to reject it."

"Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator from New Hampshire will state to us in explicit language that the President of the United States will veto the bill unless we pass this amendment, I am in favor of passing it; but I want to throw that responsibility upon those who ought properly to assume it. I will not shrink myself, and I do not want anybody else to shrink. If the President desires to say that in his view of the Constitution—and I do not criticize him—he wishes this amendment in order to enable him conscientiously to sign the bill, I will pass it; but I want him to take that position before the people of the United States. So far as the life estate to wild lands in the West is concerned, it is a simple absurdity to talk of seizing it and deriving anything from it. The leading traitors of this country have been speculating very largely in western lands, and they have great quantities of them. I think we ought to seize them and sell them, and use the proceeds to put down their rebellion. The idea that we may draw a distinction in a military operation between a life estate and an estate in fee, I think is an absurdity. That will do very well for the courts to talk about; but it has no application to this case. Still, if the President rests his objection to any bill we have passed on that ground, I am ready to vote for this resolution in order to remove the objection; but I want him to take the responsibility of saying so. If the Senator says that he is authorized, or feels authorized, to say that the President objects to the bill we have passed because of the two grounds named here, then I am perfectly willing to relieve him by passing this amendatory resolution; but I want him to assume the responsibility, and not to take it myself."

"Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I think I may say that I am authorized to declare that I do know that that is one of the objections made to the bill by the President, and it is with a view of removing that objection and inducing his signature to the bill that I offer this amendment, not that it satisfies me."

"Mr. SHERMAN. Then I will vote for it."

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state to the gentleman from New York that this reading has been allowed by unanimous consent. By reference to page 77 of the Manual it will be seen that it is not in order to refer to what takes place in the other branch of Congress; for it is stated that it may lead to misunderstanding between the two Houses.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I was aware of that. When I asked that the passage might be read, I think that I stated that I doubted whether it was strictly in order.

The SPEAKER. It was allowed by unanimous consent.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I have felt compelled to refer to these proceedings of the Senate to show that the proposition now before the House is to repeal a measure that was adopted to avoid a presidential veto; that what it is proposed to abolish was insisted upon by the President as a prerequisite to his approval of the confiscation law.

Now, sir, what says the President himself? After the statement made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] the Senate concurred in this amendment, and it was sent to the President of the United States, the confiscation law having been already in his hands. On the 17th of July, 1862, he sent this message to Congress:

"Fellow-Citizens of the House of Representatives:

"Considering the bill 'for an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes,' and the joint resolution explanatory of said act as being substantially one, I have approved and signed both. Before I was informed of the resolution I had prepared the draft of a message stating objections to the bill becoming a law, a copy of which draft is herewith submitted."

Accompanying that message he also sent a draft of the veto referred to, and therein he uses this language:

"That to which I chiefly object pervades most part of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, seventh, and eighth sections. It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divesting of title forever."

"For the causes of treason and ingredients of treason, not amounting to the full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that 'no attainer shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted.' True, there is to be no formal attainer in this case; still I think the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted in a different form for the same offense."

"I may remark that the provision of the Constitution, put in language borrowed from Great Britain, applies only in this country, as I understand, to real or landed estate."

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I hazard nothing in saying that the resolution before the House is a fraud upon the President of the United States. The President approved both as one—the confiscation bill and the joint resolution which it is now proposed to repeal. He told Congress so. By the passage of this resolution we repeal the one and let the other stand. He was intrapped into an approval of confiscation by the joint resolution explanatory of it. You thus fraudulently obtained his approval, and now seek to repeal that which was the means of securing his assent. That is the first of my objections to this pending proposition.

Sir, the constitutional question has been argued here. It has been argued on both sides of the House with great ability. I do not feel myself capable of arguing a constitutional question. I cannot argue this one. I would as soon think of arguing that the sun was at meridian at twelve o'clock as that the Congress of the United States has not the power to confiscate estates beyond the lives of persons attainted of treason. If there is any proposition, if there is any restriction in the Constitution clearly and forcibly expressed, it is that in reference to this question:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

Treason is a crime, and the Constitution goes on to prescribe the punishment for treason, and the limitation on the power of Congress to punish it. It declares that "no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court." It provides in reference to crimes—and treason is a crime—that

"The trial of all crimes, except in cases of impeachment, shall be by jury; and such trial shall be held in the State where the said crimes shall have been committed; but when not committed within any State, the trial shall be at such place or places as the Congress may by law have directed."

It does not provide that it shall be by proclamation, but the trial shall be by jury. It further provides that—

"ART. VI. In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Therefore, sir, the Constitution not only states what shall constitute treason, it states what form of procedure shall be adopted to prove the fact, and what the punishment shall be. What is it?

"Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted."

It was argued here the other day that it had been recently discovered that in the original draft of the Constitution a comma had been detected.

Well now, sir, I am willing to go even further than that. I am willing to suppose, for instance, that the last clause of the punishment was entirely omitted, and that the provision stopped at the word "forfeiture." Even then, sir, it could not attain beyond the life of the party convicted. Webster's definition of "forfeiture" is, "the act of losing some right or privilege in regard to property. Forfeiture is a loss of the right to possess, but not of the actual possession. In the feudal system, forfeiture of land gives him in reversion or remainder a right to reënter."

Now, Mr. Speaker, the mere statement of the case, the mere reference to the Constitution, the mere quotation of the language, in my judgment, satisfactorily disposes of this question so far as the constitutional right of Congress is concerned to forfeit real estate beyond the life of the party convicted.

But suppose the confiscation proceeds against property in States now in rebellion, how as to the title to lands confiscated? When the American people get sober, the validity of the title to real estate thus acquired may be endangered. I would not give five dollars for any title that the Government of the United States can give under any law that Congress might pass beyond the life of the party convicted of treason, and convicted in due form according to the procedure set down by the Constitution, because if all these forms are not observed; if the accused is not tried in the "vicinage" where the offense is committed, where he belongs; if he has no opportunity to be confronted with his accusers; if he cannot have counsel to defend him, without a reference to the question how far the attainder may reach the heirs, informality of procedure invalidates the title. The day will come when these questions will be adjudicated by an honest and independent judiciary, and then these titles will be worth nothing.

But, Mr. Speaker, suppose that these objections to the confiscation did not exist, what should be said in this enlightened age of progress, civilization, and Christianity, of this theory of legislation? What will be thought of the American people, boasting of their freedom, advancement, and progress, calling themselves enlightened and Christian, of thus pursuing their own fellow-citizens with this spirit of unrelenting hate, desolation, and destruction, by carrying vengeance beyond the guilty party, even to his remotest posterity? Why, sir, Rome, the most inhuman monster of nations as against a prostrate foe, never went so far as that. Russia, emerging from a barbarous condition, (for she has not been recognized among the civilized nations of the world a century,) when she partitioned Poland, respected their widows and orphans. No Government has pursued a foe with such unrelenting, vindictive malignity as we are now pursuing those who came into the Union with us, whose blood has been freely shed on every battle-field of the country until now, with our own; who fought by our side in the American Revolution, and in the war of 1812 with Great Britain; who bore our banner bravest and highest in our victorious march from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, and who but yesterday sat in these Halls contributing toward the maintenance of our glorious institutions.

Sir, Edmund Burke discussed these questions in the British Parliament. He was not afraid of the epithet of traitor. He stood erect in the dignity of his manhood, inspired from above, (as I would to God we had such an one here,) denouncing tyranny and upholding freedom. His words are directly pertinent to the present proposition.

Mr. Burke says:

"I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people." * * * "In such unfortunate quarrels among the component parts of a great political union of communities I can scarcely conceive anything more completely imprudent than for the head of the empire to insist that if any privilege is pleaded against his will or his acts, that his whole authority is denied, instantly to proclaim rebellion, to beat to arms, and to put the offending provinces under the ban. Will not this, sir, very soon teach the provinces to make no distinction on their part? Will it not teach them that the Government against which a claim of liberty is tantamount to high treason is a Government to which submission is equivalent to slavery?"

Lord Chatham, in a speech "to put a stop to hostilities," delivered in the House of Lords May 30, 1797, speaks almost in the same words as the advocates of peace at the North do at this crisis:

"We have tried for unconditional submission; try what can be gained by unconditional redress." * * *

"I say this country has been the aggressor. You have made descents upon their coasts, you have burned their towns, plundered their country, made war upon the inhabitants, confiscated their property, proscribed and imprisoned their persons. I do therefore affirm, my Lords, that instead of exacting unconditional submission from the colonies we should grant them unconditional redress. We have injured them; we have endeavored to enslave and oppress them. Upon this ground, my Lords, instead of chastisement they are entitled to redress."

Lord Chatham said:

"My Lords, I need not look abroad for grievances. The grand capital mischief is fixed at home. It corrupts the very foundation of our political existence, and preys upon the vitals of the State. The constitution has been grossly violated. The constitution at this moment stands violated. Until that wound be healed, until the grievance be redressed, it is in vain to recommend union to Parliament—in vain to promote concord among the people."

"The constitution has its political bible by which, if it be fairly consulted, every political question may and ought to be determined. Magna Charta, the Petition of Rights and the Bill of Rights form that code which I call the bible of the English constitution. Had some of his Majesty's unhappy predecessors trusted less to the comments of their ministers, had they been better read in the text itself, the glorious revolution would have remained only possible in theory, and would not now have existed upon record, a formidable example to their successors."

On the employment of mercenaries and savages in war the same great orator bursts forth in a strain of indignant eloquence which is familiar as household words in every land where the English tongue is known or spoken:

"What has been the conduct of your ministers? How have they endeavored to conciliate the affection and obedience of their American brethren? They have gone to Germany; they have sought the alliance and assistance of every pitiful, boggary, insignificant, paltry German prince, to cut the throats of their loyal, brave, and injured brethren in America; they have entered into mercenary treaties with those human butchers for the purchase and sale of human blood. But, my Lords, this is not all; they have entered into other treaties; they have let the savages of America loose upon their innocent, unoffending brethren—loose upon the weak, the aged, and defenseless; on old men, women, and children; upon the very babes upon the breast, to be cut, mangled, sacrificed, broiled, roasted, nay, to be literally eaten alive. These, my Lords, are the allies Great Britain now has: carnage, desolation, and destruction, wherever her arms are carried, is her newly adopted mode of making war."

"The arms of this country are disgraced even in victory as well as defeat. Is this consistent, my Lords, with any part of our former conduct? Was it by means like these we arrived at that pinnacle of fame and grandeur which, while it established our reputation in every quarter of the globe, gave the fullest testimony of our justice, mercy, and national integrity? Was it by the tomahawk and scalping-knife that British valor and humanity became in a manner proverbial and the triumphs of war and the éclat of conquest became but matters of secondary praise when compared to those of national humanity and national honor? Was it by setting loose the savages of America to imbue their hands in the blood of our enemies that the duties of the soldier, the citizen, and the man came to be united? Is this honorable warfare, my Lords? Does it correspond with the language of the poet—

"The pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war,
That makes ambition virtue?"

In his speech in opposition to a motion to adjourn, just after the news of Burgoyne's defeat, Lord Chatham thus speaks of the war and the ministry. Nothing stronger has been said of our civil war:

"Ten thousand brave men have fallen victims to ignorance and rashness. The only army you have in America may, by this time, be no more. This very nation remains no longer safe than its enemies think proper to permit. I do not augur ill. Events of a most critical nature may take place before our next meeting. Will your lordships, then, in such a state of things, trust to the guidance of men who, in every step of this cruel, this wicked war, from the very beginning, have proved themselves weak, ignorant, and mistaken?"

The Marquis of Granby, on American affairs, in 1775:

"In God's name, what language are you now holding out to America? Resign your property, divest yourselves of your privileges and freedom, renounce everything that can make life comfortable, or we will destroy your commerce, we will involve your country in all the miseries of famine; and, if you express the sensations of men at such harsh treatment, we will then declare you in a state of rebellion, and put yourselves and your families to fire and sword."

Mr. Speaker, I could go on and consume the little time allotted to me in this discussion with quotations of the same character. It is not necessary, sir. I have said all I intended to say upon that branch of the subject.

The distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS]—I am sorry he is not present—made on Friday what I conceive to be the most frank, the most able, and the most consistent argument that has been made upon this question on that side of the House. He manfully—and, it should be said to his credit, consistently with his conduct in this House—declared that "The rebels had risen into a separate government, having been recognized as a belligerent by foreign nations and our own. The Constitution does not extend to them in its rights and guarantees. Whichever nation conquers has a right to treat the other as a conquered province. They are in the attitude of foreign nations. These points he illustrated, contending that if a State, as a State, makes war and becomes a belligerent power, we can, when we conquer it, treat it as we would any other foreign nation. And this is not a question under but outside the Constitution. By the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert to his own use everything which belongs to the enemy, and sell it to pay the expenses of the war and the damages occasioned by it."

I quote from the Washington Chronicle of Saturday last.

Well, sir, what is the difference between that gentleman's position and the conduct of this Administration? While the Administration, and the friends of the Administration in both Houses of Congress, and their representatives out of doors, are declaring they are for the Union, they openly declare here, through the ablest of their leaders, the chancellor of the exchequer, [Mr. STEVENS,] that they are not a Union party; that it has ceased to be a question of Union; that the southern States are an independent power, and the only question is whether we shall vanquish, subdue, or recognize them.

Well, sir, I have always thought that the southern States were either within or without the Union. If they are in the Union, they are under the protection of the Constitution, amenable to the Constitution and the laws made in pursuance, not in contravention, of the Constitution; entitled to its protection, which includes an entire exemption from congressional interference with their domestic institutions.

But the gentleman says they are not amenable to the Constitution. He says, "Shall we have the Constitution as it is, and the Union as it was, applicable to these rebellious States?" No, he says, they cannot have the benefit of the Constitution. He approaches his subject like a bold, frank man. He knows the Constitution stands between the southern States and the designs of the abolitionists, and he tears it away as an unnatural, improper obstruction, and under the laws of nations seeks a power which the Constitution does not give.

Sir, will that gentleman contend, admitting his position correct, that we have a right to confiscate the property of a foreign enemy by a paper proclamation? Admitting, then, an independent sovereign Power at war with us, can the President, as we propose here to do, by a proclamation, confiscate the estate of our enemy? How would it be under the law of nations? How would it be under practice and precedent? I admit where we obtain the territory of a foreign enemy, while in possession of that territory and in occupation of it, we may confiscate it, provided we can hold it by military force afterward.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS. I thought the gentleman appealed to me for an answer.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I will yield if it is not taken out of my time.

Objection was made.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. What is the difference between the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and Jefferson Davis? Jefferson Davis asserts that he is the president of the confederate States. He has a government; he has a congress; he has an army; he is a belligerent; he is at war with the United States of America. So there is no distinction between the position of these two distinguished men. But can we confiscate and hold the lands of the South? Doubtful!

No purely agricultural people, fighting for the protection of their own domestic institutions upon their own soil, have ever yet been conquered. I say further, that no revolted people have ever been subdued after they have been able to maintain an independent government for three years.

But, sir, let that pass. We are at war. Neither side of the House will deny it. Whether these States are in rebellion, or whether we are fighting an independent Power, we are still at war. Whether it be a civil war, rebellion, revolution, or foreign war, it matters little. It must cease, and I want this Administration to tell the American people when it will cease.

This war must cease, I care not how or from what cause, whether by exhaustion on either side,

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 23.

by southern submission or success, by mediation or by northern magnanimity, or by northern sense of self-preservation. The war must cease. There must be an end of it sooner or later from one cause or from another. I think all will concede this. Admitting, therefore, this conclusion, the next inquiry is how, and when? These are the proper questions for this Congress to determine. When shall this war cease? What is the required measure of southern submission? Will the party in power, who have the responsibility before the world, answer this question? Shall it be when, in the language of the President in April, 1861, we have "repossessed the forts, places, and property seized from the Union?" Or in the language of the resolution of Congress passed nearly unanimously in 1861, when we have "successfully defended and maintained the supremacy of the Constitution and preserved the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired," and that "as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease?" Or shall it be when, according to the presidential programme of 1862, the southern States, acting under the nominal protection of the Constitution, shall of themselves consent under duress to the emancipation of their slaves; or under the more recent proclamation of the same functionary, who, outside the Constitution, and in utter disregard of its sacred provisions, the abandoned tenth of the population of the South shall consent to betray the remaining nine tenths into a servitude more degraded than that which their own local institutions entailed upon the blacks? Or shall it be when, under the yet more recently declared doctrine of the Republican leader of this House, [Mr. STEVENS,] the southern States shall be reduced to a condition of abject dependence as a conquered enemy entitled to no law or mercy except that which the clemency of fanaticism may afford? Or, more dreadful, shall it be when the American people, North and South, utterly broken down, their national interests destroyed, their ancient form of government subverted, their territorial unity disintegrated, their lands laid waste, their homes forever gone, and the fountains of the great deep of national desolation shall overwhelm them, that thus, when all power of resistance or aggression shall alike be exhausted, shall we then have peace? Or, more fearful, shall it be when the iron heel of despotism is firmly planted upon the submissive necks of northern timidity?

Mr. Speaker, when shall the war cease? I ask the question in good faith. I ask it of the men who govern the North. It is their duty to determine how and when it shall cease, that the country may know the extent of the demands to be made upon it, the full measure required, and have unfolded at least a glimpse of the dark and shadowy future.

I ask in the name of the American people, whose blood and treasure is being poured out in this war, in their name I ask you when shall this bellicious crusade of blood and famine cease? Sir, let the war be of whatever character it may, it must cease, and it must cease by negotiation. Early in this session I had the honor to present to this House a preamble and resolution, which I shall read. They are as follows:

"Whereas the President, in his message delivered to this House on the 9th instant, and in his recommendation to the people to assemble at their places of worship and give thanks to God for recent victories, claims that the Union cause has gained important and substantial advantages; and whereas, in view of these triumphs, it is no longer beneath our dignity, nor dangerous to our safety, to evince a generous magnanimity becoming a great and powerful people by offering to the insurgents an opportunity to return to the Union without imposing on them degrading or destructive conditions: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the President be requested to appoint three commissioners, who shall be empowered to open negotiations with the authorities at Richmond, to the end that this bloody, destructive, and inhuman war shall cease, and the Union be restored on terms of equity, fraternity, and equality under the Constitution."

Mr. Speaker, if, as the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, we are at war with a foreign Power, what has been the practice of our Government with reference to the appointment of commisers to treat with foreign Powers? Why, sir, as early as 1795, when the Algerines made war in the Mediterranean upon our commerce, pirates though they were, we did not think it beneath our dignity to treat with them; the President authorized the American minister to Portugal to appoint a commissioner, who did proceed to a negotiation, and did finally make a treaty of amity which lasted until 1815. Again, sir, in the war of 1812, between the United States and Great Britain, three very distinguished men were appointed commissioners, Henry Clay being chairman of the commission, and they proceeded to Europe and made the celebrated treaty of Ghent.

But, sir, there is yet a later and more applicable case, the war with Mexico. When General Scott advanced with his conquering army from Vera Cruz to the city of Mexico, the President sent Nicholas P. Trist as a commissioner to treat with the Mexican authorities. Sir, Mexico was subjugated; we had conquered the whole republic of Mexico; we had won a series of victories from Vera Cruz to the halls of the Montezumas, and we were in possession of their capital; they were a conquered people. Did we pass confiscation laws then? Did we apply the principle of confiscation to Mexican soil? No, sir; we treated with them, conquered as they were, and Mr. Trist, acting in pursuance of the authority conferred upon him by the President of the United States, made the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo on the 15th of February, 1848. That treaty, which was subsequently ratified by the Senate of the United States, resulted in the accession of California and our vast possessions of the Pacific. There was no confiscation.

But it is said that this is a rebellion, and that it will not do to treat with rebels in arms. Well, sir, this is not the first rebellion we have had in this country. We have had rebellions which, at their commencement, were as threatening as this was at its commencement to the permanence of our institutions, and we treated by commissioners in every instance, as I shall show.

In 1786 the first rebellion occurred. It occurred, Mr. Speaker, in New England. This was the first armed rebellion against the Government. Sir, although it is unpleasant to reflect upon sections, candor compels me to declare that New England has been in a rebellion against the institutions of this country ever since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. She has not faithfully performed her part of the compact made when she came into the Union. In the Convention that framed our organic law the sections came together. New England had her navigation and her manufactures to protect; the South had her peculiar institution to protect. It is true, New England held a few slaves; but when they ceased to be profitable, she became philanthropic and benevolent, and abolished slavery. But so long as money was to be wrung from the sinews of the negro, New England held men in bondage and furnished the tonnage that brought slaves from Africa to the southern States.

I repeat, sir, that the first armed rebellion in this country occurred in Massachusetts, and that commissioners were appointed to negotiate a peace. I will read from a New England historian to prove the fact:

"This was known as Shay's rebellion. It commenced in 1786 and continued until the close of 1787. The people took up arms, organized, and collected in large masses under the lead of a popular officer who had distinguished himself in the revolutionary war. They broke up courts called to try and punish persons implicated with them, and defied the laws and the authorities. The Governor called out four thousand four hundred militia. A declaration of rebellion was issued by the General Court or Legislature in which it was declared that 'a horrid and unnatural rebellion and war had been openly and traitorously raised and levied against this Commonwealth, and is still continued and now exists against the same.' Commissioners were subsequently appointed by the Legislature, consisting of General Lincoln, who commanded the troops ordered out by the Commonwealth; Hon. Samuel A. Otis, and Hon. Samuel Phillips, President of the House of Representatives. These commissioners were authorized to promise indemnity to such who might discontinue opposition to the government and return to their allegiance as good citizens."—Bradford's History of Massachusetts.

Well, sir, we have had other rebellions in this country. We had the whisky insurrection in the gentleman from Pennsylvania's [Mr. STEVENS] own State and vicinity. That rebellion was so serious in its character that George Washington sent two special messages to Congress on the subject, ordered out the militia of four of the States of the Union—Pennsylvania, Virginia, Maryland, and New Jersey—to suppress it, and appointed commissioners to treat with the insurrectionists. Nay, more; he went in person, accompanied by Alexander Hamilton, then Secretary of the Treasury, and had a conference with the rebels at Carlisle. The Father of his country, in the true spirit of patriotism, justice, wisdom, and policy, thought it not beneath his dignity to treat with rebels. He did treat with them successfully, and the result was that the rebels laid down their arms, and Congress at the next session repealed the obnoxious laws.

But, sir, that is not the only case. I come to a later and yet more pertinent and significant case—the Mormon rebellion. These profligate outcasts, who have been always hostile to your moral and political institutions, were treated with by commissioners.

It commenced early in 1857. The immediate cause was opposition to the exercise of Federal authority and the appointment of a territorial Governor. On the 15th of September of that year Brigham Young issued a proclamation in the style of an independent sovereign, announcing his purpose to resist by force of arms the entry of the United States troops into the Territory of Utah. He proceeded to carry out this threat. He organized an army, declared martial law, seized Government fortifications, destroyed Government property, and put the Territory in a state of complete defense against the Federal Army. The Federal troops there at the time were overawed or rendered powerless. The President sent a message to Congress, which passed bills to meet the case, large sums were appropriated, troops were ordered there under command of General A. S. Johnston in the spring of 1858, and in April of that year Hon. L. W. POWELL, now Senator of Kentucky, and Major McCullough, were appointed commissioners on the part of the United States, and Colonel Kane appointed on the part of the Mormons. These commissioners carried with them a proclamation of the President, in which he offered a full pardon to all who would submit to the laws. By the conduct and forbearance of these commissioners peace was restored, the rebellion put down, and the Federal authority once more respected. The officers appointed by the President were accepted by the Mormons, and order and submission have reigned ever since.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, is there anything so extraordinary in my proposition to send commissioners to treat with the southern States? We are told almost weekly that the rebellion is nearly crushed out, that we have every advantage over these insurgents. Is it wrong, therefore, is it unwise, is it unpatriotic to pursue precedents that have been set by the Father of his country, and by his successors in office?

Mr. Speaker, we will have to treat with these rebels. This war, commenced without cause, prosecuted without glory, will end in disintegration and destruction if carried on for another Administration. Peace must come. The President told you so in his inaugural address. Then, sir, he was uninfluenced by the fanatical teachings of a desperate crew who have other objects at heart than the welfare, the unity, the prosperity, the harmony, the freedom of the American people. God grant that the day of peace may come soon. That it will come sooner or later, we all know. The powers of aggression and of resistance are alike failing. Instead of supplying our armies through patriotic enthusiasm, our Government is resorting to bribery and force—bribery by the system of bounties, force by conscription. It is deducible by mathematical calculation that another term of three years will find us in a condition where it is impossible, either by force or bribery, to inspire your armies with sufficient power of aggression to conquer the southern people. Peace must and will ensue. General Jackson is frequently referred to as having favored harsh measures toward the South, and yet we have the authority of his friend and contemporary, Thomas H. Benton, in his Thirty Years in the Senate, to the contrary.

The authority says that "Many thought that he ought to relax in his civil measures for allaying discontent while South Carolina held the military attitude of armed defiance to the United States—and among them Mr. Quincy Adams. But he adhered steadily to his purpose of going on with what justice required for the relief of the South," &c.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, page 308.

John A. Dix, now a major general of volunteers, when a Senator in Congress, said on the 1st March, 1847, in a debate upon the three million bill, that "disunion is better than intestine war;" and again in the same speech that "Civil war has no ameliorations. It is pure, unmitigated demoralization. It dissolves all national and domestic ties. It renders selfishness more odious by welding it to hatred and cruelty. The after-generation which reaps the bitter harvest of intestine war is scarcely less to be commiserated than that by whose hands the poisonous seeds are sown. Less, far less than these would be disunion."

Mr. Speaker, I again ask, when shall this war cease? Shall it be when the whole American people, North and South, utterly broken down, dispirited, and politically disintegrated, shall arise in their power, and indignantly throw off on both sides the unfaithful rulers who use them to the destruction and annihilation of their national liberties and existence? Or, more fearful still, shall it be when despotism has become organic and fixed, and all opposition of thoughts and expression shall be driven from Congress and elsewhere, and the freedman of the South becomes the master of the freeman of the North? Or shall it be when the State governments and the people of the revolted States, as such, shall cease to exist—the former be subverted, and the latter replaced with northern abolitionists? In short, Mr. Speaker, will the party in power make a definite conclusion and agreement among themselves as to the conditions upon which this war shall cease, its horrors terminate, and all the consequences, whether good or bad, shall be fully known and understood? We must have peace—a lasting peace—based upon the Constitution and cemented by the Union.

Burke, that immortal patriot whose inspired language I love to quote, said, March 2, 1775:

"The proposition is peace. Not peace through the medium of war; not peace to be hunted through the labyrinth of intricate and endless negotiations; not peace to arise out of universal discord fomented from principle in all parts of the empire; not peace to depend on the periodical determination of perplexing questions, or the precise marking the shadowy boundaries of a complex Government. It is simple peace; sought in its natural course and its ordinary haunts; it is peace sought in the spirit of peace, and laid in principles purely pacific. I propose by removing the ground of the difference, and by restoring the former unsuspecting confidence of the colonies in the mother country, to give permanent satisfaction to your people; and (far from a scheme of ruling by discord) to reconcile them to each other in the same net, and by the bond of the very same interest which reconciles them to British government."

Again:

"I mean to give peace. Peace implies reconciliation, and where there has been a material dispute reconciliation does in a manner always imply concession on the one part or on the other. In this state of things I make no difficulty in affirming that the proposal ought to originate from us. Great and acknowledged force is not impaired either in of fact or in opinion by an unwillingness to exert itself. The superior power may offer peace with honor and with safety. Such an offer from such a power will be attributed to magnanimity. But the concessions of the weak are the concessions of fear."

How eloquent, how truthful, and yet how applicable to us at this time! The reasons he urges against a coercive policy are in effect similar to those now urged by the opponents of the present war:

"First, sir, permit me to observe that the use of force alone is but temporary. It may subdue for a moment, but it does not remove the necessity of subduing again; and a nation is not governed which is perpetually to be conquered.

"My next objection is its uncertainty. Terror is not always the effect of force; and an armament is not a victory. If you do not succeed you are without resource, for conciliation failing, force remains; but force failing, no further hope of reconciliation is left. Power and authority are sometimes bought by kindness, but they can never be begged as alms by an impoverished and defeated violence.

"A farther objection to force is that you impair the object by your very endeavors to preserve it. The thing you fought for is not the thing which you recover; but depredated, sunk, wasted, and consumed in the contest. Nothing less will content me than whole America. I do not choose to consume its strength along with our own, because in all parts it is the British strength that I consume. I do not choose to be caught by a foreign enemy at the end of this exhausting conflict, and still less in the midst of it. I may escape, but I can make no insurance against such an event. Let me add that I do not choose wholly to break the American spirit, because it is the spirit that has made the country."

I beseech you listen! Let the cry of the widow and the orphan reach your hearts. If the stability of our endangered institutions, a dismembered empire, and absorption of all our great industrial and productive interests have no terror, think, oh! think of the dark and shadowy future awaiting your own posterity.

"Peace! Peace! God of our fathers, grant us peace; Peace in our hearts and at Thine altars; peace On the red waters and their blighted shores; Peace for the leagued cities, and the hosts That watch and bleed, around them and within; Peace for the homeless and the fatherless; Peace for the captive on his weary way, And the mad crowds who jeer his helplessness; For them that suffer, them that do the wrong; Sinning and sinned against—O God! for all— For a distracted, torn, and bleeding land— Speed the glad tidings! Give us, give us peace!"

Mr. SMITHERS obtained the floor.

Lee; and to Major-General George G. Meade and Major General Oliver O. Howard and the officers and soldiers of that army, for the skill and valor which, at Gettysburg, repulsed, defeated, and drove back, broken and dispirited, beyond the Rappahannock, the veteran army of the rebellion.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved the previous question on the third reading.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

Port Hudson, was taken up, the question being on the third reading.

Banks and the officers and soldiers under his command for the skill, courage, and endurance which compelled the surrender of Port Hudson, and thus removed the last obstruction to the free navigation of the Mississippi river.

Mr. ELIOT moved the previous question on the third reading.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the Senate joint resolution (No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside and the officers and men who fought under his command; which was read a first and second time.

The resolution provides that the thanks of Congress be presented to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and through him to the officers and men who have fought under his command, for their gallantry, good conduct, and soldier-like endurance, and that the President of the United States be requested to cause the foregoing resolution to be communicated to Major General Burnside in such terms as he may deem best calculated to give effect thereto.

The joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ORTH moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

THANKS TO CORNELIUS VANDERBILT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate joint resolution No. 14, presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution provides that whereas Cornelius Vanderbilt, of New York, did, during the spring of 1862, make a free gift to his imperiled country of his new and stanch steamship Vanderbilt, of five thousand tons burden, built by him with the greatest care, of the best material, at a cost of $800,000, which steamship has ever since been actively employed in the service of the Republic against the rebel devastation of her commerce; and whereas he has in no manner sought any requital of this magnificent gift, nor any official recognition thereof; that therefore the thanks of the American people be presented to him by Congress for this unique manifestation of a fervid and large-souled patriotism; and further that the President of the United States be requested to cause a gold medal to be struck, which shall fully embody an attestation of the nation's gratitude for this gift; which medal shall be forwarded to Commodore Vanderbilt, a copy of it being made and deposited for preservation in the Library of Congress.

Mr. COLE, of California, moved that the joint resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

WASHINGTON INSANE HOSPITAL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House Senate bill No. 49, relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In this time of war that bill is necessary. It has for its object a beneficent regulation in reference to that hospital, and I therefore hope that there will be no objection to its being put on its passage.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask to have entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House yesterday referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The motion to reconsider was received and entered upon the Journal.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had on January 26, 1864, approved and signed House bill No. 65, to change the place of holding the circuit and district courts of the United States for the district of West Tennessee, and for other purposes.

DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1863, which had been previously made the special order for this day.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to go back.

Mr. BLAINE. I object.

The Clerk read, as follows:

To supply a deficiency in the appropriation for compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers, and others receiving an annual salary in the employ of the House of Representatives, $7,365 19.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I move the following amendment, to come in after what has been read:

For repair of coal and landing wharf at Key West, to erect a crane thereon, and cover the extension of the machine shop at that point, $10,000.

Mr. BROOKS. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the item under consideration. I would not make the point if the gentleman did not have an opportunity to offer it hereafter in the Navy appropriation bill.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. This is to supply a deficiency. The work has already been done.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the section by inserting after line two hundred and twenty-one the following:

For the payment to William Brindle, late receiver of public moneys at Leocompton, in Kansas, for rent and extra clerk hire, $4,713.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I rise to a point of order. The amendment is not germane to the section upon which the committee is acting.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order upon the ground stated as well as upon the ground that it is a private claim, which it is not in order to put upon a general appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. It is not a private claim. It was in pursuance of an act of Congress that the money was paid, and I have a letter from the Secretary of the Interior requesting an appropriation to pay it. This appropriation passed the House last Congress, under the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means, but it failed to pass both Houses. I hold a letter containing a statement of the settlement of the account, and asking an appropriation to pay it. It is money actually expended by Mr. Brindle for rent and extra clerk hire some years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. HALE. Then I will offer it as an independent section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the committee has not yet got through with the bill. After that is done, the gentleman can offer it.

Mr. KASSON. I move to amend by inserting after line two hundred and twenty-one what I send to the Clerk, and I ask that a communication from the Postmaster General be read in connection with it.

The amendment was reported, as follows:

For payment of letter-carriers to July 1, 1864, to be paid out of the revenues of the Post Office Department, $150,000.

The letter was read, and is as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT,
WASHINGTON, January 26, 1864.

SIR: Owing to the increasing amount of local mail matter and the increasing demand for carriers to perfect the free delivery system in the several cities of the country, I have during the past year largely augmented the number of carriers with very favorable results to the revenue.

The appropriation for the current year having been made for the amount of the receipts by carriers under the former system has proved insufficient to cover the expenses for the time specified. I have therefore to request that an additional appropriation be made from the revenues of the Department of $150,000 to cover the probable deficiency.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. BLAIR,
Postmaster General.

Hon. SCHUYLER COLFAX,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KASSON. I am authorized by the Committee of Ways and Means to offer this amendment, in connection with the reading of that letter.

Mr. BROOKS. I rise to a point of order. The appropriation in line two hundred and twenty-one is, for stationery for the House of Representatives, $9,000. The proposed amendment is $150,000 to pay letter-carriers in New York, Philadelphia, Cincinnati, &c. The proper place, let me suggest to the gentleman, for this amendment is the Post Office appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from New York, in answer to his objection, to the fact that we are acting upon appropriations under the head of miscellaneous items. There is no special part of the deficiency bill applicable to the Post Office Department. It comes, therefore, under the general head of miscellaneous items, and properly comes in here. In a general bill which this House has already passed, we have made the appropriations for the next fiscal year, which were necessary as resulting from this change in the system. This amendment simply applies the requisite amount out of the revenue of the Post Office Department, in pursuance of existing laws, to pay the expenses for the current year. It is not provided to pay it out of the general Treasury, but out of the revenues of the Department itself.

Mr. BROOKS. I stand upon my point of order, that the matter of letter-carriers is not germane to the matter now under consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order, that the amendment is not germane to the present section of the bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend this section by adding thereto, as a proviso, the following:

Provided, That no money hereby appropriated shall be expended on the Capitol extension, or in continuing the north wing of the Treasury extension beyond what may be necessary to protect the said buildings from injuries.

I notice among the miscellaneous items we have appropriated $250,000 for the purpose of carrying on the north wing Treasury extension, and $150,000 for continuing the extension of the Capitol. Now, sir, I believe each of these buildings contain abundant accommodations for the present public business. We certainly are engaged in a struggle which taxes all the financial resources of the United States, and it seems to me we may very well postpone ornamenting the exterior of one of these buildings, and the further extending the other, until we have more means for such purposes than now, and when taxation shall not be as onerous as it necessarily is now, in order to carry on this war. And I think, unless we begin with bills like this, and cut down expenditures by the hundreds of thousands of dollars upon matters which are not of pressing importance, we are hardly doing our duty to the country in the present state of things. If there be a necessity of expending a portion of these sums for protecting those buildings from the effects of the weather, no one will object, and I have put the proviso in that form. But to go on doing work, and putting it up for ornament more than from any necessity, is not proper in the present state of our country and of its finances.

Again, this money is being expended in times when labor and materials are very high; and it cannot be claimed that it is important to keep these laborers in the employment of the Government, because there is a great demand for their labor, and hence no hardship will be done toward them. I trust, therefore, we will limit this expenditure to that amount which shall be found necessary to protect the buildings, and let their completion await a time when the Treasury can more easily afford it.

Mr. STEVENS. If I understand the amendment, it seems to me to be out of order at this point. We have passed the appropriation to which it refers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that a proviso limiting an appropriation has always been held to be in order.

Mr. STEVENS. The amendment does not apply to this part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. It applies to the entire bill, or to any part of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Let the amendment be read again.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. STEVENS. When we were upon the question of continuing the completion of the Capitol, a motion was made to reduce the appropriation from $150,000 to $50,000, and the House voted down the amendment. I supposed that to be a full expression of the wish of the House to continue the work now under way to completion.

Shortly after the commencement of this war, the question arose in Congress whether we should stop all further progress on the public buildings here until the war was over, and, after a very full discussion in this House, the House, by a very large majority, decided that as a question of economy, the hands being all here and the materials here, it was better to proceed with the work. Besides that, it seemed to the House that it would not look very well to stop the work on the public buildings simply because there is an insurrection in the South. They thought it best to go on making appropriations for these purposes so as to give confidence to the country that we were still to possess this capital and complete these buildings. And now that this work is drawing to a close, it seems to me that it would be very bad economy to dismiss the hands now here and stop the work. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the last word. I only desire to say that the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] has saved me the trouble of offering this amendment. I have examined this deficiency bill with a good deal of anxiety. I am satisfied that we are not legislating on these matters as our constituents would desire. I undertake to say, and

I believe that in saying so I express the sentiment of three fourths of the gentlemen upon this side of the House, that every dollar's worth of work upon the public buildings which is not necessary and essential ought to be stopped until this rebellion is over. We go on here making large appropriations for these objects when we have not yet made appropriations to pay the pensions of the men who have lost their legs and arms in the defense of the country, and who are sitting at home to-day, with their helpless families around them, without any means of support. There is no earthly necessity for this appropriation at this time. I want gentlemen to look into this matter. I want to see who here is ready to vote hundreds of thousands of dollars for these purposes, when we all know that the work can be dispensed with until the war is ended and the rebellion crushed. I do not believe that this country is bankrupt. It never will be so long as there are stout hearts and brave arms in the country. I know that the country is full of money. I am willing to appropriate for all proper purposes, but I am opposed to making appropriations at this time for these purposes. Let us wait until the war is over. Let us put the money where it is needed. Let the wives of our soldiers who have been made widows, and the children of our soldiers who have been made orphans, know that we care for them while we hold up a defiant front to the villains in the South and their sympathizers all over the country. Let us not vote a dollar here that is not essentially necessary for the carrying on of this war and for the support of the Government. Let us show to the country that we are earnest and honest in our purpose to carry on this war to its completion.

Mr. SCOFIELD. I wish to inquire if the clause to which the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. KERNAN] relates can be amended so as to strike out a portion of the $150,000?

The CHAIRMAN. It cannot without unanimous consent. The committee has passed from its consideration.

Mr. SCOFIELD. Then it seems to me that the gentleman from New York might as well withdraw his amendment, because they would certainly spend the $150,000 in protecting the building.

Mr. KERNAN. My amendment is that they shall not expend more than $50,000.

Mr. SCOFIELD. If we can limit them to a specific sum, I will vote with the gentleman from New York for his amendment; but if we leave them sufficient latitude to enable them to spend the whole amount in merely protecting the building, I am afraid every single dollar of the appropriation will be used for that purpose by some hook or crook.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by striking out the last word. I do it for the purpose of saying to the committee that, having watched with such care as I could the proceedings of the House with reference to the appropriation of public money, I think the time has come when all friends of the country should establish a principle for the guidance of this Government. That principle, in my judgment, should be that there should be no expenditure of public money that is not absolutely necessary for the maintenance of the Government and the prosecution of the war. We are expending somewhere from four to six hundred millions a year, which can only be met by taxation on the people; and this Congress cannot adjourn, with safety to the financial reputation of the country, without imposing a still more onerous system of taxation than has been yet introduced. While this country is not on the verge of bankruptcy, it is impossible for us to raise a sufficient sum of money on credit for the prosecution of the war. It must be done by taxation.

Now, while I am here prepared to vote taxation which shall absorb the last dollar of the property of my constituents for the purpose of prosecuting the war, I am resolved not to incur knowingly the responsibility of voting for appropriations not necessary to the existence of the Government and the maintenance of the integrity of the Union. I say that the time has come when this House shall so express its judgment, and when all its committees shall understand, that no sanction is to be given to an appropriation not based upon necessity. I submit with all deference to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and to other committees of the House, that it is our duty to the country to insist on the recognition and enforcement of that right which exists primarily in this House as the guardian of the Treasury.

Mr. MORRIS, of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, there is an old adage that we may be penny-wise and pound-foolish. Having been a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds last Congress, my attention was somewhat directed to the question of the completion of these public buildings. These public buildings are incomplete; they are in such a condition as renders it absolutely necessary that they should be protected from the weather; and if an appropriation of $150,000 or of $500,000 be required for the completion of these buildings, what comparison would either sum bear to the entire annual expenditure of the Government? I therefore repeat that, in these questions, we may be penny-wise and pound-foolish.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KERNAN. The appropriation to which my amendment applies is not one of $150,000, but of $400,000. I know very well that there are cases in which we might be penny-wise and pound-foolish; but I submit that it is not such a case when we simply propose to stop spending money for the raising of marble columns around the public buildings, when the columns that support this Union—the States—are in danger of being overthrown and destroyed. I trust that we will husband our resources to do what is necessary to protect these buildings from injury, and let their completion be deferred till an appropriate time. This would not discommode anything; it would not prevent us having proper buildings for the public service. It would simply stop this expenditure of money by half millions, on mere ornamentation, at a time when we require all the financial means of the Government to preserve it by prosecuting the war.

Mr. BROOKS called for tellers on Mr. KERNAN's amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KERNAN and ORTH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 37.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to amend by inserting in the clause for an additional Assistant Secretary of the Treasury the words "for one year." I suppose it is not intended to make this a permanent office. There seems to be no necessity for it except during the present war. I trust the policy of increasing Assistant Secretaries of the various Departments to so large an extent will not be adopted. It has been the policy of the House, heretofore, to impose some limitation on the creation of these offices, especially in connection with the War Department. It seems that it should also be so in this Department. My amendment proposes to limit the term to one year.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the remainder or unexpended balance of $21,207 56 for engraving, electrotyping, and lithographing, &c., and the same is hereby transferred to the miscellaneous items of the contingent fund of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HALE. I now offer my amendment as a separate section:

For the payment to William Brindle, late receiver of public money at Leecompton, Kansas, for rent and extra clerk hire, $4,713.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I make the point of order that the amendment is private legislation upon an appropriation bill, and is not therefore in order.

Mr. HALE. I ask the Clerk to read a letter from the Secretary of the Interior.

The Clerk read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, January 25, 1861.

SIR: At the request of William Brindle, Esq., receiver of public moneys at Leecompton, Kansas, I have the honor to inclose to your committee his claim for rent and extra clerk hire under the provisions of the act of Congress of 18th August, 1856.

Under the law I recommend the allowance of his claim, as follows:

Office rent January 1, 1857, to September 30, 1860.	$1,145
Extra clerk hire of G. Wynkoop during public sale in 1859.	240
Special clerk hire of H. P. Petrisson in 1857, as per vouchers 3 and 4.	200
Clerk hire, one clerk, from October 1, 1857, to April 30, 1860, two and a half years, at $4 per day during days of work, or, excluding Sundays, 782 days, at $4 per day.	3,128

Total.....$4,713

Mr. Brindle claims clerk hire during the period of two and a half years, at the rate of $1,800 per annum, as the amount he has actually paid; but, although he presents in the accompanying letters strong reasons in favor of the amount as claimed by him, as the recommendations of the Department in similar cases heretofore have not exceeded the rate of four dollars per day, and the length of time covered is considerable, I have deemed it proper to base my recommendation for an appropriation on that rate. I have the honor, therefore, to recommend the appropriation of the sum of $4,713 to pay his claim for rent and clerk hire.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MOSES KELLY, Acting Secretary.

R. W. JOHNSON, Chairman Committee on Public Lands, United States Senate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. It is not a deficiency, nor, as independent legislation on an appropriation bill, is it in order.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved the following as an additional section:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appropriated to supply deficiencies for the repair of the coal and landing wharf at Key West, to erect a crane thereon, and to cover the extension of the machine shop at that point, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I move the following, to come in as an additional section:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That there be appropriated for the payment of letter-carriers to July 1, 1864, to be paid out of the revenues of the Post Office Department, $150,000.

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I oppose this amendment now, because I do not think that we have sufficient facts to justify us in making this appropriation at the present time. I am sorry to learn, sir, from the statement of the Postmaster General that letter-carriers in the cities do not pay, or rather have not paid, by some $150,000. I think that I can furnish the names of parties who would be happy to take contracts from the Government to distribute the letters in the cities of Cincinnati, Chicago, Philadelphia, New York and its surroundings, and give at least $200,000, if not $500,000, for the privilege of doing so, and carry the letters at the rate of one or two cents each.

We are told by the Postmaster General that there is a deficiency of $150,000 in this appropriation. After proper examination, if this turns out to be a deficiency, and is necessary to carry on the letter-carrier system in the cities of the country, it may be that I shall agree with the gentleman from Iowa. But the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads has the subject now under consideration. They have asked the Postmaster General for information in reference to the system of letter-carriers in the cities, but that information has not been furnished. When that is laid before the House, and we ascertain this to be a proper sum to be appropriated, then we can act. Let us wait for the facts. It is impossible for the Committee of Ways and Means to know everything. Look to the abundant subjects they have before them, embracing finance, taxation, the war, the Army and the Navy, political economy, and others, and it will be seen that they cannot give them all the attention that they ought to have. I beg the gentleman to leave this subject to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and I assure him that if this appropriation be found necessary it will be made.

Mr. KASSON. I think that the gentleman from New York will agree to the propriety of this amendment as soon as I correct him in the mistake under which he is laboring in reference to the manner in which appropriations are made for the Post Office Department. This is not an appropriation for a deficiency in the sense in which the gentleman uses the term. The law of the last session, which went into effect on the 1st of last July, established a system of free delivery corresponding to that of every post office in the world which approaches a perfect system. Prior to that, Congress had made the usual appropriation for the payment of the letter-carriers. Under the old system it had been the usage to estimate the amount of the receipts from local postages, the whole of which went for the pay of the carriers. The carriers retained every penny; and they were obliged to stop at every door to collect one or two cents before going on with the delivery of the other letters. The consequence was that it required nearly twice the time to deliver the same number of letters that it does now. That system was done away with, and Congress required the prepayment in all cases of local postage, which went into the general revenue. The Postmaster General was authorized to extend the new system, and this is needed because the appropriation was made in reference to the old system. The appropriation was only for $180,000. The benefits of the new system have largely increased the receipts for local postage, but they are in the Treasury, and cannot be paid out beyond the amount of $180,000. Hence these men cannot get pay for their services until an additional appropriation shall be made for the time when the present one shall be exhausted. It is indispensable that a further appropriation shall be made, not out of the Treasury of the United States, but giving the simple authority to the Postmaster General to pay these men.

Mr. BROOKS. Let there be added a proviso that the money shall be paid out of the post office fund.

Mr. KASSON. That is there already. I wish also to state to the House that the Post Office Department is to-day self-sustaining for the first time in fifteen years, and that is due to the legislation of the last Congress.

Mr. ALLEY. Is this deficiency of $150,000 to be paid out of the fund accumulated from drop letters?

Mr. KASSON. So far as that fund goes. It is to be paid in all cases out of the incomes of the post offices at which the carriers are employed, and the revenue of no other post office can be used for the payment of these carriers. Until the system is perfected and the increase expected is realized, there may be a small deficiency.

Mr. ALLEY. I move to strike out the last word of the gentleman's amendment, merely pro forma.

I concur fully with the remark of the gentleman from New York [Mr. Brooks] in reference to these matters, so far as having these matters investigated by committees. I regard it as a serious evil that matters of this kind should be brought into the House and ingrafted into a deficiency bill without any previous investigation by a responsible committee. It does seem to me that it is all wrong. I feel, for one, we have more to fear from the disposition many in this House seem to have to take any amount of money out of the Treasury to be spent for every purpose which can be imagined; I think we have more to fear from that than from anything else. I have no fear about this rebellion; I have no fear that it will not be crushed by the armies of the country; but I do fear greatly for the Treasury of the country. And I say to gentlemen in this House that unless we are more careful than many incline to be, the effect of our legislation upon the Treasury must be most disastrous.

I do not, however, apply these remarks particularly to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa, for from what I understand of the position of the matter at this time, I fully concur with him that it is necessary that this appropriation should be made. I only find fault with the manner in which it has been brought forward. It should have been referred to the appropriate committee, and been fully investigated by them before being presented to this House. As that has not been done I will say, from some knowledge I have of the matter, I entirely concur with the gentleman from Iowa in the opinion that this appropriation should be made. As the law now stands, it must be paid. If there is any objection to the law let it be modified or repealed. But existing as it does upon the statute-book in its present form—and I express no opinion upon the law itself—I see no other alternative than to pay the amount asked for. I think the committee would be compelled, if the matter were sent to them, to come to that conclusion; and therefore

I make no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

I withdraw my amendment.

The amendment offered by Mr. Kasson was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay aside this bill for the present, and to take up bill No. 151, making appropriations for the naval service.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion was agreed to; and the committee proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865.

The bill having been first read in extenso, the Clerk proceeded to read it a second time by paragraphs, for amendments.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I move to amend the following clause:

For pay of commission, warrant, and petty officers and seamen, including the engineer corps of the Navy, $19,423,241, by adding thereto the following:

And that the same be paid in gold or its equivalent: Provided, That the relative value of any paper currency tendered shall be ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury, and his certificate shall be conclusive evidence thereof if dated thirty days before payment is made.

I have offered this amendment with the hope that this committee, and the House, when the bill shall come to it, may adopt it. I have offered it believing that the pay of our officers and seamen in the naval service is not adequate, and is not to them a fair compensation. In reference to those who are in our Army and our Navy, a reason exists for the adoption of this amendment that will not apply to individuals in the ordinary offices of the Government. Their pay and emoluments were fixed at a period in our history when everything was comparatively low, and when the currency in which they were paid—if they were paid in currency—was equal to gold. The compensation was fixed at what at that period was considered a fair equivalent for the services rendered. It was fixed at a sum which gave to them and to their families a reasonable support. But to-day, under the effect of the important changes which have occurred in the commercial world, in the increased price of every article they have to consume, that compensation, especially in the depreciated currency in which they are paid, is not a sufficient compensation.

It is known that the Government paper in which they are paid in lieu of gold and silver has depreciated more than thirty-three and one third per cent. It is also known that every necessary of life has increased in price to a point unprecedented in our modern history. The pay now given to our sailors and soldiers is not sufficient for the comfortable support and maintenance of the families of those who have such incumbrances. When their wages were fixed by Congress the cost of all the necessities of life was comparatively low. To-day the price is increased more than threefold. The pound of coffee that formerly cost the wife of a sailor from eight to twelve cents, to-day costs her forty cents. Every yard of domestic that she uses in her family that could formerly be purchased for from eight to ten cents a yard, to-day costs her from forty to fifty cents per yard. The price of the candles or oil consumed in the family is increased more than a hundred per cent. The very prints with which she clothes herself and her family, which formerly could be purchased for from eight to ten cents per yard, are to-day worth from eighteen to twenty and twenty-two cents per yard. And so it is with all articles into the manufacture of which cotton enters. And the same thing is true with reference to woolen manufactures, as well as all else that enters into family consumption.

Mr. STEVENS. I dislike to interrupt the gentleman, but I would like to hear the amendment to which he is speaking read.

The Clerk read the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I must make a point of order upon that. I do not think that it is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order comes too late. If it had been made at the time the amendment was introduced, the Chair would have ruled it out of order.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I was proceeding to show when interrupted that all these things which are necessary to feed and clothe the wives of our sailors have increased in cost at least threefold since the compensation of our sailors was fixed, and that the currency in which they are now paid is at a discount of more than thirty-three and one third per cent. Now, sir, either the Congress that fixed that compensation paid the sailor threefold more than what was a reasonable compensation for his services, or else the compensation which he now receives is inadequate to the support of himself and family.

I remarked a while ago that a different rule obtained in reference to the pay of sailors from that which obtains in the pay of the civil employees of the Government. Their entrance into the naval service, in which for the last two years they have been engaged, in the very dangerous and important operations of the Government, was voluntary upon their part; but their continuance in this dangerous and arduous service is not voluntary upon their part; hence their relations toward the Government are different from those of persons engaged in ordinary civil pursuits. They are compelled to remain in this service, and to undergo all its hardships, while their families are compelled to submit to the deprivations consequent upon the depreciation of the currency of the country, and the consequently enhanced price of the necessities of life.

It may be said that the same argument should induce us to increase the compensation of members of Congress, of clerks in the Departments, and of all who are engaged in the civil branch of the public service. But the same argument does not apply. Our service here is voluntary. The service of the gentlemen engaged in the various Departments of the Government is voluntary. They can leave their positions, and return to other pursuits in life whenever the compensation they receive is insufficient for the support of themselves and families. It is not so with our seamen and our soldiers, even when they enter the service voluntarily. Once there, they must remain, and their families are compelled to submit to all the privations incident to this depreciation of the currency, and the increase in the price of the necessities of life. Now, if the pay heretofore given to these men was but a fair compensation, is there any reason why we should not pay them now an amount equivalent to what we have heretofore paid them? Then a dollar was worth a dollar, and the price of the necessary articles of consumption was low; but now, when our currency has been so much depreciated, it does seem to me that those who uphold our flag upon the sea, and peril their lives in defense of that flag, that they and their wives and children ought to be taken care of by our Government, and ought to receive a fair equivalent for their services, their exposure, their labor.

But, sir, I do not propose to consume the time of the committee. I have thus hastily laid this question before them, and I ask for their candid consideration. What I propose in my amendment is simply this: that hereafter sailors shall be paid in gold or its equivalent. I presume that this country is rather too destitute of the precious metals at this time to pay them in gold; but the amendment provides a method by which that difficulty may be obviated, the Government having the option of paying them either in gold or its equivalent, which equivalent is to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury. If the ten or fifteen dollars a month paid them three years ago was but a fair compensation for their services, is it not right that they should still receive what is equal in value to ten or fifteen dollars in gold? Especially is it not right when we consider the vast increase in the price of the necessities of existence? Is it not fair and right that we should protect the sailor from the consequence of the depreciation of currency and the enhancement of prices, and guard his family against want and destitution? I think it is, and therefore I have offered the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "gold or its equivalent" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "lawful money of the United States." Mr. Chairman, I never heard of any officer of this Government objecting to receiving lawful money of the United States for his services. I am sure that no soldier or sailor has ever objected to it. I am sure that no patriotic citizen has ever objected to it; and as for the others, I don't care what they object to. [Laughter.] But I presume the object of the gentleman from Illinois in offering his amendment was to prevent the payment of our soldiers and sailors in the depreciated currency of State banks—of western and middle States banks.

I suppose that is what the gentleman is desirous of getting at. I am quite sure he does not mean to say that when the Government of the United States employs anybody it is not fair to pay him in the money of the United States. I have therefore attempted to avoid the difficulty which the gentleman seemed to anticipate from the payment of sailors in the depreciated currency of western banks—for that is the only depreciated currency in the country—by requiring that they shall be paid in lawful money of the United States. I know of nobody who will object to that, except the gold speculators and bullion gamblers of New York and parts adjacent.

Mr. BROOKS. I oppose the amendment to the amendment. This is a question, Mr. Chairman, which deeply interests my constituents, many of whom are in the naval service. There are distinctions already drawn by the United States and by the laws of the United States in regard to the mode and manner in which public creditors shall be paid. The greatest of the creditors, the noblest of the creditors, the most patriotic creditors of the Government, are those who bear the country's flag upon the ocean, protect her commerce, and aid in preventing the interference of France or England in the rebellion now existing. There are no creditors like these, none so patriotic, none so well deserving of their country. If preference is to be given to any class of men it should be given to that class which, on the ocean, in tempest and in calm, by night and by day, on all occasions and at all times, not only protect the vast coasts of this country, but are in a position to resist all aggressions threatened from abroad. But there are other classes of public creditors already protected by the legislation of the country; and the only object of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is to bring the sailors and seamen and commissioned officers of our Navy into that category of preferred creditors.

Now, who are these preferred creditors? Our ministers at England, at France, and at all the other courts of the world; our consuls who cover the East and the European continent. They are not content to receive their pay in what the gentleman denominates "lawful money of the United States," but they receive from this Government gold and silver only in payment for their services in foreign lands.

In what attitude does the United States itself stand to all the importers of this country? Gold was yesterday 158 per cent. in New York. The tariff of the United States, imposed for the protection of domestic manufactures and for the support of the Government, when it fixed the rates of duties on foreign goods at thirty, forty, or fifty per cent., makes these rates payable, not in lawful money of the United States, but in gold.

The Government has insisted upon the letter of the law, has insisted upon its importers paying for every dollar of duties exacted upon their goods in New York fifty-eight cents premium upon what the law intended at the time that law was made. No article can be imported from abroad, not even the arms and munitions of war, not even the iron plating for our naval vessels so necessary for the defense of our coast and the protection of our commerce, without paying at the custom-house its tariff in specie or in gold.

The Government of the United States, then, in this distinction which it draws for itself in the payment of its duties and the payment of a certain class of its creditors, recognizes the principle for which the gentleman from Illinois contends, that in the same description of funds which the Government exacts for itself, it should pay the gallant defenders of the country and the soldiers who are upholding with their lives the honor and flag of the country.

What is the next preference which the United States Government gives to its creditors? A loan of $500,000,000 has just been taken by the capitalists of the country. It is nominally a six per cent. loan, but the actual interest upon it in the lawful money of the country is nine per cent.; and while you are borrowing this money from the capitalists—who, be it spoken to their credit and their honor, are pouring it out into the Treasury of the country without stint—while they are receiving the payment of their interest in gold and silver upon that debt, all the gentleman from Illinois asks is that what you do to the capitalists of the country, that the preference you give to them in the loan, the interest of which is paid in gold and silver, you shall also do and give to the sailors of the Navy. I do not mean necessarily that you must pay them in gold and silver, but that you pay its equivalent in the lawful money of the United States.

The principle advocated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. J. C. ALLEN] is right, that where there are preferred creditors, and preferred modes of doing business, the soldier and the sailor should have the first preference.

In point of equity, too, it is also right. It is but proper that we should pay out the sums of money we receive, of the same description of money which we receive, or its equivalent, to the sailors of the Navy. We are now paying them in a currency greatly depreciated, depreciated to an extent of requiring $1.58 to make the equal of a dollar of the money you contracted to pay them. It is impossible for the sailors of the Navy to live upon that pittance, and much less is it possible for them to provide for the support of their families. No bounty is given them; no three, four, five, six hundred dollars, which you pay to the volunteers of the Army, is given to them. The gallant tars of New England and New York which man our vessels-of-war for the defense of our coasts and the protection of our commerce, these men have volunteered without bounty, but these men have expected from the United States that preference in the payment of their wages, that equal and exact justice which is given to the foreign minister, the foreign consul, the bondholder, and which the Government of the United States exacts for itself. They have expected this, and they demand that equal and exact justice shall be done them.

Mr. Chairman, there is no terrifying sum involved in the amendment of the gentleman. There is nothing alarming in it. The appropriation of this section is only $19,000,000. The sum is not large. The United States by economy elsewhere, such as I hope may be practiced, is entirely able to pay this amount in gold and silver to the sailors who are now in our Navy. It will not impoverish this Government; the sum can easily be saved elsewhere. We have saved $900,000, almost a million, of it to-day in curtailing the appropriations for this Capitol, and we can save it all by economy in other matters. But economy, a sordid economy, is not proper in the payment of the gallant defenders of our country.

Mr. A. MYERS. I hope, Mr. Chairman, the country, which reads the record of our proceedings, will not come to the conclusion that we have had a bill before us to increase the pay of our sailors and soldiers; because, upon that assumption, from the little debate that has taken place, the inference might be drawn that this side of the House was against such increase.

I do not know, I am not sufficiently acquainted with the laws that regulate our Navy Department, to know whether we have, in this way, the power to increase the pay of our sailors or not. Perhaps that belongs to the head of the Department. But, whether we have that power or not, we have certainly the power, at the proper time, to increase the pay of the soldier. And we have the power to do both; and the other side of the House may discover, when the proper time comes, that we are willing to exercise it.

I ask the pardon of the committee for saying one word or for occupying their time for a moment. I do not know that this is the place to make stump speeches, though I have nearly come to the conclusion that some of us think it is.

This bill, as I understand it, appropriates large amounts of money for certain specified purposes, and I am opposed to these propositions of independent legislation upon such a bill, when we have it within our power to consider that legislation legitimately and directly at another time and in another way.

I have noticed on several occasions like this that several honorable gentlemen whose experience in parliamentary proceedings is far greater than mine, take occasion to raise points, make arguments, and state facts, the tendency and effect of which is to leave upon the public mind the impression that this side of the House are opposed to any increase in the pay of the soldier or sailor.

Now, I do not know that these are the motives of the honorable gentlemen; I believe that to charge that upon them would be unparliamentary and perhaps unkind; but, sir, when the proper time arrives they may find that we upon this side of the House will be ready to introduce propositions, and in the proper manner sustain them, that will do full justice both to the sailor and to the soldier, to the full extent that the necessities of the Treasury will permit. If gentlemen upon the other side will only wait until the loyal majority which controls the action of this House are ready to take action in this matter, we can avoid all this trouble on unseasonable occasions about the poorly paid sailor and soldier, and the necessity of the increase of their monthly pay.

Perhaps the honorable gentleman from Illinois, who offers this amendment, might include Congressmen in his charitable list. Well, sir, I do not say that I would object to that, though I am well aware that it is an unpopular proceeding for a man to advocate the increase of his own pay. However, I will not express at this time an opinion upon that subject; nor will I say whether, in my judgment, it is necessary or not. I prefer for the present to keep quiet upon that point. [Laughter.]

I understand the object and the sole object of the bill under consideration to be the appropriation of a certain amount of money for certain specified objects relating to a particular branch of the public service; and I ask why it is that upon such a bill it is sought indirectly to increase the pay of persons in the employment of the Government?

Let us legislate upon the matter legitimately before us, and when the proposition of increased pay comes up legitimately we can consider it and vote upon it. Why, sir, in listening to this debate, if not a member of the House, I should almost suspect the motive of the gentleman who offered this proposition. Knowing the arguments that have been advanced upon other subjects, listening to the kind of propositions that have been made, and watching the character of the votes given, I say I am almost ready to suspect the motives of gentlemen who pretend, or say, they sincerely entertain a desire to pay the soldier and sailor in gold and silver. I do not know but that the motive may possibly be that gold and silver are so difficult to procure that if members can only get a law passed accomplishing that object, it will tend greatly to embarrass the Government, which they greatly desire above all things.

I hope no one entertains such a desire; but when we look at the course pursued by some gentlemen in relation to other matters and the motives which seem to actuate them—when we see, for instance, the dislike they have to taking the property of the rebels to replenish the public Treasury—it is difficult not to suspect the motive which led to the bringing forward of this kind, charitable, loyal, patriotic, sailor-loving, sailor-revering proposition.

Sir, this side of the House is behind that in nothing that relates to love for the soldier and the sailor and his payment in the best way the Government can pay him; and when that question comes properly before the House we shall make our intentions manifest in that respect.

But, Mr. Chairman, I am not sure that the sailors are so very poorly paid now if the prizes that are taken are properly distributed among them. I may be wrong in making that suggestion, for it may lead to the submission of an amendment to the gentleman's proposition now before us. But I say, nevertheless, that it may be, after all, that if the prizes taken are properly distributed among the sailors and the brave officers who command them upon the seas it may turn out that our sailors are not poorly paid.

I am under the impression that our soldiers do not take many prizes that inure to their benefit. In fact, about the only land craft that runs without grounding is the negro, and in him we do not recognize any kind of property that we can divide. [Laughter.]

But I come back to this inquiry: is the motive which prompts this amendment at this time and to this bill, to pay the soldier and the sailor in gold and silver, one having reference to the benefit of the soldier and sailor, or to the embarrassment of the Government? When this kind of argument is made—and these speeches delivered here, I cannot help inferring that the object is to put this side of the House in the wrong; and when I saw what seemed to me to be such an effort, I did not like to keep my seat without attempting to look to the bottom of the matter.

The soldier and sailor, when looking at the source from whence this proposition comes, and at the efforts which have heretofore proceeded from that source, will be constrained to feel a little as Demosthenes did when, in the midst of an eloquent oration in the Athenian Senate, all at once those who had been his lifelong opponents in every measure and every proposition commenced to clap their hands and stamp their feet. The earnest old man raised his eyes and exclaimed, "Ye gods! what's wrong? My enemies applaud." [Laughter.]

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I desire to say two or three words in reply to the gentleman who has just taken his seat. I have offered a simple proposition to amend a paragraph in the naval appropriation bill. I offered it in good faith, and in my humble way accompanied it with such reasons as suggested themselves to me why it should be adopted.

I do not profess, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. A. MYERS] who has just taken his seat, to be able to look into the human heart and read motives. I have been taught all my life to believe that there was but One, and that One not of us, who could read motives. It may be that the gentleman from Pennsylvania is gifted with a power and prescience beyond that of his fellow-men in this respect. It may be that he is endowed with a power of penetration and of vision beyond that which is vouchsafed to others, for it is said that the Almighty can, and does sometimes, select the weakest of his creatures to confound the mighty. [Laughter.]

Mr. Chairman, I repeat that the proposition which I submitted was offered in good faith; it was offered for the purpose of taking the sense of this committee as to whether they would pay to the seamen and sailors a compensation adequate to their support and the support of their families. And without coming at once boldly up and meeting the question involved in that proposition, gentlemen upon the other side of the House have attempted to defeat the proposition by discussing questions not involved in the amendment and not germane to it.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania who first replied to me, [Mr. STEVENS] attempting to evade the force of the proposition, suggests that perhaps we were looking to the payment of our seamen and sailors in the worthless bank currency of the West. I tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that I know of no officer of the Government, no soldier, sailor, or seaman, that has ever been paid in anything other than the lawful money of the Government, until certain agents were sent to us in the West who did endeavor to swindle the soldiers by paying them in worthless bank currency instead of the lawful money of the Government. For that we are not responsible.

Sir, we have no worthless bank currency in circulation in the West, unless all the currency we have is worthless. The currency of the banks which circulate at all is equal in value to the greenbacks.

Mr. ORTH. With the permission of the gentleman from Illinois, I desire to ask him who are the western agents he makes reference to that came there to swindle the soldiers?

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I am not able at this moment to furnish the gentleman with the names. I recollect a good deal of complaint was made of the matter. If the gentleman will look over the war records he will be able to find the names of some of the parties to whom I refer; and if he will go to the Old Capitol prison I think he will find some of them there.

To return to the point from which the interogatory of the gentleman from Indiana led me, I was proceeding to say that the bank currency in circulation in the West is equal in value with the greenbacks; it is received and paid out without discount; it is redeemed at the banks in greenbacks, and we know no difference in its value and that of the currency of the Government as a circulating medium.

But, sir, I reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS] that I had not in contemplation at all the payment of our soldiers or sailors in any currency other than that of the Government, that which the Congress of the United States declared should be received and paid out in payment of debts, although they may have been contracted for in gold and silver, that which was declared a legal tender for that purpose.

Now, sir, I shall not undertake to make or repeat an argument to prove that the legal-tender currency is not equal in value to gold and silver. Quotations of the gold markets make that apparent. Nor does this proposition come from me as a gold speculator. I have not been speculating in gold. We have no gold left in the western country to speculate in.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the gentleman from Illinois misunderstood what I said upon that point. I did not say the proposition came from a gold speculator. I said I thought nobody would complain of the medium of the lawful currency of the Government except the gold speculator of New York. I did not at all include the gentleman from Illinois. I should not have done it if I had known he had gold to speculate with or not. I do not know whether he has or not.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. It is very possible I may have misunderstood the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for I heard him very indistinctly upon that subject. What I desire especially to say is this: that if the pay of the sailor or seaman is inadequate, it is the duty of this committee, and it is our duty, when we go into the House for the final consideration of this bill, to say so upon record; it is the duty of gentlemen upon the other side of the House, as well as upon this side, if they do not like the proposition I have suggested—and it is the best that occurred to me at the moment—to bring forward some other proposition better matured for the accomplishment of the object, and not require all the dangerous and arduous services of our sailors, our seamen, and our soldiers, to be rendered for a pittance entirely inadequate for their support, and wholly inadequate to support their families, to prevent their wives and children from being driven to destitution, and to beggary, to avoid starvation.

Sir, I bring this proposition home to this committee, and I am willing to make it a test of loyalty, whether gentlemen are willing to provide a remuneration that will furnish a competence for the families of those who bear our flag upon the waters, as well as those who bare their breasts upon the battle-field. I do not intend that gentlemen upon the other side of the House shall escape by bringing into it questions of my loyalty and patriotism of my motives in submitting this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, if we are able to pay any of the officers of the Government, if we are able to pay ourselves from the public Treasury, in God's name let us pay those who are performing the more dangerous and the more arduous duty of defending our rights and the homes of our wives and children. Let us give them a fair compensation for their time and for their labor. I do not intend that this committee shall be diverted from the purpose of my amendment by these appeals to party prejudice, or by these insinuations against the loyalty of those who see fit to offer such propositions or advocate them.

Mr. STROUSE. I did not intend to take any part in this controversy whatever. I am entirely too much indisposed to do so satisfactorily. Still, I believe it to be my duty to say a word at this time. My own judgment accords to a very great extent with the position assumed by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN.]

A remark was made by my colleague, who spoke some moments since, [Mr. A. MYERS], about the loyalty of the majority which controls the action of this House; that they would regulate this matter.

Mr. Chairman, there should be no party discussion upon the subject of a necessary appropriation of money to pay the men employed in the public service. Sir, it is unfair and ungenerous to indulge in partisan language of that kind, at this time, upon a matter like the one at present before the House. I claim, as a Representative of the Keystone State, which I have the honor, in part, to represent upon this floor, with my colleagues upon the other side of the House, to be quite as loyal as they are in every respect, and under any and all circumstances. What their definition of the term "loyalty" is, I may not know, but when my colleague talks of loyalty, loyalty to the Constitution, loyalty to our institutions, and loyalty to our laws made in pursuance of the Constitution, I claim the right to say here upon this floor of the national Congress that I am the peer of any of these loyalty gentlemen in everything that is in fact loyalty.

If I choose to criticise the acts of the Administration, I am exercising a right which pertains to the loyalty of a member of the American Congress. And when we ask that our seamen, soldiers, and marines shall be paid a larger amount than they now receive, whether to be paid in gold or its equivalent in greenbacks, I say that, in my humble judgment, the proposition should commend itself to the sense of right and justice of every member of this body.

Now, sir, I do not say we should pay the sailors, seamen, or any men in the employ of the Government in gold, or in specie, because, as was remarked by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, we have not the gold to pay them with. There is not enough gold in the hands of the Government to pay them. Circumstances have placed us in a position which renders it impossible.

But, sir, I think it is right and proper that at this time there should be an increase in the pay of the men who peril their health and their lives abroad in distant lands and seas sufficient to furnish not only a support to the men themselves but to support their families at home. And when a proposition is submitted thus to increase the pay of the men who are doing service for the preservation of the country and its institutions, I care not whether it comes from this side of the House or from the other side, I protest against its being made the ground for an attack upon our loyalty.

The term in modern phraseology I know has a peculiar significance; but, sir, I say here, as I will say it always, that we hurl back any insinuation or inference against our loyalty in the teeth of those who make it. Our patriotism requires no trumpeting. We do not belong to the "lat-tar-day saints," and can look complacently upon these modern loyal philanthropists, who denounce every conservative and Democratic member who is not, like themselves, fatally bent upon "unconditional loyalty" and crazy on abolitionism.

We advocate this proposition in good faith for the benefit of those who are fighting for the preservation of the Union. We want that they shall have an increase of pay so that their families may be saved from ruin and destitution. If they cannot be paid in gold, let there be an equivalent increase of pay. We ought to recollect that many of our sailors and naval officers are upon foreign stations where the currency of our Government cannot be called a circulating medium. It is right and proper that something should be done so that they shall receive what was promised to them, and not one half or one third the amount. When we appropriate millions and hundreds of millions, it is proper that we should be just, if not generous, to these brave men to whom we are indebted for the victories of our arms, and the greatness and glory of our country, past and present.

Mr. MORRILL obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. STEVENS, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being bill of the House No. 156, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments; and also that the committee had had under consideration the Navy appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. STEVENS, (at half past three o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, January 27, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

Mr. WILSON. As I understand the reading of the Journal, reference is made there to a letter addressed by the Senator from Kentucky to the chairman of the Military Committee. I should like to hear that part of it read again.

The Secretary read, as follows:

"The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. WILSON, the 8th instant, to expel from the Senate the Hon. GARRETT DAVIS; and

"Mr. DAVIS having called for the reading of a letter addressed by him to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, disavowing any purpose in the resolution submitted by him on the 5th instant to incite the Army to mutiny, or the people to sedition or any violence whatever, and the letter having been read by the Secretary."

Mr. WILSON. I think there is a mistake about that. I have received no such letter. I think that letter must have been addressed to the Committee on the Judiciary, and it ought to be so recorded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The original letter appears to have been directed to the Military Committee, and the Journal is therefore right. The Senator from Kentucky is understood to have intended to address it to the Committee on the Judiciary, and the Chair believes he desires to have the letter and record changed to correspond with what was his design.

Mr. WILSON. Then the Journal will be corrected accordingly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal will be so corrected.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to present a memorial of a large number of rectifiers, distillers, and merchants of the city of Cincinnati, remonstrating against the proposed tax upon spirits on hand, stating at some length their reasons for their opposition to the tax. This memorial comes to me in the form of a telegraphic dispatch, and therefore is not signed by the persons purporting to sign it; but as I know many of them to be leading citizens of the city of Cincinnati, I take the liberty of presenting it, though I know it is not exactly according to the rules of the Senate. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The paper was so referred.

Mr. FOOT presented the report of Thomas U. Walter, architect of the United States Capitol extension, made to the Secretary of the Interior, in relation to the appropriation for carrying on the work of the two eastern porticoes and steps of the Capitol extension; which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

Mr. WILSON. I present the petition of Elizabeth A. C. Akers and other ladies employed as copyists in the Quartermaster General's office, asking for an increase of their compensation, and I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN subsequently said: I observe that a few moments since a petition praying for an increase of compensation was referred, on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON,] to the Committee on Finance. The proper business of the Committee on Finance is to examine the appropriation bills and matters already provided for by law. The question of examining how far salaries in the Departments ought to be increased is one that does not belong to us. If it should be decided to be necessary and proper to increase these salaries, the bill making the proper appropriations should be referred to the Committee on Finance. I really hope that this large class of petitions will not be sent to us. As this petition has reference to the War Department, it more properly belongs to the Committee on Military Affairs; and I move that the reference of the petition be changed, and that it be sent to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That order will be made, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of W. B. Spooner and others, citizens of Boston, Massachusetts, praying for a uniform ambulance system for the armies of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARLAN presented a memorial of the religious Society of Friends in the State of Iowa, praying for exemption from the performance of military duty; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented the memorial of L. P. Wetherby and others, citizens of Hudson, St. Croix county, Wisconsin, (accompanied by a map,) remonstrating against an appropriation of lands to the State of Minnesota to aid in the construction of a railroad from the end of Lake Superior to the city of St. Paul, to run entirely on the Minnesota side of the St. Croix river; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I present the petition of the Board of Agriculture of Indiana, praying for an extension of the time within which that State may accept the grant of lands made to the different States for the benefit of agricultural colleges. As that subject is before the Senate, the bill contemplated by the petitioners having been reported to the Senate by the Committee on Public Lands, it is not necessary that any reference of this petition should be made. I therefore move that it lie on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CHANDLER presented the petition of George W. Fish, praying for compensation for services rendered as consul of the United States at Ningpo, from the 1st day of April, 1861, to the 8th day of August, 1861; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Lucy Gwynne and others; praying that a charter may be granted to them as incorporators of Providence Hospital, in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWE presented the petition of William D. Colburn and others, citizens of Wisconsin, praying for a modification of the reciprocity treaty; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of Charles A. Pitcher, of Washington, District of Columbia, praying for compensation for the use in the penitentiary of his patent for a machine for making brooms; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. BEN EYCK presented a petition of citizens of New Jersey, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Egg Harbor City to Tuckerton, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas, presented resolutions of the Legislature of Kansas in favor of auditing and paying the claims of the loyal citizens of that State for losses incurred by the raids and depredations of guerrillas and rebels committed in that State since the commencement of the present rebellion; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials praying for a uniform ambulance system for the armies of the United States, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 21) to provide for the printing of official reports of the operations of the armies of the United States, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a joint resolution (S. No. 20) extending the benefits of the bounty granted by the act of July 22, 1861, to certain soldiers who entered the service of the United States prior to May 3, 1861, reported it without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 58) to incorporate the Columbia Railway Company, in the District of Columbia, reported it adversely.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into the propriety and expediency of providing by law that acting appointments in the naval service be submitted to the Senate for confirmation in all cases where regular appointments in the Navy are required to be submitted, reported a bill (S. No. 76) relating to appointments in the naval service; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. WILLEY, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of George W. Riggs, jr., president of the Washington Gas-Light Company, praying for a repeal of so much of the section of the act making further appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government, approved July 11, 1862, as fixes the price of gas furnished by the company to the Government, reported a bill (S. No. 77) to amend the act incorporating the Washington Gas-Light Company; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. HARLAN, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 60) amendatory of the homestead law, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 78) to provide for the safe and speedy transmission of money from soldiers to their families and friends; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 79) to incorporate Providence Hospital in the city of Washington, District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. CONNESS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 80) to provide for the better organization of Indian affairs in California; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask permission to have withdrawn from the files of the Senate the papers in the case of Hodges and Lansdale, in which I understand there was an unfavorable report made as far back as the 7th of March, 1860. The application is to withdraw the papers that they may be used elsewhere. I do not know whether it can be done or not, sir, but I make the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It can be done by the unanimous consent of the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the order will be made.

Mr. NESMITH. In the case of Patrick W. Douglas, referred to the Committee on Pensions at the beginning of this session, an adverse report has been made. I understand that the rules of the Senate allow the papers to be withdrawn in such cases where the adverse report has not been acted upon. I desire to state that among the papers of Mr. Douglas are some discharges from the service. It is important that he should have them, not with the view of presenting them again, but for his own protection. I therefore ask that he have leave to withdraw the papers.

Leave was granted.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GRIMES. I observe in the reading of the Journal that I have been made a member of the select committee raised on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] I ask the Senate to excuse me from service on that committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that he be excused from serving on the select committee ordered by the Senate and appointed by the Chair to make investigations into certain matters relating to the Navy Department.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will appoint the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of the Senator from Iowa.

SPECULATION IN GOLD.

Mr. LANE, of Kansas. I desire the unanimous consent of the Senate to propound a question to the chairman of the Committee on Finance, as he is in his seat. Some two or three weeks ago I introduced a bill having for its object the suppression of gambling in gold. I should like to know from him what the committee have done or will do upon the subject.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I can only say in answer to the inquiry that the Committee on Finance, or different members of it, have had the subject under consideration, and are still considering it; but we have not yet matured any measure in relation to the matter. We are obliged to give attention to other subjects, though that is of a great deal of importance to be sure. The legislation which has been had does not seem to have produced much effect. The committee as yet have come to no conclusion on the subject, and I cannot give any definite opinion as to what conclusion they will arrive at, nor even as to the time when they will arrive at a conclusion. I will state to the Senator that the subject is also under consideration, as I understand, in the other House, or by the Committee of Ways and Means; and as any legislation on the subject must pass both Houses, I think no time is lost by allowing such period as may be necessary for the careful consideration of the subject, and it is by no means a matter that is free from difficulty.

PENSION APPROPRIATION BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The regular order of business, there being nothing in the morning hour, is the Calendar; and the first bill on the Calendar is the bill (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, which is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was read at length. It proposes to appropriate the following sums for the payment of pensions for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865: For invalid pensions under various acts, $1,000,000. For pensions to widows, mothers, children, and sisters, under the first section of the act of 4th July, 1836; act of July 21, 1848; first section of the act of February 3, 1853; June 3, 1858; and July 14, 1862, $2,200,000.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAY OF INSPECTORS OF CUSTOMS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to take up a little bill reported from the Committee on Finance authorizing an increase of the pay of inspectors of customs.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 66) to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in such ports as he may think it advisable so to do, and may designate, by adding to the present compensation of those officers a sum not exceeding one dollar per day.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I was about to say a word in explanation of this bill, but no Senator seems to desire it. The Committee on Finance are exceedingly averse to, and as a general rule set themselves against increasing pay in any case whatever. It is only in very special cases, where they are convinced that it is absolutely due as a matter of justice and necessity to officers, that they cannot get along without it, that they consent to take the matter even into consideration. This bill is exceedingly limited. There are certain ports in the United States, undoubtedly, where the compensation of inspectors of customs should be increased. It is now less than $1,000 a year, and it has remained so for perhaps more than half a century. The committee have come to the conclusion that it ought to be increased in certain places, and they left the designation of those places to the Secretary of the Treasury, being unable to obtain the kind of information that would enable them to do it. They are very few, however. I think there is no objection to the bill as it stands, and as a matter of justice it ought to be passed.

The bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House of Representatives had passed a bill (No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolutions; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

A bill (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865;

A bill (S. No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (S. No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson;

A joint resolution (S. No. 3) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker, Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac;

A joint resolution (S. No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and the officers and men who fought under his command; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 156) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. WILSON. I move now to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. CONNESS. If the Senator from Massachusetts will permit me, I should like to call up Senate bill No. 60, reported from the Committee on Public Lands this morning. It will not occupy perhaps more than a few moments in its consideration. The bill referred to by the Senator from Massachusetts is one of general importance. I will say one word in explanation of the bill I desire to have taken up. It proposes amendments to the homestead act of great consequence to the people of our country. It proposes no change that the Senate will not probably readily assent to. I ask the consent of the Senate to consider it now.

Mr. CLARK. Unless there is some very urgent reason for haste, I think that bill had better be postponed a little longer.

Mr. CONNESS. There is, in this: that it proposes to extend to citizens of the United States who are soldiers in the Army or are engaged in the naval service the privileges of that act. They cannot now avail themselves of them until this amendment shall be passed.

Mr. CLARK. I will say to the Senator from California that I read the bill over, but did not have an opportunity to consider it as long as I might desire; and the Senator knows very well that neither he nor I have very much time to spare. If he will let it lie over for a day or two I will give my attention to it and examine it. I do not mean to say by this that I am not entirely in favor of it. I think I am, as I understand it.

Mr. CONNESS. I consent to that, and will waive my motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts moves to postpone all prior orders, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. GRIMES. I propose to amend the bill in lines ten and eleven of section two, by striking out the words "two months' pay in advance," and inserting, "such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding the sum of $100;" so that the clause shall read:

And that every person of African descent who shall hereafter be mustered into the service shall receive such sums in bounty as the President shall order in the different States and parts of the United States, not exceeding the sum of $100.

I will state my purpose in offering this amendment. I think that if a colored man enlists in Massachusetts or Rhode Island or Iowa, and goes into the Army for the term of three years, and serves the country, he ought to be and is entitled to a bounty. It may be possible that this class of troops may be secured for a very small bounty in some portions of the country, as in South Carolina or Alabama or Louisiana; and if so, while the President paid $100 in the States which I have named to free colored persons as a bounty for enlisting in the Army, he would, under this amendment, be authorized in these other States to give such smaller sum as he might find from experience or from representations made to him by the proper officers it might be necessary for him to give. I received a letter a few days ago—I regret that I have not got it with me—from a gentleman in Missouri speaking of the necessity of something being done in this connection. He said that at present there was only a sum of two dollars paid to any person there for a colored recruit, either to the colored man who enlisted or to any person who might be engaged in securing him for the service; but that if there was a bounty of twenty or thirty dollars paid, a vast number of these persons might be collected into the service. This is the object of the amendment, and I think it a very laudable one.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POWELL. I move to strike out the third section of this bill; and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when any person of African descent, whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof, shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he, his mother, and his wife and children, shall forever thereafter be free, any law, usage, or custom whatsoever to the contrary notwithstanding; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. President, this section of the bill, to my mind, is clearly and palpably unconstitutional. I should like the chairman of the Military Committee, who reported the bill, to point me to the clause of the Constitution which authorizes the passage of such a section as this. I believe it has heretofore been admitted on all hands, by all political organizations of this country, with very few exceptions, that the institution of African slavery in the States where it exists is a matter of local concernment that cannot be interfered with by the action of the Federal Government. Now, this section proposes that if a man of African descent shall be enlisted in the Army or join the Army of the United States, not only he himself, but also his mother, his wife, and his children shall all be free in consequence of that act, any law or usage or custom to the contrary notwithstanding. Well, sir, suppose that a slave belonging to a rebel in the State of Mississippi, if you please, or any other State, were to enlist into the Army, and he should have children or a mother or a wife, who were the slaves of loyal men in adhering and loyal States, under this provision they would be free, provided this law could have any efficacy whatever. There is certainly no power in this Congress to pass any such law. It is depriving loyal men of loyal States of their property by the legislative enactment of this Congress.

It was very distinctly and clearly set forth even in the Chicago platform that each State has a right to regulate and manage its domestic institutions in its own way. The truth is that the question is too plain for argument; but I should be obliged to the gentleman who reported this bill if he would indicate to us the clause in the Constitution that authorizes this section. He certainly will not contend that we can do things here in our legislative capacity when there is no power conferred upon us by the Constitution of the country to do them.

But, sir, I shall say no more at present. I desire to hear what vindication can be made of this section. It seems to me to be so clearly a violation of the Constitution, that I feel confident the Senate will not for a moment hesitate to sustain the motion I have made to strike it out. It is palpably wrong in every respect. It deprives men of their property, and declares free the slaves of men who live in loyal States, who have been always loyal, and whose property has not been used in any way to promote or to aid the rebellion, merely because the kindred, perhaps in some other States, of one of their slaves has joined the Army of the United States.

Mr. HENDERSON. Is it in order to move an amendment to this section before the vote is taken on striking it out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. HENDERSON. Then I move to amend the section by striking out the words "his mother, and his wife and children," in the fifth line; and after the word "notwithstanding," in the seventh line, to insert "and his mother, his wife and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862."

Mr. GRIMES. I believe the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri is substantially the law as it stands to-day. Any person of African descent now held in bondage, and whose service is claimed by a person in rebellion, or who has furnished aid and comfort to the rebellion, if he enlists into the service of the United States becomes a free man. The proposition in the third section of this bill is to extend that existing law so as to set free any colored person, whether he belongs to a loyal citizen or to a disloyal citizen, if he shall enlist into the service of the United States and shall remain in the service for the period of three years.

Mr. JOHNSON. Without compensation to the owner?

Mr. GRIMES. That is a question which is not provided for in this bill, but which will undoubtedly come up hereafter. If the Government sets free a person to whom some one has a legitimate and legal claim, recognized as such by the Government, unquestionably he would be entitled to pay. The reason why I shall vote for this section is that I am exceedingly anxious to pass a law by which it shall be declared that if a man who has periled his life for me and for the institutions of my country at Port Hudson—I care not what kind of a claim may be set up to his service or who may set it up—is claimed by any one, that claim shall not be regarded. I am unwilling that after he has thus periled his life and been wounded in my defense, he shall be taken off to slavery by any person or under any sort of institution. I think that such a proposition as this will meet the approval and commendation of the country, and I rejoice that the Senator from Massachusetts and the Committee on Military Affairs have given us an opportunity to record our votes in favor of it.

Mr. WILKINSON. There is no necessity for the adoption of the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. The thirteenth section of the act of July 17, 1862, "to amend the act calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, approved February 28, 1795, and the acts amendatory thereof, and for other purposes," contains the following proviso:

"Provided, That the mother, wife, and children of such man or boy of African descent shall not be made free by the operation of this act except where such mother, wife, or children owe service or labor to some person who, during the present rebellion, has borne arms against the United States or adhered to their enemies by giving them aid and comfort."

That is the law as it now stands; and if the Senator from Missouri wishes to carry out the purpose or to retain this provision of the existing law, all he has to do is to oppose this section entirely. I think, Mr. President, that the clause I have just read is the most disgraceful legislation of the Congress which passed that law. It is a disgrace to the nation to pass such a law, and I am very much rejoiced that the Committee on Military Affairs have introduced this bill wiping it out. What are the facts? We muster a man into the service of the United States and free him if he serves in the armies of the Union to put down this rebellion, but we suffer his mother, his wife, and his children to remain in slavery. What is freedom worth to a man who has served in the armies of the Union to put down this rebellion, if you take his family away from him and keep them in slavery? I believe that the public sentiment of the country requires the adoption of this section; and I should be very much surprised if this Congress, after providing for mustering men into the service of the country, and after declaring that those who serve their country shall be free men, should decide that their wives or their children should remain in slavery. I hope the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri will not prevail.

Mr. HENDERSON. I certainly, so far as the mere question of the existence of slavery is concerned in any one of the States, care nothing in regard to this amendment. I believe that the amendment adopted in the law from which the Senator from Minnesota read was offered by myself, and I regret very much that the Senator should think that the legislation of itself was disgraceful legislation. That is an opinion of his, an opinion in which I do not concur.

I do not desire that any Senator shall suppose that I have offered this amendment with a view of protecting, in any one of the States, the institution of slavery. I have not been engaged very recently in the protection of that institution; and so far as I can go constitutionally to abolish the institution throughout the country, I most unhesitatingly would do so. I have offered an amendment here to the Constitution in order to get rid of it not only in the border States, but in every State in the American Union, and I shall most cheerfully vote for it, because in that way, in my judgment, we can constitutionally do this thing which seems to be so desirable.

But, Mr. President, the proposition contained in the third section of this bill is, that when a slave, or one who is held as a slave under the laws of one of the States, shall be mustered into the service of the United States, the relatives of that slave shall all be free. I ask the Senator from Minnesota, and the Senator from Iowa, who have advocated this proposition, and I desire them to answer, if Congress has the power by the mere fact of a slave serving for an hour or two hours, or a day, to emancipate all of his relatives, has it not also the power to-day to pass a law emancipating the slaves in Kentucky and Missouri, entirely upon the broad ground that slavery stands in the way of our peace, that it is an institution which has originated the rebellion, and that in order to put down the rebellion it is necessary to get rid of it, and therefore we have the power to pass it?

Mr. GRIMES. Does the Senator desire an answer?

Mr. HENDERSON. I do.

Mr. GRIMES. I will say very frankly that I have not any doubt of it at all, and I shall be very anxious to have an opportunity to vote for the passage of such a law as that.

Mr. HENDERSON. I think the Senator has answered very properly, because his answer now is the proper sequence of the remarks that he has made. I differ from him in that respect. He may be correct; he may be advocating the true and the proper doctrine; but, sir, I differ from his position, and I must say that this doctrine is certainly a very new one. It certainly never has been advocated before in the Congress of the United States.

Mr. GRIMES. For the reason that we have never had a civil war before.

Mr. HENDERSON. Do I understand the Senator to assume the ground that this power would not exist in the Congress of the United States but for the existence of the present civil war? Is that his position? I understand that it is. He assents to it. Well, now, Mr. President, of course, upon an amendment of this character, I am not disposed to go into a discussion of the extended or enlarged powers of the Government during the existence of a civil war. I see no necessity whatever for the legislation proposed in the third section of the bill before us. If I could vote for it I could vote for the proposition which the Senator from Iowa says he is prepared to vote for and which he desires to vote for. That question ought to be tested; and if it be desired to abolish slavery throughout the United States by an act of Congress, let the proposition be made and let us meet the question boldly and manfully. I am no advocate for the institution, and most cheerfully will I listen to the arguments of the Senator from Iowa to demonstrate to me, if he possibly can, that it is within the power of Congress to pass such an act. This proposition involves that very question, for such a measure is but the necessary logical result of the passage of the third section of this bill. The proposition contained in that section is simply this: that no matter how loyal a man may have been in one of the slaveholding States, no matter whether he may have most willingly given the privilege to any of his slaves to enlist in the service of the United States, no matter whether he may have himself entered the service and given his own sons to the service, you will take his property, that which by the laws of his State is regarded as his property. I speak not of a man in one of the seceded States, but of one in my own State of Missouri for instance, which I deny has ever adopted any act whatever to indicate any purpose of leaving the Union. It is true we have had a great many boisterous spirits that have provoked much difficulty in the State; but I deny that in any proper sense of the word it can be considered a disloyal State. So of Kentucky; so of Maryland. Sir, there are thousands of as loyal men as live who happen to be slaveholders in those respective States. I am satisfied of it; but I know very well that the mere expression of this opinion is calculated in the minds of some gentlemen to cast suspicion upon even my own loyalty. Sir, if I did not know it, perhaps I should think differently, perhaps I should believe as the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota do; but I know the fact; I have witnessed it; and knowing it, I cannot speak otherwise than as I have done.

Let me say to the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Minnesota that my impression is that when you put this rebellion down, slavery forever dies because of the fact that they have organized this rebellion on the existence of the institution; and if the rebellion goes by the board the institution itself goes. I can further state to those gentlemen that I believe no State will again take its place in the Union without first by the action of its own people abolishing slavery. That is my opinion. I have never doubted, I do not to-day doubt, that the very first intimation of this rebellion was the destruction of slavery in this country. I have never changed my mind on that point. I have said it repeatedly. But I do protest against legislation which is calculated, unnecessarily as I think, to irritate loyal men. I see no necessity for it, because our States are coming to the emancipation of slavery, and we are now in my own State putting into the service every man that can serve. We have adopted an act of gradual emancipation, and I think an act of immediate emancipation will be passed in the course of a very short time. Why not let the people themselves take action on this subject without incumbering bills of this character with uncertainties and difficulties as to who may be made free under it?

It is unnecessary for me to repeat what was so ably and eloquently said by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] at the time this very proposition was under discussion here before. It is one of the misfortunes, one of the difficulties of the institution of slavery that a slave has no wife; and, sir, unless you can determine that fact under the laws of the respective States, I do not see how you are properly to get along with a provision such as is contained in the third section. Besides, the States themselves are marching up to this great work. I have no doubt that within the next twelve months Arkansas will abolish slavery forever and ever; and even if South Carolina, if North Carolina and Virginia should be unwilling to adopt emancipation, and there should be any danger of their returning to the Union with the institution of slavery, the proposition that I submitted a few days ago will rid us of that difficulty. Three fourths of the States can be obtained to vote for the proposition amending the Constitution such as I have submitted, and that forever abolishes the institution of slavery in the remaining one fourth. It ought to be adopted. We ought to get rid of it in this way. I see a determination manifested on the part of the loyal people of this country that slavery shall cease to exist. I do not object to that determination, I am not going to fight against it. Perhaps it is the blessing of all others that is to follow the curses of this re-billion. Perhaps it will compensate us in some respect for the treasure and the blood expended—

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is the duty of the Chair to remind the Senate that the hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, which is the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. HENDERSON. I have said, Mr. President, all that I desire to say on this subject.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WILSON on the 8th instant:

Whereas the Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky, did, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions in which, among other things, it is declared that "the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands," thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States and those in authority who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union; and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States, and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled.

The pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOWARD, to strike out the word "expelled" and to insert the words "censured by the Senate."

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, but two or three propositions occur to me as pertinent or desirable to be considered upon the question now before the Senate. On the 5th of January the Senator from Kentucky, rising in his place and claiming to exercise the privilege of a member of this body, introduced a series of resolutions that have attracted subsequent debate. On the 8th of January the Senator from Massachusetts introduced a resolution arraigning the Senator from Kentucky, so to speak, for a breach of the privilege of the Senate in the introduction of his resolutions and proposing his expulsion. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] yesterday proposed to modify the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts by providing for the censure of the Senator from Kentucky, in lieu of the proposed expulsion. To this arraignment, so to speak, the Senator from Kentucky has replied that his resolutions were well considered, thoughtfully considered; that they were prepared with deliberation; that he had thought upon the topics introduced in them; that he deliberately planned and executed the resolutions, and that he stands by them to-day.

This resolution and the whole subject-matter of it raises in my mind simply a question of privilege. The only question for us to consider is whether the Senator from Kentucky, according to the principles of parliamentary law which govern all such bodies, and whether within the rules of this body, was privileged to introduce these resolutions.

The honorable Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] apologizes, if I may use the expression, for these resolutions. He regrets that they are here. He holds that they are an impropriety. He does not agree with the opinions they express, nor the sentiments they inculcate. He thinks there are many things in them that are manifestly improper; but yet, as I gather his argument, it is that there has obtained in the American Congress, and particularly in this Senate, a practice of doing precisely such improper things, and that this practice running back to a time whereof the memory of man runneth not to the contrary has become a second privilege in the Senate; and the honorable Senator gives us many instances which he supposes to be parallel, and which afford, if not a justification, an excuse for these resolutions. He has told us that in the war of 1812 the opposition to the management of that war were particularly outspoken upon the conduct of the war. The policy of the war was denounced; the measures of the war and the measures of the Government were denounced in language which he thinks would not compare very favorably with that contained in these resolutions. Numerous other instances of a similar kind are referred to by the honorable Senator as an apology for the impropriety of speech and language contained in these resolutions.

Now, sir, it occurs to me that the cases are not at all parallel. In the first place, it should be considered that nobody questions the right of a Senator to characterize the acts of the Government in legitimate debate. Nobody would arraign the Senator from Kentucky if, upon a question before the Senate, he should characterize the acts of the Government as he might deem proper. The distinction which I think is obvious between the case put by the honorable Senator and the case before the Senate is that the opposition in 1812, when the measures of the Administration were before the Senate and before the Congress, undoubtedly did characterize them as they might very properly do without being held responsible elsewhere, in the language of the Constitution.

Again, the honorable Senator thinks that the Senator from Kentucky is excusable on the score of his known patriotism, his long public career, his purity of life, &c., and this patriotism, he thinks, has been exhibited before the Senate in an eminent degree. He tells you that when a member was arraigned before the Senate on a charge of disloyalty, on the question of his expulsion from this body, among those who were foremost in the support of that charge against that Senator, the Senator from Indiana, was the honorable Senator from Kentucky. I was a little curious after the adjournment yesterday to look at the argument of the honorable Senator from Kentucky on that occasion; and I most heartily approve of the opinions and sentiments therein expressed. What was the ground of the honorable Senator against the then sitting member from Indiana? He arraigned him at the bar of the Senate for disloyalty. In what respect? What was the specification and charge? It was that that Senator from the beginning of this great struggle with the rebels had, in the first place, shown no sympathy at all with the Government; and in the second place, from the beginning of the present Administration and the efforts of the Government to put down this rebellion, he told the Senate and the country, and he said truly, that the Senator from Indiana had been opposed to all the measures of the Administration calculated and designed to overthrow the rebellion. From these two arguments, illustrated with great learning and very great research out of the history of the country, he came to the conclusion that it was his bounden duty to vote the vote of expulsion against the Senator from Indiana, because he was faithless in an hour when the perils of the country demanded his fidelity; because he had manifested no sympathy for his Government; and because, moreover, he had shown a disposition to oppose his own individual will to measures which the Government that had charge and direction of public affairs deemed necessary for the prosecution of the war. The honorable Senator from Kentucky in that speech inculcated the doctrine that it was not optional with a Senator on this floor in times like these to set up his individual will against the Government who are to judge of the measures necessary for the prosecution of the war.

Now, sir, I say that an apology based on such a support and such an exhibition of patriotism—and I honor it—is not open to the honorable Senator; because, tried by his own argument, tried by the opinions and sentiments of that speech made against the then sitting member from Indiana, the honorable Senator could not stand a moment in this Senate Chamber on these resolutions; for his resolutions from beginning to end are a comprehensive and sweeping denunciation not only of the policy of the Administration in general, but of all its important measures. He stands here against his doctrines and against his sentiments as uttered in that speech when he was about to give a vote in favor of the expulsion of that Senator. He stands here now manifesting toward the Government of his country not only the utmost hostility, but denouncing in the most sweeping and unmeasured terms of abuse that Government, its policy, and all its measures.

Then the honorable Senator from Maryland thought there was another circumstance which might be pleaded in extenuation or excuse for the confessed impropriety of these resolutions. While listening to the eloquent apology of the distinguished Senator from Maryland, I had almost come to the conclusion that these resolutions, strong as they are, bitter in their tone as they certainly are, and as you will see if you read them, were after all but the expression of his abhorrence of rebellion and his abhorrence also of what he understands to be the arbitrary usurpa-tions of power on the part of the Government. The Senator from Maryland tells us that on this question there is a variety of opinion; from which I suppose we are to infer that the Senator from Kentucky is not alone in his opinions as to the arbitrary acts of the Government and its manifold usurpations of power.

But, sir, of what does the honorable Senator from Kentucky complain in his resolutions? In substance, his complaints are against the policy of the Government generally, particularly the emancipation of the slaves, confiscation, arbitrary arrests, and last and most sweeping of all I believe is the complaint that the Government of the United States has adopted a policy which in the end will reduce these States to the condition of Territories.

Now, if I understand the argument of the Senator from Maryland on this point, it is that the honorable Senator from Kentucky may be perfectly honest in the expression of these opinions; that he may feel what he utters here; that the country is in danger; and that, in his abhorrence and his apprehension of this arbitrary exercise of power, and its effects upon the country, in his patriotic ardor to serve his country, he utters these sentiments. Let us see whether this is open to the honorable Senator. Let us see whether the record of the Senator will allow him to put in a plea of this sort. Those who know the robust nature and character of the intellect of the honorable Senator from Kentucky know very well that he is the last man in the world who would put in such a plea as that for himself. But, sir, on this question of the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the Government which has furnished the opportunity, and which justifies the introduction of these resolutions, let us see how the honorable Senator from Kentucky himself stands.

On the 30th December, 1861, the Senator from Kentucky, then recently in his seat, introduced a bill, and with the permission of the Chair I will read a few of its provisions. The first section provides:

"That from and after the passage of this act the following described persons shall be held and taken to be alien enemies to the said United States, for all purposes whatsoever, namely: all persons holding any office under, or in the employment of, or rendering any service, civil or military, to, or in the name of the pretended government of the so-called confederate States of America, or of any State thereof, or of any pretended provisional government of any of the United States; all persons then belonging to, or who may thereafter join, the army or navy, or any military or naval organization, body, or force of the said confederate States, or any of them, or of any pretended provisional government of any of the United States; all persons who may attach themselves to, or aid in getting up, any military or naval organization, expedition, force, or body under the authority, in the name of, or for the benefit of said confederate States, or any of them, or any pretended provisional government of any of the United States; all persons who shall organize, or attempt to organize, or aid in such organization, or in the continuation, or attempt to continue and carry on, any pretended provisional government of any of the United States, or take any office or employment under, or render any service to, or do any act whatsoever for or in the name of any such pretended provisional government of any of the United States; and all persons who may then or thereafter adhere to and give aid and comfort to the said southern confederate States, or to any of them, or to any pretended provisional government of any of the United States."

The next section is in these words:

"That as the persons described in the previous section of this act become to be alien enemies, and simultaneously therewith all their property and estate, of every kind and description, including money, evidences of debt, choses in action, and every right and interest, legal or equitable, in possession, reversion, or remainder, or in any way in expectancy, shall be forfeited to, and be immediately, without any legal proceedings whatever, vested in the United States of America, being, however, subject to the payment and satisfaction of all the bona fide existing debts, obligations, and liabilities to all loyal people of the person or persons to whom the same have belonged, as would have been the case had there been no such forfeiture. And simultaneously with any and every forfeiture under this act taking effect, a lien shall be created and shall then exist upon all estate and property, and every other right so forfeited and vested in the United States, in favor of all persons who are loyal to the Union and the Government of the United States;" &c.

Mr. President, can it be said that a Senator who introduced a proposition so sweeping and comprehensive in its provisions as that would be filled with indignation at the idea that the present Administration proposed to confiscate the property of rebels? Why, sir, in its comprehension and scope this bill, if carried out to the letter, would confiscate all the property, including slaves, in that whole section of country; because when you come to consider the specification of individuals to whom it applies, you will find it applies to everybody in that whole country who in any way whatever have participated in the rebellion, or in any way given aid and comfort to it.

Then again, sir, at a little later period I find the honorable Senator, who it is now said is so shocked at the exhibitions of arbitrary power and the purpose of the Government in carrying on—

Mr. DAVIS. Will the Senator allow me to interpose a word?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. If he will read through that bill he will discover that the question and fact of forfeiture there is referred expressly to the civil courts of the country, and is not to be decided by the President or by military tribunals. That is my recollection.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that is so; but that does not affect the force of my argument.

On the 13th of February, 1862, the honorable Senator introduced a series of resolutions in the Senate. In the first place they go on to say what the duty of the Government is in putting down this rebellion; and then the concluding paragraph of the last resolution is in these words:

"And if the people of any State cannot, or will not, reconstruct their State government and return to loyalty and duty, Congress should provide a government for such State as a Territory of the United States, securing to the people thereof their appropriate constitutional rights."

Mr. CLARK. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Maine what is the date of that resolution; if it was not before the President's emancipation proclamation?

Mr. MORRILL. Long before.

Mr. CLARK. There is "a nigger in the woodpile" now. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRILL. The resolutions were introduced February 13, 1862.

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator allow me another word?

Mr. MORRILL. Certainly, sir.

Mr. DAVIS. I hold this to be the correct principle: if a State is in rebellion and has expelled the authority of the United States and her people will not organize a government for themselves, as a matter of right and as a matter of necessity it devolves upon the military commander who has possession of the military department to organize a military government for the time for that country. That, I hold, is the correct principle.

Mr. SUMNER. The resolution says, "Congress."

Mr. DAVIS. We know what the resolution says. It has been read, sir.

Mr. MORRILL. The resolution appeals to the power of Congress in such a case. But what I am introducing here is no part of the argument which I intend to address to the Senate by and by on the subject of these resolutions. It is by way of repelling or replying to the argument of the honorable Senator from Maryland that possibly out of the patriotic ardor of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, out of his apprehensions of the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of this Government, in the ebullition, so to speak, of his patriotism, he had been drawn into these declarations. My object is to show that among those who have been most sweeping in their propositions of confiscation and emancipation and the reduction of States to Territories, nobody on this floor begins to compare with the honorable Senator from Kentucky. When the future historian of this country shall search the records of this Senate to see who was first and foremost in the invention, as it is supposed, of this dogma of reducing States to Territories, if the honorable Senator from Kentucky is disposed to assert his rights, I am sure from the examination I have made he will have the right to patent it as the first discoverer. At any rate he is the first man who promulgated the doctrine in this Senate. The right to reduce a State to a Territory is asserted here, and that it will be the duty of Congress to inaugurate a policy which shall reduce States to Territories and govern them as Territories, to the end that the people may have the rights of self-government and the rights of republican government. I am not quarreling with the Senator about that. I approve it. I congratulated the Senator then when he introduced it. I stand by it now. I wish to God he did. But I suggest that this is an answer to the argument of the Senator from Maryland, that this ebullition of feeling and this strong denunciation in these resolutions grow out of the fact that the honorable Senator from Kentucky has been shocked by the exercise of arbitrary power on the part of the Government. Sir, from the time the honorable Senator came into this Senate, he has introduced more bills and more resolutions containing propositions for the exercise of power in all these directions, confiscation, emancipation, and the reduction of States, sovereign, independent States, if you please, to Territories, than any other member of the Senate; and it is altogether too late now to talk about him being shocked at the policy of the Government; and it is altogether too late to recite such a fact in defense and as an apology for such an exhibition as is made in these resolutions.

Mr. President, I say that this is a question of privilege, and the question is whether the Senator from Kentucky is privileged, according to the principles of parliamentary law, according to the course of proceedings in this Senate, to offer to the Senate of the United States, and to procure the printing and the entry upon its Journals of such resolutions as these. I suppose the provision of the Constitution which confers the immunity, if it be conferred at all, is that provision which declares that no member of either House of Congress shall be held responsible elsewhere for words uttered in debate. The first proposition which naturally rises upon the consideration of a question of this kind is, are these resolutions to be regarded as words spoken in debate? Surely, sir, there was no question before the Senate when the resolutions were offered which they were calculated to elucidate. It would not be pretended that there was any occasion outside of the resolutions for the introduction of the resolutions. They bore upon no question before the Senate when the resolutions were introduced, and they were not calculated to bear upon any question which the Senator himself then, or at any time after, introduced. If there was no question before the Senate, then there could be no debate before the Senate.

But I do not put myself in the attitude of saying that it is not the privilege of a Senator to introduce resolutions. I understand it to be so; that he may introduce resolutions. That is one of the methods by which the legislation of the country is conducted, and therefore it is legitimate and proper at all suitable times for Senators to introduce resolutions, but they must be resolutions; they must be legislative resolutions, if I may be allowed the expression; they must pertain to legislation; they must raise a question either by asserting a principle or by proposing a question. If these resolutions are examined, they will be found to do neither. They neither declare principles of any kind, nor do they propose a question for the consideration of the Senate. Therefore my first proposition is that they were not in order, and that it was not the privilege of the Senator to introduce them at all. He does not bring himself within his privilege, because the resolutions are not of a legislative character. They neither declare principles, nor do they state a proposition for the action of the Senate.

But, sir, I desire to be a little more specific on this question of privilege of a Senator. Surely it will not be pretended that it is the right of a Senator, under the constitutional immunity that he is not to be held responsible for words spoken in debate, to say in the Senate whatever he chooses on any subject? That would be license. That would not be constitutional privilege. That would not be in any sense what is understood to be parliamentary privilege. That would be license. That might be indecorum. It might be indignity; it might be an insult to the body, and very likely it would be. What is understood by privilege, as I understand in a parliamentary sense, is that the Senator is privileged to speak in debate and not to be held responsible for it elsewhere, to proceed according to the principles of parliamentary law. He is to observe due decorum in his propositions, in his language, and in his debate.

I have one or two authorities before me to which, with the permission of the Chair, I should like to refer as to the limitations of this privilege of debate. I read from an English work, May's Parliamentary Practice, page 111, upon this subject, the privilege of debate:

"Liberty of speech is granted you, but you must know what privilege you have; not to speak every one what he listeth, or what cometh in his brain to utter; but your privilege is 'aye' or 'no.'"

Further:

"But, although by the ancient custom of Parliament, as well as by the law, a member may not be questioned out of Parliament, he is liable to censure and punishment by the House itself of which he is a member. The cases in which members have been called to account and punished for offensive words spoken before the House are too numerous to mention. Some have been admonished; others imprisoned, and in the Commons some have even been expelled."

Again:

"Taking care not to say anything disrespectful to the House, a member may state whatever he thinks fit in debate, however offensive it may be to the feelings or injuries to the character of individuals, and he is protected by his privilege from any action for libel as well as from any other question or molestation."

Within these limitations, I do not question, nobody questions, that the member is privileged to say what he pleases, and to discuss with what freedom he chooses any question which is legitimately before the body. I have another work, an American work on parliamentary law, to which I will also refer. I read from Cushing's Law and Practice of Legislative Assemblies, page 259:

"Misconduct of members toward one another consists of insulting remarks in debate, personal assaults, threats, challenges, &c., in reference to which, besides the ordinary remedies at law or otherwise, the assembly interferes to protect the member who is injured, insulted, or threatened. Offenses by members toward other persons, of which the assembly has cognizance, consist only of injurious and slanderous assertions, either in speech or by writing, which, as there is no other remedy, the assembly itself, if it thinks proper, takes cognizance of and punishes."

It is to this doctrine that I desire to call the especial attention of the Senate, for the question here relates, not to language spoken of members of the Senate particularly, but applicable to persons outside of the Senate—strangers, the President of the United States and those in authority; and the doctrine maintained in the text is that it is an offense for a member of Parliament or a members of the House of Representatives or of the Senate in his place to utter words or publish by way of resolution anything of an injurious and slanderous character, either in speech or by writing, which, as there is no other remedy, the assembly will take cognizance of itself.

Now, Mr. President, the question naturally arises, is there anything in these resolutions of the character to which I have referred? Do these resolutions, in other words, contain injurious and slanderous assaults against parties outside of the Senate, either the President of the United States or other parties? If any one has the curiosity to examine these resolutions, he will find that the first twelve of them are simply descriptive. They are descriptive of the powers of the Government. When you come to the thirteenth resolution, you find the following language:

"13. Resolved, That at the beginning of the war, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power professed to carry it on for the Constitution, and to put down the rebellion and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease. But more than a year ago another and a paramount and unconstitutional one, the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them; and at length, to carry on the war in this augmented and perverted form, the annual expenditure, on the part of the United States, has swollen to one hundred thousand lives, a much larger amount of personal disability, and a thousand millions of money, and yet the wisest cannot see the end of the war. Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilers in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter."

Then in the fourteenth resolution the Senator proceeds:

"That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted, for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and of the United States, the civil courts, and trial by jury."

Now, the question I desire to propound to the Senate is this: is that true? Will it be pretended that it has the semblance of truth? As a historical fact, I suppose nobody will pretend that it is true. If it be not true, is it the privilege of the Senator from Kentucky to rise in his place in the Senate, under permission of the Chair, to introduce a resolution which is supposed to be a resolution with reference to legislative proceedings, to put upon the records of the Senate and send out to the country that which is known to this body and to the country to be false and scandalous, and which if it was uttered upon the streets, uttered by any person who would not shield himself by his privilege, would be held to be libelous, and he might be punished accordingly? Does it not become the duty of the Senate, as it respects its dignity, and as it desires the respect of the country, to say that it is not a privilege which a Senator shall feel himself at liberty to exercise, to assail the reputation and character of persons who are strangers to this body, and who can have no remedy against such assaults? Further on the resolution proceeds:

"It has ordered ad libitum arbitrary arrests by military officers, not only without warrant, but without any charge or imputation of crime or offense, and has hurried the persons so arrested from home and vicinage to distant prisons, and kept them incarcerated there for an indefinite time; some of whom it discharged without trial and in utter ignorance of the cause of their arrest and imprisonment, and others if caused to be brought before courts created by itself, and to be tried and punished without law; in violation of the constitutional guarantee to the citizen of his right to keep and bear arms and of his rights of property, it has forcibly deprived as well the loyal as the disloyal of both; it has usurped the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and to proclaim martial law, and establish military tribunals in States and parts of States where there was no obstruction to the due administration of the laws of the United States and the States by the civil courts and authorities; and ordered many citizens, who were not connected with the Army or Navy, to be dragged before its drum-head courts and to be tried by them for new and strange offenses, declared by itself, and by undefined and indefinable law, being but the arbitrary will of the court."

Either that declaration is true or it is false. If it is true, it is the gravest offense that any set of men in this country or elsewhere were ever guilty of. If it is false, is it the privilege of a Senator to stand on this floor, and invoking his privilege and sheltering himself behind his privilege, to utter so grave an accusation against those who are outside of the Senate and who have no protection against it? Is it not the duty of the Senate as it regards its own dignity, and as it would claim the respect and confidence of the American people, to say that such is not the privilege of a Senator of the United States?

And so, Mr. President, to the end of these resolutions, being eighteen in all, the remark I make is that they abound with historical statements which are incorrect, recitals of events which are imaginary, fictitious, or wholly false; and the appeal which I make to the Senate is, and the proposition which I submit to the Senate is, whether in any fair sense that can be said to be the privilege of an American Senator.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in all the stages of the history of the Senate, they have been exceedingly careful and jealous of the freedom of debate. While the House of Representatives have had various rules and various expedients by which debate may be limited and restrained, the Senate without exception from first to last have resisted the whole of them. We have had attempts to introduce the previous question, to introduce a rule by which at a certain time and under certain limitations debate might be terminated, but the Senate of the United States, with singular consistency from first to last, have said that the discretion of every member in this matter should be his rule, and his only rule. I confess that there have been times in my experience in the business of this body when I have wished and thought that it should be otherwise; but such has not been the temper of the Senate; and while other bodies, and even the House of Representatives, have seen fit at times, and at the present time, to limit, and to limit very considerably, the freedom of debate, it has been attempted here, when it has been attempted, in vain. And the Senate have said that on any question any member may talk when he pleases, how he pleases, and as long as he pleases; and such has been the temper of the Senate and is at the present day.

And, Mr. President, I am not sure, notwithstanding all the inconvenience that sometimes may have been experienced, that the Senate have not been wise in this peculiarity of theirs; that in this tribunal, in this high court of the nation, where such interests are at stake as are here discussed by the representatives of sovereign States, the discretion and the judgment of those whom the States send here to represent them should not be the limit and the sole limit regulating the mode and manner and the length to which the right of free discussion shall be carried. Sir, I look upon this attempt, in the present instance, as an indirect attempt to do that which the Senate have directly refused to do.

I need not say here that I have no sympathy with the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky; nor do I think that the question whether we have or have not any sympathy with the resolutions of that Senator has anything at all to do with the question that is now before the Senate. The question I understand now to be the amendment proposed by the honorable Senator from Michigan [Mr. HOWARD] to the resolution proposed by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON.] I think, with all deference to gentlemen around me, that the amendment of the Senator from Michigan would be more mischievous in its character, more mischievous in the results which it would work out, than the original proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts; and for this reason: it requires a two-thirds majority of the Senate to expel a member. I believe in the history of the legislation of this country there never has been a case where a vote of censure has been passed upon any member of either House, where the member has not felt compelled, by the moral weight of that vote, to resign his place in the body which censured him. I believe that is without exception. Of course, I have not examined the Journal for the purpose of ascertaining that fact, though I do remember some instances where it has been done. If, then, a majority of the Senate may censure a man for the expression of his opinions, and thus indirectly work his expulsion, it seems to me that it would be the most fatal stab at that freedom of debate which is necessary for a wholesome exercise of the functions of a Senator that could possibly be given. Sir, let me tell you where it would go. Once establish the precedent that for the utterance of any sentiments, I care not how obnoxious they may be, a majority of the Senate may censure a member, and what will be the result? It may be a flagrant case to-day; it may be a case flagrant as has been represented by any of those who have commented upon the Senator from Kentucky; in a little while (the ferocity of party spirit will not have been tamed in the meanwhile) somebody else may utter sentiments not quite so exceptionable, not quite so glaring, but still offensive to a majority, and the result will be that in a short time your boasted freedom of debate will amount simply to this: that no man on this floor will dare utter sentiments obnoxious to a majority of the body without entertaining the fear that for the utterance of those sentiments he may be expelled from the body. That will be the inevitable history of it.

Now, Mr. President, for myself I confess that I feel peculiarly sensitive on this subject. I came into this body some sixteen years ago or more, without the sympathy of a single member on this floor; and I hardly ever met a responsive glance from the galleries. I stood here with nobody in the Senate or out of the Senate to sympathize with me; and if this doctrine had prevailed that for the utterance of sentiments obnoxious to the majority of the body a man might be censured, I should have been censured the first month that I was upon this floor. Sir, I have denounced the action of this Government, of the Senate, and of the House of Representatives, and of the President, as being such as was eminently calculated to provoke the scorn of earth and the judgment of Heaven. I have said that, and I have said a great deal more than that, and under like circumstances I would say it again. But, sir, I will do the credit to the party that then ruled the Senate to say that the idea that for the utterance of those sentiments I was subjecting myself to expulsion or to censure never entered into my head or my heart.

In a few years there were others who came here who occupied the same position that I did. We were under the ban and the opprobrium and the reproach of both the political parties that were contending for the majority here and in the country. My honorable friend from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] came. Who more obnoxious than he? Nobody, unless it might have been myself; and that not because I was a worse, but an older sinner than he was. Notwithstanding that, we were joined soon after by one or two others; the honorable Secretary of the Treasury first, and then the honorable Secretary of State, who came on this floor "almost persuaded to be a Christian," [laughter.] because he was ready to go with us in every measure of opposition to the slave power and to its encroachments, when it did not conflict with the policy of the Whig party. [Renewed laughter.] I had no such qualification, and my honorable friend from Massachusetts had none such. We stood up alone here, and we battled as we might for that freedom of debate which is the birthright of an American Senator, and which the great orator of New England, on a memorable case during the last war with England, when he thought he saw in the then dominant party a disposition to check the freedom of debate, said was a home-bred right and a fire-side privilege; living he would defend it; and by the blessing of God, if he could leave no other inheritance to his children, he would leave them the inheritance of free principles, and of a manly, independent, and constitutional defense of them.

For the mode and the manner in which a man may advocate and defend the principles which he believes it to be his duty to advocate and defend, he should be responsible to no power but the Power that gives him the faculty of speech. When I say that, I do not mean that he may wantonly trespass upon the rules of the Senate; I do not believe that he may wantonly insult the feelings of any one; but I will say this—I do not know who said it before me; probably those that are better read than I am know who—you must forgive something to the spirit of liberty. You must not be too censorious, too much inclined to find fault, too much inclined to visit your censures and your denunciations upon those who differ from you.

Senators, I know what the value of this right is. I have felt in my own bitter and my personal experience on this floor something of the value of that privilege which a man exercises when he stands up to utter obnoxious sentiments and looks around in vain for a sympathizing countenance, and has no hope or confidence that any but God and his own conscience will sustain him. Knowing that, sir, I confess, for one, while I sympathize with the patriotic and fervent impulses of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts that prompted him to offer the resolution; and while I could but admire the eloquent, able, and searching analysis which the honorable Senator from Michigan gave to these resolutions when he invoked the judgment of the Senate for the censure which he proposes; and while I yield my earnest admiration to the fervid eloquence of the honorable Senator from Maine, yet after all I confess that they fail to convince my judgment that this Senate has any right—ay, sir, I use the word "right"—to utter an expression of censure upon the Senator from Kentucky for what he has done.

As I said at the beginning, the question whether we agree with him, whether in our judgment his resolutions are true or false, whether they tend to sedition, or what not, is not for us to say. It was a declaration of the great apostle of American Democracy that error might be safely tolerated while truth was left free to combat it; and, sir, in my humble judgment, the truth, and the simple truth, wielded by the able men who sit around me, is the appropriate and legitimate and the senatorial manner and the senatorial weapon with which the errors of the Senator from Kentucky, if errors he has committed, are to be met.

Mr. President, I have said thus much, and I do not mean to say more, because I have felt from the beginning of my entrance on this floor that the freedom of debate in the Senate should be maintained at all hazards and under all circumstances; and no matter if, with the fastidiousness of a lawyer, we may point out everything that has been pointed out in the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, I ask you at last, what are you going to censure him for? Not because he has uttered sentiments that tend to revolution and that tend to sedition, but because in your judgment he has done it. In his own judgment he has not done it. Now, sir, it is the first time I ever heard that anybody in a public assembly having made statements upon which a construction was put, was not at liberty to disclaim the attempt to put a meaning upon his words which he disavowed. We had an instance of it but two days ago. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] in some remarks which he made was supposed to reflect upon the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. FORT.] and some remarks were made which he considered severe and unjust. But the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, with the frankness which belongs to him, immediately rose and distinctly disavowed the offensive interpretation which was attempted to be put upon his remarks, and it was received by the Senator from Vermont, and, I believe, by the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. DOOLITTLE,] who commented upon them, and by everybody, as the undoubted right which belonged to the Senator from Massachusetts to disavow the construction that was attempted to be put upon his language. There is where the Senator from Kentucky stands; but I am free to confess, and I make no secret of it, that whether he disavowed the intention or not, he should have no vote of censure of mine; I would let the error that he pronounced go free, and run over the land, and make all that it could make, if truth could not overtake it.

Mr. President, I have gone further than I have already stated. In 1850, when the Congress of the United States passed an act commonly called the fugitive slave law, I denounced it in as strong language as I knew how to use. I put it in contrast with what I believed was the higher law of God, and I counseled and advised and encouraged everybody whom I addressed that when the Congress of the United States, with all the solemnities of legislation, passed an act which was at war with their convictions of what the higher law of God taught, even if it had the sanction of the Supreme Court of the United States, to disregard them both, to trample Congress and the court under foot, to see to it that they maintained their own integrity, their own self-respect, and their own manhood.

I think, sir, it would be the most dangerous precedent that is to be found in the legislative history of our country, if the Senate of the United States, for words spoken or written, however obnoxious they may be, should exercise this high prerogative of expelling or censuring the man who uttered or wrote them. It would be a confession of weakness before the country and the world that we should not make. Evil-disposed men would seize upon it, and they would say: "There was that Senator from Kentucky; he introduced resolutions which you could not answer; he introduced resolutions arraigning you and your President, and there was not a man of you that could answer them, and so you held your peace and voted him out of the Senate." I would not give the enemies of our country and of our cause such a triumph as that, but I would meet the propositions of the Senator from Kentucky as I would meet every other, and if I could not show that they were erroneous I would submit that he might make all he could by them.

Mr. POWELL. I shall ask the indulgence of the Senate for a very short time. I am very much indisposed this morning, and shall not undertake to detain the Senate long.

Mr. President, I have regarded free speech as of the very essence of republican liberty; and it strikes me that the proceeding which has been instituted against my colleague is calculated, if not intended, to strike down free speech. I have been very much gratified at the general tone and tenor of the remarks of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. HALE.] I do not think, I never have thought, and I never will think that any member of this body subjects himself either to expulsion or to censure because he opposes measures or advocates policies that are different from those of the majority. And when this thing is sifted to the bottom, there is no reason why my colleague should receive at the hands of this body either expulsion or censure for the resolutions that he has introduced, unless it be held by the majority that it is reasonable, right, and proper to expel or censure every one who dares to maintain principles and enunciate facts that are unpalatable to the majority of the Senate.

Now, sir, no possible evil can result to the Republic if the positions of my colleague are wrong while the principle announced by the great apostle of civil and constitutional liberty finds an abiding place here.

Mr. Jefferson declared that we had nothing to fear from error while truth was left free to combat it. Sir, if the resolutions proposed by my colleague are wrong in principle, if they are erroneous in fact, why cannot the learned Senators on the other side meet them and show by stern logic the fallacy of the principles asserted, and by an array of facts any want of truth in the statements made? That is the only legitimate and the only proper mode to meet such resolutions as these by the party that oppose them. They cannot be fairly and legitimately met in any other way. Inaugurate this principle of expelling a member from this Senate because he announces principles that are unpalatable to the majority, or even visit upon him censure because he does not think concurrently with the majority, and what will be the result? It will be that only the boldest and most fearless of those in the minority will give free expression to the opinions they entertain. The timid would always shrink from such a discharge of their public duties for fear of expulsion or censure from the dominant party. Inaugurate that, and you have stricken down free speech, which I have before said is of the very essence of republican liberty. There can be no free Government unless you have freedom of speech. You must not only have freedom of speech, but you must have a free press, and you must have free suffrage. Without them the liberties of the people will be inevitably overthrown and destroyed.

Mr. President, I have listened very attentively to the arguments of the various Senators pro and con. upon this subject, and I must confess that the arguments of the Senators who are in favor of the resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WILSON] have not convinced me that they were right or that I was wrong in thinking that his resolution should not be adopted. The Senator from Maine, who addressed the Senate this morning, declared that the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky are very comprehensive and sweeping against the Administration, and exhibit manifest hostility to the Government. So far as the first remark of the Senator is concerned, that they are comprehensive and sweeping against the Administration, I admit that that part of his statement is true; but that these resolutions exhibit any hostility to the Government, I utterly deny. That the resolutions are a sharp arraignment of the Administration, and set forth great political principles which my colleague believes to be correct, principles that underlie the foundations of this Government, and which principles have been overthrown or violated by the action of the President, is true. That the arraignment of the Administration for what my colleague conceives to be maladministration is extensive, comprehensive, sharp, and pointed, there can be no denial. But is there any evidence in the resolutions that the author of them is opposed to his Government? No, sir, no. The resolutions indicate a warm, ardent, vehement love of country, and for the constitutional rights of the people. My colleague evidently believes, and honestly believes, that the actings and doings of the Administration during this unfortunate civil war have been such as to endanger the constitutional liberties of the people, to strike down their dearest rights, and in consequence of that he arraigns the Administration, and points out in these resolutions the reasons for his alarm. It is his love of country that causes him to do it. That Senator who believes there has been maladministration of the Government in any or all its departments, and who sits quietly by and fears to sound the alarm, and to point our masters, the people, to the great dangers by which they are environed, and to tell them fearlessly that their liberties, their rights, and their privileges secured by the Constitution are about to be overthrown, is an unworthy and degraded public servant; he who has not the courage and the manhood to do that, I can only say, in my humble judgment, is an unworthy representative of a free people. He is, or at least deserves to be, the subject or the vassal of some absolute prince or potentate. He is utterly unfit to represent a brave, honest, and free people.

Those who believe that the actings and doings of this Administration have been such as to sap the foundation of the Government, to overthrow the Constitution, and destroy the liberties of the people, owe it to themselves, owe it to their country, boldly, fearlessly so to proclaim. They should not do it offensively, but thoroughly and fearlessly, and they should sustain and maintain it in bold and manly argument. If the friends of the Administration think that the principles announced in the resolutions or the statements of fact therein contained are erroneous, it is their duty in the same spirit of manly discussion to meet them and overthrow them if they can. If they cannot they should hold their peace and cooperate with those who desire to turn the Administration out of power. That is their patriotic duty.

Now, Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate I will review very briefly some of the resolutions of my colleague that have caused him to be visited with very harsh censures by the Senator from Michigan who addressed the Senate yesterday, and the Senator from Maine who has addressed the body this morning. With great deference to those two honorable Senators, I differ from them, not only as to the interpretation they give to the resolutions and the deductions they draw from them, but in many respects as to the matters of fact contained in them.

A portion of the thirteenth resolution of my colleague is embodied in the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and is set forth as the sole cause why my colleague should be expelled. If the debate were to be confined to what I should conceive to be its legitimate limits, all the Senate would have a right to do would be to look to that particular resolution, and not to the whole series except for one special purpose, and that would be to see whether there was anything in any other of the resolutions calculated to explain the meaning of the objectionable part of the thirteenth resolution.

I hold it to be a proper rule of construction in construing the Constitution, a statute, or any instrument of writing, to do what you can to make every portion of it harmonious; and if it is liable to two constructions, one of which harmonizes the principles set forth or the facts enunciated in the whole series, that is the proper and legitimate construction to be given to the instrument, and you should so construe it as to cause harmony throughout the whole instrument if possible. With that view I will read this resolution, and then I will point to another resolution that in my judgment is the key to the meaning of my colleague in all this body of resolutions so far as the remedies are concerned.

The thirteenth resolution is as follows:

"13. Resolved, That at the beginning of the war, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power professed to carry it on for the Constitution, and to put down the rebellion, and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease. But more than a year ago another and a paramount and unconstitutional one; the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them; and at length, to carry on the war in this augmented and perverted form, the annual expenditure on the part of the United States has swollen to one hundred thousand lives, a much larger amount of personal disability, and a thousand millions of money, and yet the wisest cannot see the end of the war: verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilers in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter, and to restore their Union and common Government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates."

So far as the first part of that resolution is concerned, I do not find that any gentleman of the opposition has taken issue. It is not denied that the purpose of the war, as proclaimed in the Crittenden resolution, as it is commonly called, passed by both Houses soon after the battle of Bull Run, has been departed from. But the gravamen of the charge contained in the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, is that my colleague in this resolution asks the people to revolt against their war leaders, North and South, to take the matter into their own hands, and through the instrumentality of a national convention to heal all our difficulties, and to restore the Union as Washington gave it to us. That, we are told, is an invitation to the people of the North to go into some kind of a revolutionary proceeding for the purpose of overthrowing the Administration in power. I do not think that the resolution can be legitimately construed in that way. To be sure, he uses the word "revolt," and asks the people to revolt against their war leaders; but we all know that there are various meanings of that word. In this sense I believe it is "to turn away from," and that is the primary meaning of the word. He invites not only the people of the North but the people of the South to turn from their war leaders, and through the instrumentality of a national convention to settle all their difficulties. How does the resolution indicate that they shall be settled? By a severance of the States? No, sir; but by restoring the Union, the Union as it was given to us by our patriot fathers.

Can there be anything in that resolution indicating that my colleague desired forcible or armed resistance to those in power by the people of the North? Certainly not. A convention of the people of the States is not only constitutional, but it is legitimate. It is one of the modes pointed out in the Constitution by which you may amend that instrument. Free speech and free press are guaranteed in one of the Amendments of the Constitution, and the right of the people to assemble and petition for a redress of grievances is also a right guaranteed. Senators, in my opinion; have put a forced construction upon this resolution. So far from indicating an appeal to arms, my colleague proposes to arrest the present Administration in a policy that he thinks will overthrow the Government, destroy its Constitution and the liberties of the people, by the most peaceful of all remedies, by a convention of the people of all the States.

But, Mr. President, there is another resolution that I think will tend much to explain the meaning of the one which I last read, and of the others, and that is the fifteenth resolution, which is in these words:

"15. Resolved, That a free press, free speech, and free elections are the great and peaceful forces by which the maladministration of our Government, whether in the legislative or executive departments, is prevented, reformed, and reversed, and its authors brought to public condemnation and punishment; and these bulwarks of constitutional government and popular liberty are formidable to malversators, usurpers, and tyrants only, and they must be held by the people at all hazards."

There is a distinct resolution pointing out the means and the remedies that a free people have to turn out of office those who are guilty of maladministration. That is the mode in which he wishes to do it. It is by free speech, free press, and free elections. Does he say in any part of the resolution that he is for effecting the changes which he certainly desires by force of arms? No, sir, no. He points out in a distinct resolution the agencies that he invokes to bring about this to him, and I confess to myself, most desirable revolution. I believe that the fifteenth resolution, as I have before said, is the key that unlocks the meaning as to the agencies invoked by my colleague in these resolutions, and it is certainly legitimate that he should invoke the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage to turn any Administration out of power that he thought was pursuing a line of policy that would result, if carried out, in the destruction and overthrow of the constitutional and civil rights of the people, and inaugurate upon the ruins of this once free Republic a military despotism. My colleague has given his construction of the resolutions he introduced. At the time the resolution for expulsion was introduced my colleague promptly denied the construction of the resolutions given by the Senator from Massachusetts, and distinctly stated that there was nothing in the resolutions, when properly interpreted, that could be construed into an exhortation to the people to make forcible and unlawful resistance to those in power. Free speech, free press, and free suffrage are the agencies he invoked to redress our grievances. None who know my colleague, however much they may differ from him politically, will doubt his truth, candor, integrity, or patriotism. The same construction given in the speech to which I have referred, my colleague has again given in a letter he addressed to the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, which has been read to the Senate. His construction should be received and taken as correct interpretations.

Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Michigan, who so ably addressed the Senate yesterday, said that the thirteenth resolution exhibits very great charity for the rebels, and he objects to it on that account. I thought that honorable gentleman was so imbued with Christianity and amiability that he would not object to charity being extended even to a rebel against the majesty of the Most High, much less to one against a Government. God knows that if anybody requires charity to be extended to him on this earth, it is a man who rebels against a good and lawful Government, and one who rebels against Heaven's law. But if that resolution is looked into closely, I do not think it exhibits any charity to rebels. It is, on the contrary, the very thing that the leading rebels do not want. I will quote part of it again:

"The people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands."

Do you suppose that the leaders of this rebellion South would be obliged to my colleague if the people there were to follow the advice he gives them in that resolution, turn away from their war leaders, and say, "Gentlemen, we are tired of this bloody war; we are determined to call our people into convention; we are determined to indicate a desire to go into grand council with the people of all the States of the old Union, and see if we cannot harmonize and settle these difficulties, and let all the States come back into the Union, and live under the Constitution as they did before the war." That is all that my colleague asks the people of the Confederate States to do; and yet the Senator from Michigan, notwithstanding his pious and amiable temperament, thinks my colleague is exhibiting too much charity to them. It does strike me that it is the very thing the rebel leaders do not want. The leaders of the rebellion do not want the people of their various States to desert their standards, to call for a national convention to restore the Union. No, sir, it is the last thing they want. My colleague, though, desires the people of the South to do that. He desires the people of all sections of the country to meet in national convention, and see if they cannot cause this cruel war to cease, not for the purpose of a severance of the Union, but for the purpose of a restoration of the Union.

The Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Maine object to the fourteenth resolution, and denounce it as revolutionary; and they defy any Senator to point to a single case where the freedom of the press has been interrupted by this Administration. They seem to regard that whole resolution as a tissue of misrepresentation. Indeed, the Senator from Maine denounced the statements contained in it very broadly as false. Now, I will read that resolution. It is not my purpose to enter into an elaborate argument to sustain it, for that would not be proper at this time; but I will make a very brief comment upon it. The resolution is:

"14. Resolved, That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and of the United States, the civil courts and trial by jury; it has ordered ad libitum arbitrary arrests by military officers, not only without warrant, but without any charge or imputation of crime or offense; and has hurried the persons so arrested from home and village to distant prisons, and kept them incarcerated there for an indefinite time, some of whom it discharged without trial and in utter ignorance of the cause of their arrest and imprisonment, and others it caused to be brought before courts, created by itself, and to be tried and punished without law; in violation of the constitutional guarantee to the citizen of his right to keep and bear arms, and of his rights of property, it has forcibly deprived as well the loyal as the disloyal of both; it has usurped the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus and to proclaim martial law and establish military tribunals in States and parts of States where there was no obstruction to the due administration of the laws of the United States and the States by the civil courts and authorities, and ordered many citizens, who were not connected with the Army or Navy, to be dragged before its drum-head courts, and to be tried by them for new and strange offenses, declared by itself and by undefined and indefinite law, being but the arbitrary will of the court; it has ordained at pleasure a military despotism in the loyal States by means of courts-martial, provost marshals, and military forces, governed neither by law, principles, nor rules, from whose tyranny and oppressions no man can claim immunity; all of which must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people."

The honorable Senators challenge instances where any of these things have been done. As I before said, it is not proper on this occasion to enter into any elaborate argument on that resolution; but the Senator from Michigan seemed to arraign my colleague rather sharply because he was in favor of abolishing courts-martial, as he said that they were to be swept away by the people. As I construe this resolution, my colleague does not desire courts-martial to be swept away; but as I am on that point, allow me to say that there is no reason why this Congress could not sweep away courts-martial if they wished so to do. There is no clause in the Constitution forbidding it. The Constitution simply confers on Congress the power to raise armies and to provide navies, and to establish rules and regulations for the government of the land and naval forces. In obedience to that provision, we have made our articles of war and ordained courts-martial. The reason why my colleague arraigns the actions of courts-martial is not that he objects to the existence of courts-martial when applied to those persons who are in the military or naval service of the United States, but he especially points out in the resolution that persons in civil life, who are not properly cognizable before courts-martial, have been tried, condemned, and sentenced by them. We have a right, if we choose to do it, by enacting a law of Congress to-day, to sweep all courts-martial out of existence and punish every man in the Army and Navy by the civil tribunals. There can be no doubt of that. Of course, I suppose, there is not a Senator here who thinks it would be wise policy to do it; but that we have the power under the Constitution there can be no doubt. But there is one thing which we cannot do, which the President cannot do, which Congress cannot do, which this Government, by the exercise of any or all of its powers, cannot do; that is, we cannot deprive a citizen, one that is not in the military or the naval service of the Government, of a trial by jury in the civil courts of the country, for the Constitution forbids that they should be tried except in the civil courts; and it is against an abuse of power, trying civilians by courts-martial, that my colleague complains in that resolution, as I understand it.

But, sir, has not that thing been done? The learned Senators who have addressed you denounce the allegation in the resolution as wholly untrue, and they ask instances to be pointed to. I was somewhat astonished that two such intelligent gentlemen should ask for instances in which the things charged in this resolution had been done. I would ask if citizens wholly unconnected with the Army and Navy of the United States in hundreds and thousands of instances have not been arrested by the arbitrary dictum of the Secretary of State and of the Secretary of War, and dragged to distant prisons and there languished for long months and turned out without trial? That is a fact well known to the whole country, as well as to the Senate. Look at the cases in Maryland; look at many others from my own State; look at them throughout the length and breadth of this land.

I will not elaborate that matter, but I was astonished at the broad denials of gentlemen of the facts set forth in this resolution. Have persons not been arrested that were in civil life, and taken and tried before courts-martial, and punishments decreed which were unknown to the Constitution and laws of the land? I need but refer to one instance; and that is the case of that gallant, that true, that noble-hearted defender of civil liberty, Mr. Vallandigham, who was thus decreed to banishment by a drum-head court-martial in the State of Ohio. Was Mr. Vallandigham in the military or naval service? No, sir; and free speech in his case was cloven down by these usurpers. Nobody claimed that Mr. Vallandigham was engaged in either the naval or military service; nobody claimed that he could be rightfully tried before a court-martial. If he had offended, the proper tribunal was the civil courts. I ask honorable gentlemen to show me the law that authorizes the President of the United States to decree that a citizen of this once free and great Republic should be consigned to banishment. I know of no such law. There is certainly nothing in the Constitution of your country that clothes any of your magistracy with any such power. And, sir, they banished that noble and patriot citizen much more ruthlessly than many patriot citizens were banished from Greece in the olden time. They did not even allow the people to write upon a shell their decree of banishment.

Yet gentlemen say free speech and free press have in no instance been violated! Why, sir, look at the hundreds of newspapers throughout the country that have been stopped by this Administration. Some, that were allowed to be issued in New York, were forbidden to go through the mails, and hundreds of them have been suppressed. That is well known to the whole country. But the honorable Senator from Michigan says that these were all traitorous papers. I would ask that worthy Senator in all candor to answer me this question: if they were traitors, ought not a wise and honest Government, instead of stopping their business and suppressing their newspapers, to have caused them to be arrested, to be indicted, to be tried, and convicted and executed as traitors? Certainly it ought. That is the only mode provided by the laws of the country by which you can find out whether a man is a traitor or not. It is by giving him a full and free investigation in the courts, and allowing him counsel and to be confronted with the witnesses against him face to face.

Sir, that very thing has been done without ever arraigning those men for treason. The papers have been stopped in many cases and the editors never arrested. The Senator says the papers were stopped because they were treasonable. Who judges of the treason? It is the commander of your post, your provost marshal. What right has he to judge? No such right is given to him by the laws of your country. If the editors of these papers committed treason, the Government stands a culprit before the civilized world and ought to be arraigned as such, because it has allowed traitors to go free without ever arraigning them or trying them and attempting to punish them for their guilt. Gentlemen attempt to escape the argument by the bold proclamation that all these men were editing traitorous papers. Sir, in a free Government there is a mode of ascertaining whether a man is guilty or innocent. That mode we inherited from our ancestors across the water. It is upon a full, fair, impartial trial in the courts of the country, and there is no other way. The laws presume every man innocent until his guilt is made manifest by proof in the courts. But here the rule is reversed. Some colonel, some provost marshal, some pestiferous spy, perhaps, will say that a gentleman is editing a newspaper that is treasonable, and without any investigation they presume him guilty and imprison the person sometimes, and sometimes stop the circulation of the paper. Sir, there can be but one way in a country that is governed by law to ascertain guilt or innocence, and that is the way pointed out by the law, upon full and fair trial.

After what has occurred in Maryland, Kentucky, Missouri, and Delaware, how can Senators claim that free suffrage has been allowed? If Senators will take the trouble to look into the proof which has been laid on our tables, taken in the contested elections in some of those States, now under consideration in the other end of the Capitol, they will find abundant and conclusive evidence that fraud and military force were used to carry elections in those States.

I will not at present discuss this question. On some proper occasion I will discuss this subject at length, and establish by incontrovertible testimony that elections in the States to which I have alluded were carried by military force, terrorism, and fraud.

Honorable Senators object to the sixteenth resolution as revolutionary. The Senator from Michigan said that resolution was revolutionary, and hence he opposed it. Let us read that resolution, and see what it is:

"16. Resolved, That as the Constitution and laws afford no means to exclude from the office of President a man appointed to it by military power, or who is declared to be chosen to it by reason of the suppression of the freedom of election, as by the exclusion of legal voters from the polls, or by any other means, the people of the United States would be incompetent to defend and unworthy to have received the rich heritage of freedom bequeathed to them by their fathers, if they permit that great office to be filled, or in any other mode than by their own free suffrages."

I was amazed when my learned friend from Michigan pronounced that resolution revolutionary. The Senator has fallen into a sad mistake. He has mistaken the resolution for the things that are denounced in it. The things that my colleague denounces are revolutionary, but the resolution itself is not. It is a sharp and bold declaration that we are not worthy of the freedom we inherited from our noble sires if we submit to the usurpations which are mentioned in the resolution. The declaration is that a man who is appointed to the Presidency by the military power, a man who obtains that high position by the overthrow of free suffrage, should not be allowed to hold the position; but my colleague says the President should be elected by the free suffrage of the people. That is the pith, the point of the resolution. I ask honorable Senators on the other side of this Chamber, and on this side, if there is one of them who would rise in his place in the Senate of the United States and say that he would be willing or would submit for a single moment to see a man appointed by the military power assume the presidential office in this Republic. I verily believe there is not a Senator on either side of the Chamber who would dare get up here and announce such a proposition, that he was for the Army appointing the President. It is against that that my colleague points in this resolution.

Sir, in times past in other countries empires have been sold at auction. In the degenerate days of the Roman empire, we know that the pretorians put up that empire to auction and sold it to the highest bidder. It was transferred at will by the army; and I would ask Senators what semblance of freedom existed in degenerate Rome at that day. None. On one occasion that empire was put up at auction and sold on credit. Didius Julian, the successful bidder, was not prepared to make good all his promises, and they took it away from him. As the boys in the country say, they rued the bargain. I am confident that Senators on the other side of the Chamber are not in favor of having the President of this great Government appointed by military authority, or in any other way than by free ballot. The resolution merely says that that is what should be done, and that free men should resist the appointment in any other way. I am free to admit here and elsewhere that I for one would resist to the death the overthrow of the Constitution of my country so much as to allow the Army to appoint a President or to elect one by deterring the free voters from the polls by force of arms, and in that position I am confident no Senator in this Chamber will take issue with me.

Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan spoke at some length upon the proclamation of amnesty of the President of the United States. I had designed to make some remarks in reply to that Senator on that part of his argument, but the condition of my health will not allow me to do so. I will, however, state my objections in a very few words. My colleague in one of the resolutions of this series takes issue upon that proclamation, declares it to be unwise, unconstitutional, and unjust. In that I concur. I regard that proclamation of amnesty as highly revolutionary in its character. I regard it as unconstitutional, because I can find no warrant in the Constitution that authorizes the President of the United States to say who shall be a voter in a State, and who shall not. In that proclamation he undertakes that high office which belongs in my judgment alone to the people of the respective States. If you admit that the States affected by that proclamation are not States of the Union, (a proposition which I by no means admit,) and regard them as Territories of the United States, I can still find no warrant in the Constitution of my country that authorizes the President of the United States to prescribe the terms and the manner in which a State shall be admitted into the Union. I do find in that instrument that Congress has the power to admit States, but I find no power conferred on the Executive to do that. I find no provision in the Constitution of my country authorizing the President of the United States to declare that one tenth of the people in any State of the Union, or in any Territory that was once a State of the Union, if you please, shall form a government against the will of the other nine tenths. That, in my judgment, is not only revolutionary, but is destructive to the great principle that lies at the very foundation of republican liberty, which is that majorities must govern.

I can find no warrant in the Constitution of my country that will authorize the President to do any of the things that he indicates in that proclamation as prerequisites for bringing the States back. The truth is he has no power over them. I believe they are now States of the Union; but giving the President either horn of the dilemma, what power has he to say how they shall return? It is not a matter for the Executive to determine. If they are States of the Union, they are already in the Union in contemplation of law, and the President has no right to say that they shall come in upon terms and conditions harshly and unconstitutionally prescribed by him, that one tenth of their population shall be the governing power, and the other nine tenths shall be governed by one tenth. If they are Territories and not States of the Union, then certainly he has no power to say how new States shall be admitted. I should like if I could do so to discuss that proclamation at some length, but I am unable to do it to-day.

Mr. President, I will not notice further the remarks of the honorable Senators. When you take the resolutions as a whole, I do not think that any fair-minded critic can find in them anything that looks to reforming the abuses pointed out in the resolutions in any other way than by the free voice of the sovereign people of the country legitimately expressed. That is the only mode in which my colleague seeks to remedy the abuses indicated in the resolutions. Now, I hold that the sovereign people of this country are the masters; that they have the right, if they choose to exercise it in a legitimate manner, to rise up and turn out of power their present rulers and inaugurate others. I admit that that cannot be done without revolution, except in the proper mode and manner, and at the proper time, according to the Constitution; and that is the end which is sought by my colleague. It is the Government of the people; and in times of great public disaster like this, I think they should be invoked to come to the rescue, and to save their Government with all the rights of civil and religious liberty guaranteed by the Constitution, in order that they and their children may inherit it in all time.

My distinguished friend from Maryland in the discussion yesterday, and the Senator from New Hampshire to-day, have taken occasion to say that these resolutions are not palatable to them. Still, though those honorable gentlemen fully and freely express their opinions in opposition to my colleague's resolutions, as they have the right to do, they say that there is no cause why any censure should be visited upon my colleague. If I looked upon the resolutions as the Senator from New Hampshire and the Senator from Maryland do, I should be of their opinion; I do not believe that we have any power here or any right to censure the minority because they differ from the majority. If you do that, you overthrow all freedom of debate, and all free speech, which would be very destructive, in my judgment, to the liberties of this or any other people. I differ, however, from those honorable gentlemen in regard to the resolutions of my colleague. The Senator from Maryland says there is very little in them that he approves; there is a great deal in them that I approve, and I believe that on a proper occasion I could make my assertion good by argument; but I shall not attempt it at this time, because whether the resolutions are palatable to me or to any other Senator is not the question. The simple question is, whether a Senator of the United States has not the right to promulge political principles, whether he has not the right to arraign this or any other Administration if he chooses before this Senate and the country, without being subject to expulsion or censure? I hold that he has; and if you inaugurate a different policy, the result will be that gentlemen in the minority will be censured every other day when there is any debate going on, for some speech that they may make. As has been very well remarked by the Senator from New Hampshire, the time was, if that policy had been pursued, when he and the Senator from Massachusetts would have been censured. I dare say there was scarcely a week when they did not utter some sentiment that was in violation of the principles held by the then majority of the body; and yet who ever thought of censuring them? Nobody. Sir, the day you inaugurate this system, you will do that which in all time will stand as a monument of shame and disgrace to the Senate, and will be calculated to cause the lovers of free Government to despair of the liberties of this Republic. You must have free speech, free press, and free suffrage, or you have no free Government. If a Senator utters that which is wrong in principle or in fact, let those who are opposed to him show its fallacy. That would be proper and right. I am for the largest freedom of debate, making each Senator responsible to the country and to the people who clothed him with power for the sentiments and principles that he chooses to promulge here, whether in the shape of speeches or resolutions. If he is right, the people will sustain him. If he is wrong, in my judgment a sensible and patriotic people will not sustain him any great length of time.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President, whatever may be the opinion of the Senate upon the resolution under consideration, I think no one can doubt that the resolutions on which it is founded are improper and indecorous, disrespectful to the President of the United States and to the majority

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 28, 1864.

NEW SERIES.—No. 24.

of the Senators. I marvel that one who entertains the sentiments expressed in these resolutions should be willing to retain his connection with men of whose purpose and character he has so low an estimate. In these resolutions, the Senator from Kentucky declares in substance that you and I, and those who act with us, sustaining the Administration and sharing the responsibility of much of its policy and many of its acts, are playing a false and perjured part before the country, that we profess one thing and mean another; that while we hypocritically pretend that we are struggling to save the country, we are really endeavoring to destroy it. He does not content himself with denouncing our policy and admitting the rectitude of our intentions. He charges us with deliberate treachery to our principles and to our country. Well, Mr. President, I have no doubt that he thinks so. I cannot conceive that a man would introduce such a tirade as this into the Senate, that he would prefer such a bill of indictment unless he believed that it was true; and I never have known or heard anything of the Senator from Kentucky that permits me to doubt his honesty. Whatever effect, therefore, these resolutions may have upon my opinion of his judgment and his discretion and his taste, they do not in any degree shake my confidence in his honesty, and if he thinks so I do not wish to restrain him from saying so. It does not hurt you nor me. Your constituents will not believe it of you; mine will not of me; the country will not of either. The Senator from Kentucky might as well say that you are an elephant and that I am an ostrich as to tell the people that we are guilty of the charges rained down upon us in this last resolution; or that we, and those who act with us, are not endeavoring with good intentions, liable to err, liable to passion, liable to prejudice—as even the Senator from Kentucky will admit that he himself may be—to promote the public interest.

I am not indifferent to the opinions of others; especially not to the opinions of those with whom I am associated in this great council of the nation. I would like to have the good opinion of the Senator from Kentucky; but I find myself in excellent company under his censure, and his denunciation is divided among so many that it falls lightly upon my head. I am not, therefore, disposed to respond by any vindictive measure to the resolutions of the Senator, so far as their mere impropriety and indecorum are considered.

There is another view of the question. These resolutions appeal to the people of the North and of the South to "revolt against their war leaders."

This language, in its obvious signification, is something more than improper and indecorous. It may be fairly called insurrectionary; I say in its obvious signification and without any explanation. In the early part of the last Congress, the Senator who introduced these resolutions sought the expulsion of his colleague for words spoken at political meetings and in public addresses. So far as I can recollect, he adduced nothing spoken by his colleague at all comparable to these resolutions, nothing so much calculated to discourage the loyal and to encourage the rebel cause. And I can find an excuse for the Senator on the other side of the Chamber that I cannot find for the Senator on this. The former had the great misfortune to be born a Democrat. We should look with charity upon this accident of birth. He was educated in that school of politics which leads directly to secession and rebellion. In his tender years, when he should have been instructed in the principles of Washington and Adams and Franklin, of Clay and Webster, he was imbued with the pestilential theories of South Carolina and the damnable heresies of Calhoun. When he came to this Chamber he naturally fell into the association of those men who are now the chiefs of the rebellion. It required greater virtue of him than would have been demanded of a man better educated to break away from such bad company.

Mr. POWELL. My friend from Rhode Island will allow me to interrupt him. If he means to suggest that I ever favored secession, I beg to remind him that I have never held to the doctrine of the right of a State to secede.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not say that the Senator entertained those views, but I say he was brought up in that political school whose doctrines, in my opinion, lead directly and legitimately to rebellion and secession. I know the Senator does not go that far, and I think it showed much virtue in him to break away from those men.

Mr. POWELL. I readily admit that I was a great admirer of the genius of Mr. Calhoun, but in the matter of nullification and secession I always differed from him. On other matters I did concur with him pretty fully.

Mr. ANTHONY. But the other Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] was brought up in a different school. He was educated in the faith of the fathers of the Republic. He was the friend and the pupil of that great man whose name alone would have made Kentucky illustrious, even if she had not so many other sons to be proud of. He has spent his life in warring against the Democratic party; and yet now, in his attempt to put down an Administration which is burdened with responsibilities such as no previous Administration has sustained, and which is entitled to the forbearance and the magnanimity of its opponents as no other Administration ever was, he announces his readiness to strike hands with the men who hunted Henry Clay to the grave, who assailed his reputation with their slanderous tongues as long as he lived, and have insulted his memory with their disgusting praises ever since he died.

But, Mr. President, the Senator who sits nearest me did not convince me that his colleague ought to be expelled, and I voted against the resolution to that effect. Nor do I think that he himself should be expelled or censured for these resolutions. I think we are bound to take them with his explanation; and although their most obvious meaning may be insurrectionary, this is not their necessary and inevitable meaning. We are bound to accept the reasonable explanations of the mover; the more so as these explanations are in accordance with his previous declaration and conduct. The Senator declares that he offers the resolutions in no such spirit, and that he agrees to no such interpretation. I believe him; of course I do. I do not believe that the Senator from Kentucky would stand in his place and make a false statement. I am sorry, to judge from his resolutions, that he believes that you and I would; he says that it is our purpose "to proclaim a mock freedom to the slaves," to "enslave the white man," to "trample under foot the Constitution and the law," which we have solemnly sworn to support. I hardly know whether such charges move most my indignation or my ridicule, whether the atrocity or the absurdity of the accusations predominates; but they shall not move me to injustice; nor will I retaliate by charging him with falsehood in the interpretation which he gives to them; for I do not believe him capable of it. While, therefore, I have felt bound to say that these resolutions, under any interpretation of which they are susceptible, are most improper and indecorous, I certainly do not think that they should cause the expulsion of the mover, or a vote of censure which would be tantamount to an expulsion. That punishment, which is the severest that can be inflicted upon a Senator, should be reserved for the gravest offenses, and should be administered with judicial carefulness. I cannot but think that when the Senator from Kentucky comes, in his calmer moments, to reflect upon the injustice that he has done to his associates in this Chamber he will find in his regret at the act a penalty at least fully proportionate to any injury that the resolutions have inflicted upon us.

Mr. LANE, of Indiana. Mr. President, the Senate need labor under no apprehension that at this stage of the session I shall detain them more than a very few moments; yet I feel it is due to the gravity of the occasion that I should in the briefest possible mode present to the Senate the reasons which will influence my vote.

The question as now presented, as it strikes me, is simply this: the Senator from Kentucky introduced a series of resolutions which were ordered to be printed by the Senate, and after the lapse of some ten or fifteen days a resolution was introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts for his expulsion for words used in those resolutions, and the words cited are that the Senator from Kentucky in, I think, the thirteenth resolution advises the people North and South to revolt against their war leaders and take the Government of the country into their own hands. These are the words specified in the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts, and upon which the vote of the Senate is to be had.

A general construction of all the resolutions has entered into the debate, but the resolution of expulsion seems to lay the most stress upon those words which are recited, and to which I have just referred. If I believed with the Senator from Massachusetts that this was an attempt to incite the people to a forcible, armed resistance to the authorities of the General Government in this hour of its extreme peril, I should be prepared to vote with him for expulsion.

Then the Senator from Michigan moves an amendment, to substitute for the word "expulsion" the word "censured." If I believed with him that the intention of the Senator from Kentucky was disloyal and that his resolutions tended to invite insurrection, I should be prepared to vote for a resolution of censure. But I do not believe that either construction is correct, because I take the word of the Senator from Kentucky, whom I have known as long as I have known myself. My earliest memory of that distinguished Senator mingles with the memory of my sainted father, whom I lost long, long years ago; and whatever else that Senator may be, he is true and he is brave, and I take his construction of his language in preference to any construction which may be placed upon it by others. I will not vote either to expel or to censure a Senator for language used here, within any proper limits, with proper regard to the dignity of the Senate and the courtesy of the body, whether that language is employed in resolutions or in debate. I cannot do it.

I recollect but a few short years ago when the bludgeon of the desperado was invoked to silence free discussion upon this floor. I denounced that effort to destroy free discussion here in the Senate of the United States; nor am I willing to-day to use a weapon more fatal to the reputation than the bludgeon of the desperado—a vote of censure or expulsion from this body. What is it to be assassinated by the blow of the desperado or the bludgeon of the assassin, compared with that stain which you place upon a Senator by expulsion or by a deliberate vote of censure? I will not strike down the freedom of discussion either by a blow from the bludgeon or by a vote of the Senate of the United States; nor do I believe this body will for one single moment tolerate any such course. The party now in power owes its origin to the love which the people had for freedom and for free discussion. This great party now in power was born from the agitations growing out of the repeal of the Missouri Compromise, and in that whole contest "free speech and a free press" was emblazoned on every banner, and in that sign we conquered. Nor can we depart from our own teachings by striking down here in this high body freedom of discussion and freedom of the press. I shall give no vote which has any tendency to stifle free discussion. I have given no vote here of which I am ashamed; I shall give no vote here which does not agree with my conscientious convictions of right, and I appeal to the scrutiny and the reason of the present and the higher judgments and retributions of hereafter. I do not fear to shun any discussion.

It is needless for me, after a two years' service in this body, to say that I do not agree with any single one of the resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky; but I think the best way to answer them is to debate them and vote upon them, and let the country with free and unbiased judgment decide between us. If this were the proper occasion, I might be called into a defense of those acts of the Administration which are so bitterly denounced by the Senator from Kentucky. I do not believe it to be the proper occasion. It is enough for me to say to-day that whatsoever they may be, the Senator disclaims all disloyalty, and I accept that disclaimer. Recollect the retributions of history; recollect that the majority of to-day may be the minority of to-morrow; recollect the high destiny which I trust yet awaits this country; and I ask you not here to establish a precedent which hereafter may silence the voice of liberty in these Halls. I do not agree, perhaps, with a single sentiment contained in all these resolutions; but I believe in the freedom of discussion, the utmost freedom of discussion.

I do not believe that disloyalty was intended by the Senator from Kentucky. I cannot believe it, for I know full well the past history of that Senator. In October, 1862, when the rebel army invaded the great State of Kentucky, threatened Louisville and Cincinnati, and when, with the exception of a few volunteer troops, amounting to a few hundred men, we had no force to meet them, I myself saw the Senator from Kentucky one hundred miles from his own home with a musket upon his shoulder, a private in the ranks, drilling four hours a day, ready to meet point to point the invaders of Kentucky; I know that that Senator to-day has seven nephews nobly fighting in the ranks of the republican Army, many of whom have been distinguished; I know that he is the object of attack, of slander, of persecution, by the disloyal element in the State of Kentucky; and because I differ from him here I will not expel him from this body for the free expression of his opinions. I know that the vote I feel compelled to give on this question may be misunderstood, may be misrepresented at home; but I have a higher duty, a holier work to perform than to minister to the public sentiment at home. I walk at peace with the man within; I have the approbation of my own conscience; and I defy misrepresentation and calumny.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose to say a word or two on this subject, although really it seems to be imposing on the Senate to do so. Yet, after all, the question, as it has been presented, is one of importance; and, as we are acting somewhat in a judicial character, perhaps it may not be amiss to say a very few words.

Mr. President, I shall vote both against the amendment and against the original resolution. I will neither vote to expel the Senator from Kentucky nor to censure him. I think either is a very grave thing to do. Whenever we undertake to do either, it should be on grounds that admit of very little or no question. Having come to that conclusion, that I will vote both against the motion to expel and the motion to censure, I cannot for myself but express my regret that the attempt has been made to do either.

My view of the resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky is very simple. They consist of two kinds of resolutions: one may be designated as a mere string of truisms in part, and the rest of them are merely abuse. In some degree they are a matter of taste. Senators have different modes of gaining immortality, and each one selects the mode that he thinks best suited to himself. Some make speeches, interminable speeches, and some lay resolutions on the table almost equally interminable; some read orations, and some present bills, and some do the whole. The Senator from Kentucky seems to indulge in all these modes, as he has an undoubted right to do. To be sure, it may be rather severe upon the Senate sometimes, but that we must all submit to. It is a matter that we have no choice about, because in that particular this is a sort of "liberty hall," and each gentleman, of course, has the right to follow his own taste and his own judgment. But, sir, with reference to the resolutions themselves, and especially the particular resolution which is adverted to in the resolution of expulsion, I have read it carefully, and I am unable to see in it that which is so offensive to some Senators. Taken as a whole, the particular part of it I think is not subject to the construction which is placed upon it by the resolution of expulsion; and I think, therefore, it did not need the disclaimer which has been made of any such meaning as was attributed to it, on the part of the Senator from Kentucky. It is a very common rule of construction that we must take the whole of a sentence in order to get at its meaning. There may be offensive words and yet they may be so qualified by other words with which they are connected that they cease to be offensive, or cease to have the meaning which would be given to them under other circumstances and in other connections.

Now, sir, that thirteenth resolution, which is the only one pointed out in the resolution of expulsion offered by the Senator from Massachusetts, is to be sure somewhat offensive in its mode of expression, but, as I have said before, I think it cannot fairly be construed to mean that the Senator invites the people of the United States or any portion of them to rebel, in the sense in which that word is generally used. The language is this:

"Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders."

Suppose it had ended there; would the Senator from Massachusetts have deemed it worth while on that to offer a resolution of expulsion? The word "revolt," as has been justly remarked by many Senators, has several meanings; and one of its meanings, and its natural meaning under those circumstances, would be to oppose their war leaders. It does not point out the mode of opposition; it does not call on the people to rebel, to rise in arms, to be guilty in any way of any illegality that I can perceive, necessarily; and in a grave proceeding like this we must take the necessary construction. It must be such a one as there can be no doubt about at all. Then the resolution continues:

"And take this great matter into their own hands."

Taking that sentence as it stands to that effect it might look something toward the construction which the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts has put upon it; but everybody must see that the words in one part of a sentence may be very much qualified by words in another; and the purpose for which they are to revolt and take the matter into their own hands becomes material. What is that purpose? The purpose is all avowed in the same sentence, and is a part of it. The Senator from Kentucky explains it:

"The people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands."

And do what? Raise a rebellion; incite to a revolution; disobey or defy the laws or the constituted authorities? Not at all.

"And elect members to a national convention of all the States to terminate a war that is crushing," &c.

That is the object; that is all they are called upon to do, to take the matter into their own hands and elect members to a national convention of all the States. Is it to be presumed that the Senator from Kentucky meant that this national convention should do anything contrary to the laws of the land? Are we to take it for granted and to assume that a national convention thus called by the people of the United States would necessarily proclaim a revolution, defy the Government, disobey the laws, or do anything illegal? Not at all. We have no right to form any such conclusion.

I look at that resolution as nothing more nor less than a strong mode of saying, "This state of things is intolerable; we ought to bear it no longer without resistance in some form; and the people therefore should be called upon to meet in a national convention and devise measures to terminate the war." In my judgment, that is all there is of it. It may be that I am too liberal, that I am too moderate, that I do not see what is to be seen, and what is really intended; but on a scrutiny of the sentence itself, taking it as a whole, according to the rules of construction that I have been in the habit of applying to language, I cannot see that, necessarily, anything more is implied; and that is a perfectly legal purpose, although the language used is strong language, and taken separately and the worst construction put on every word, in the view and meaning of Senators, it might perhaps bear another construction.

That, then, being the construction which I put upon it, it governs me, of course. I see nothing, therefore, in it which would render it necessary for me to conclude, even if then I should feel justified in voting for his expulsion that the Senator from Kentucky, in drafting this resolution and submitting it to the Senate, ever meant to call on the people of the United States to do anything that was illegal or, in that sense of the word, improper. Thinking thus, and that being the only part of the series of resolutions that has been selected by the mover of the resolution for expulsion as making a foundation for a proceeding of this kind, it is satisfactory to me. I am convinced there is nothing else in the resolutions or the keen eye of the Senator from Massachusetts would have discovered it. I certainly have been able to discover nothing else of the kind in the resolutions.

Now, sir, clearly, with this view, I cannot think for a moment of voting to expel the Senator from Kentucky; and I will go further and say that I doubt very much, even if it was susceptible of the construction which is put upon it by Senators, and even if it was not disclaimed, whether I should be ready to vote for his expulsion. I can very readily imagine a condition of things in any country on the face of the earth when a Government, the President, or if you please the ruling power, the Executive, had become so obnoxious to the people and was pursuing a course so diametrically opposed to its interests that it might be necessary in the Senate of the United States or in the House of Representatives, or in both, to say distinctly in the place which we occupy, "I, from this place, call on the people of the United States to resist this outrageous exercise of power." Believing that those things may happen, and believing that there may be times in the history of all countries, as there perhaps have been in the history of some, when the strongest and the boldest and the most decisive language with regard to opposition to the Government not only might be used with propriety, but ought to be used, I cannot say, I am not prepared to say that a Senator for using language even of that description in his place ought necessarily to be expelled; for we cannot undertake to judge of the impressions that may be made upon the mind and the heart of a man by acts from the impressions made upon our minds and our hearts by the same acts. We must judge somewhat of men as we see them. I do not approve of many things that have been said by the Senator from Kentucky on this floor. I think that at times he has been violent and unreasonable in his attacks upon the Administration and upon the majority here; but he does not think so; and because I think so, am I not bound to look somewhat at his previous history as known to myself in order to judge of what may be his intentions?

Sir, I have known the Senator from Kentucky for many years. I was associated with him in the other House of Congress. I have been associated with him here. There we were in perfect accord; here we are not; but I must say in my conscience, and I say it with pleasure, that nothing that the Senator has said here or done here, since he has been a member of this body, much as I may disapprove what he has said and done on several occasions, has for a single moment led me to doubt his devotion to the cause of the country, and his hatred of and his determination to oppose this rebellion. I believe him to be a loyal man. But because he differs with me upon many questions, because he feels with reference to many things as I do not feel, I am not disposed, necessarily, therefore, to judge him harshly; because we must all reflect that on these great questions which so excite him we are not situated as he is and has been. I have been disposed to make much allowance for Senators coming from another section of the country from myself, attached to an institution, perhaps, which I hate, and feeling, perhaps, that their own rights and the rights of their constituents were in danger. I regret that it is the case with regard to the honorable Senator from Kentucky. His attachment to this institution seems to have perverted his judgment; and its tendency always is and always has been, within my observation, to pervert the judgment of any man and to obliterate the distinctions between good and evil.

Now, sir, with regard to a point taken by my colleague, that there was a difference between written resolutions and spoken words in debate, I cannot recognize the distinction. It is all debate as we consider it. Let my colleague consider for a moment. It is nothing but the opinions of a Senator put in writing. How many Senators are there who put in writing deliberately and read to the Senate their opinions upon questions? Is it not debate? It is not, to be sure, laid upon the desk.

Mr. MORRILL. If my colleague will allow me, he does not quite comprehend my distinction. I did not intend to draw a distinction between words written and words spoken; but my distinction was between words spoken in debate on a subject before the Senate and words spoken without a subject. That is the distinction.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I only alluded to it to explain the grounds of my difference. How often do we rise here to make personal explanations? Whatever is admitted as a matter of speech in this Senate or as matter of writing, all comes within the privilege of debate, in my judgment. I think, therefore, we can make no distinction between what is said in the heat of argument, and what is deliberately written and read to the Senate, and what is placed in the shape of resolutions and laid on the desk—men have different modes of accomplishing that purpose—or whether it is pertinent to the question under debate, or whether it is impertinent, using that word in no offensive sense.

That being the case, therefore, I take this to be debate. The Senator from Kentucky has chosen to say certain things; and he will allow me to say, without meaning to offend him at all, that I think he has said many things in these resolutions that are not founded in fact; I think he has said many things intemperately, many things in bad taste, and many things that at some future day when he comes to read them over he will be very likely to be sorry for. But, sir, that makes no difference after all. The honorable Senator from New Hampshire has well said that we cannot undertake to judge of men's opinions by our own in the first place, and we cannot undertake to bring men in debate to our standard.

The rule is a wise one, infinitely wise, and lies at the foundation of all our proceedings and all our liberties in reality as legislative bodies, that we shall not be questioned outside of the Chamber for what we say inside of the Chamber. I agree with what was said by my colleague. I think that inside the Chamber we have a right to punish improprieties in words and acts. There is no doubt about that; but Senators must reflect that it would be extremely dangerous to begin to apply that rule upon a commentary on the Government. Of all things in the world, however much it might offend me, however much I might disagree with the sentiments that were propounded, whatever they were, the last point I would seize upon for punishment of any kind or description would be free, unlimited commentary upon the acts of the Government in power, the Executive, or the authorities of the United States. Sir, everything depends upon the fact that we here, in this legislative Hall or in the other, or in both, shall, when we choose, have the privilege entirely and perfectly to rise in our places and express, in as strong terms as we can, within the limits of parliamentary language and propriety, our disapprobation of anything and everything, if we choose to express it, that is done by the President or his Cabinet, or anybody who is in the administration of executive power. It is the great safeguard against corruption. It is a thing that ought not to be limited in any shape; and we ought to leave any Senator or any Representative who transgresses the proper limits, to the judgment of the country and the judgment of the opinion of those about him. If he goes beyond the proper limits of parliamentary propriety, if he exposes himself to those rules which have been laid down as proper to govern all legislative bodies, he must take the consequences; but for what he says—I mean the nature of what he says—whether true or false, whether slanderous or otherwise, especially upon the Government, we ought to be the last persons in the world to attempt either to restrain or to punish him. He may make great mistakes. He may be very unjust. I think the Senator from Kentucky has been and is unjust; and more than that, I think, in these resolutions he is ungenerous in many things. I have a right to rise in my place and say so. I can comment upon him with as much freedom as I choose, always keeping myself within the limits of which I have spoken. We must meet these things here, and not attempt in any degree to stifle the clear, decided, vigorous expression of disapprobation of anybody and everybody connected with public affairs.

That is the nature (if I have not misread them) of these resolutions. I need not say that I do not approve of them. I need not say, perhaps, that I think they are in a great degree almost entirely unfounded, that they are fallacious, calculated—I will not say designed—to deceive; a stump speech, in point of fact, and of a very violent and a very inexcusable character. That is my opinion; but nevertheless I would not restrain the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator. I support the Administration. I uphold it. I respect it. I am ready to sustain it. I helped to put it into power. Up to this point I have stood by it, and I expect to stand by it hereafter. But, sir, if I cannot defend it against any attacks which the Senator from Kentucky or any other Senator on this floor may choose to make, then he must have the advantage of me, and he should be allowed to go out to the country and obtain all the advantages he can on that account.

It is by attempting in any way to limit such a free expression, that we, in fact, as some gentleman has said, make a confession of our weakness, or the weakness of our friends, which I, for one, am not prepared to make for a single instant. I am ready to meet these resolutions if they ever come to an argument on this floor; that is, if I have time and feel like doing it. I certainly have not much inclination to talk here if I can avoid it; but I really am of opinion that such is their character, they are so bitter, so unjust, so partial, so violent, so unreasonable in their charges upon the Government, that if it had not been for this debate that has sprung up upon them, they would have fallen like a mere dead letter and sunk into complete oblivion, even if backed up by a three days' speech by the honorable Senator from Kentucky; and he certainly could not get through in less time than that, from the length of the resolutions, if he discussed all of them.

Under these circumstances, therefore, holding to these ideas with reference to the matter, as I do not believe and cannot see by any fair construction of the language that the Senator has called upon the people of the country to oppose the laws or do anything of an illegal character, I cannot vote for his expulsion. I hold to the largest liberty of comment upon this Administration and every Administration, and have indulged in it myself and mean to hold it as long as I remain a member of any legislative body. If my friends over on the other side of the Chamber get into power, I have no doubt they will afford me ample occasion to comment in the severest terms upon pretty much everything they do; it has always been the case heretofore. I desire to retain that privilege, and not to say that anybody shall be censured for it. Let the censure come from the people; let the censure come from public opinion if a man abuses his place and makes unfounded charges and attempts to pervert the people from a true and correct judgment of the acts of their rulers. I therefore revert precisely to what I said in the first place—I am sorry to have talked even so long on the subject—that I shall vote both against the resolution of expulsion and the resolution of censure. However censurable in a private point of view I might think the Senator, I am not prepared to set so bad an example here. As my friend from New Hampshire has said, beware of the first step; beware of the beginning; set not so evil an example. If we support this thing, we may find ourselves very soon traveling in a downward road, when perfect freedom of speech in this Chamber cannot be exercised without having the heavy hand of a majority placed upon it, putting something upon the record by way of censure. Censure, in my judgment, should come from another quarter.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If the Senator will withdraw that motion I desire to have an executive session for a few moments.

Mr. SUMNER. Certainly; I will withdraw it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FESSENDEN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

CORRECTION.

Mr. UPSON. Mr. Speaker, I find in the Globe that I am reported as having dissented from the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of Joseph Segar, from Virginia; that is a mistake, as it was the case of Mr. Field, from Louisiana, to which I referred.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original, as deposited in this office.

EPHRAIM FLINT, Jr.,
Secretary of State.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the unfinished business of yesterday, which was the consideration of the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on House bill No. 156, to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1864.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I appeal to my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means to withdraw the demand for the previous question, in order that I may move an amendment agreed to by that committee this morning.

Mr. STEVENS. I withdrew it for that purpose.

The Clerk read, as follows:

To defray expenses incurred in the raising, equipping, transportation, and subsistence of minute men and volunteers in Pennsylvania, Maryland, Ohio, Indiana, Kentucky, Iowa, and Missouri, to repel rebel raid, $10,000,000, to be settled upon proper vouchers to be filed and passed upon by the proper accounting officers of the Treasury: Provided, That in determining the claims to be allowed under this act the same principles, rules, and regulations shall be observed by the accounting officers in auditing said expenses as have been applied to the claims allowed to States, under the act approved July 27, 1861, entitled "An act to indemnify the States for expenses incurred by them in defense of the United States."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I make the point that that amendment is not in order, for the reason that it makes an appropriation, and must, under the rules, have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. PENDLETON. Does the gentleman object to it?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do for reasons well known to the gentleman.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on which a separate vote was not asked were severally read and concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

Provided, That no money hereby appropriated shall be expended on the Capitol extension, or in continuing the north wing of the Treasury extension, beyond what may be necessary to protect said buildings from injury.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I have a word to say before the vote is taken.

The SPEAKER. It has been the usage for the gentleman reporting a bill to be heard after the main question has been ordered, but not after the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union have partly been voted upon.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask the unanimous consent. There was no objection.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to call the attention of the House to the effect of this amendment, which cuts off all appropriations for finishing the work on the Capitol and Treasury extensions, and only allows them to be covered in. I ask whether it is any economy at all to dismiss the artists and laborers employed upon these grand works now near completion, to dismiss them at this season of the year to their distress and the distress of their families, and with the fact staring us in the face that they will have to be recalled here at great expense when the work has to be renewed.

Now I will venture to say that there is no more creditable work to this or any other nation, to be found anywhere, than this Capitol and the Treasury building are. This Capitol is a model for all buildings of the kind everywhere. And now it is proposed to leave the dome of this Capitol unfinished, a dome not inferior to that of any of the cathedrals in Germany; and indeed I do not know but that it exceeds them all. I think that motives of humanity, national pride, and economy, all require that the amendment should be disagreed to, and that the work should be allowed to go on. I thank the House for its indulgence.

The question on agreeing to the ninth amendment was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Ames, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Brooks, Clay, Cravens, Dawes, Denison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Finck, Ganson, Grinnell, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Herrick, Holman, Asahel W. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Kalbfleisch, Kasson, Orlando Kellogg, Kernan, Long, Longyear, McDowell, McKimney, William H. Miller, Amos Myers, Noble, John O'Neill, Orth, Price, Samuel J. So the amendment was disagreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. DAVIS, of New York, stated that Mr. LOVEJOY was confined to his room by illness.

Mr. HARDING stated that his colleague, Mr. GRIDER, was detained from his seat by business of a pressing nature.

Several members, who had not been within the bar when their names were called, having asked leave to vote,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, said: I will not object, but I move that the rule requiring members to be within the bar when their names are called be rescinded.

Mr. PENDLETON. I make the point of order that a motion to change the rules is not in order. The SPEAKER. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was rejected; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN called for a separate vote on the eleventh amendment, as follows:

For repair of coal and landing wharf at Key West, to erect a crane thereon, and cover the extension of the machine shop at that point, $10,000.

The House divided, and no quorum voting.

Mr. HOLMAN said: I suggest if that a letter, which I understand to be in the hands of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. Rice,] be read, showing some responsibility for this appropriation, I will withdraw the demand for a division.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. If the House will permit me, I think I can satisfy it of the necessity for this appropriation. The amendment was offered on the intimation of the Secretary of the Navy that it was necessary to make this expenditure at Key West, which is a favorite station for our blockading squadron. The money is now in course of expenditure, the works being all necessary for the convenience of the vessels of the blockading squadron that touch there. I send to the Clerk's desk a letter from the Secretary of the Navy to be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, January 26, 1864.

SIR: I have the honor to state to the Committee on Naval Affairs that the sum of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) will be required to repair the coal and landing wharf at Key West, to erect a crane thereon, and to cover the extension of the machine shop at that point; and as no estimates for those objects have been submitted, and there are no appropriations for them, to request that the amount named may be appropriated in order to carry out those necessary repairs and improvements.

Very respectfully, &c.

GIDEON WELLES, Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. A. H. RICE, Chairman of Committee on Naval Affairs, House of Representatives.

Mr. HOLMAN. There having been no recommendation read to the House from the head of the Navy Department for this appropriation, I had called for a division. As the Secretary of the Navy says that the appropriation is necessary, I withdraw the call.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 130, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Ashley, Bailey, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Francis P. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brooks, Broomall, James S. Brown, Freeman Clarke, Clay, Cobb, Coffroth, Cole, Cravens, Thomas T. NAYS—Messrs. William J. Allen, Chandler, Stiles, and Benjamin Wood—4.

So the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States, for the year ending June 30, 1865; also a bill (S. No. 60) to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined, and found truly enrolled, bills and resolutions of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same, namely:

Joint resolution (S. No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson;

Joint resolution expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac;

Joint resolution (S. No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside and the officers and men who fought under his command;

Joint resolution (S. No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt;

A bill (S. No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital of the insane in the District of Columbia; and

A bill (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending June 30, 1865.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER announced, as the regular order of business, the calling of committees for reports, under which the question recurred on the motion to recommit the resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary to amend a joint resolution explanatory of "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1862; on which the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] was entitled to the floor.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. KINNEY. I ask the gentleman from Delaware to yield me the floor for the purpose of a personal explanation.

Mr. SMITHERS. I do not like to be discourteous, and I will yield the floor with the understanding that the time the gentleman occupies is not to be taken out of my time, and that the gentleman will occupy not more than ten minutes.

Mr. KINNEY. I rise to repel the attack made upon the people I represent, by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] in his speech yesterday. I should consider myself unworthy to represent that people were I to remain silent and allow that accusation, coming from the source it does, to remain unanswered and unrepelled.

The gentleman was not discussing anything which pertains to my Territory or constituents when he descended from the legitimate argument he was making upon a constitutional question before the House for the purpose of traveling clear around into the Territory of Utah to attack a loyal people. I say the gentleman had no right to do this. If Utah had been before the House, or any measures affecting its interests, then perhaps it might have been germane for the gentleman to indulge in this vindictive attack upon my Territory. I am sorry that I have been compelled to ask the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] to yield me the floor to reply to that part of the speech of the gentleman from New York.

Sir, I presume that this attack falls more harmless upon the ears of the country and the members of this House than if it emanated from any other source in this House.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Permit me to ask the gentleman—

Mr. KINNEY. I have but a very few moments, and I am not disposed to yield the floor for the purpose of answering any question.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I desire simply—

Mr. KINNEY. I decline to yield. The gentleman introduced himself into this House by offering a resolution declaring the present war to be inhuman; and for that reason, and because of the known political standing of the gentleman, his known sympathy with rebels against the best Government the world ever saw, his attempt yesterday fell comparatively harmless upon the country and upon the members of this House.

The gentleman does not confine himself to declaring this war to be inhuman; but in his speech as reported in the Globe of this morning, he characterizes this war as a hellish crusade of blood and famine. Has it come to this, that a man can stand up in the American Congress, when the Government is struggling for its existence, when a formidable attack is made to destroy the Government handed down to us by our fathers—I say has it come to this, that a man can stand up in the American Congress and pronounce this as a hellish crusade of blood? A hellish crusade, indeed, sir! A hellish crusade I presume it would be for a man to defend himself against an assassin; a crusade for a father to defend his wife and children against an attack made by an assassin at midnight; a crusade, indeed, for the Government to struggle in putting down a rebellion which strikes at the life of the nation.

Why, I say, did the gentleman travel out of the order of discussion for the purpose of attacking the people I represent? Why did he do it? I will tell you why. It was because the people of Utah are loyal to the Government, and have no sympathy with rebels. I know of no other reason but this. They are loyal, and have been, to the Constitution and the Government ever since the war commenced—yea, before, ever since the people have had an organization in this country; loyal to the Government, loyal to its institutions, and submissive to its laws.

But, sir, in justice to the gentleman from Delaware I must be brief. The gentleman from New York says:

"But, sir, that is not the only case. I come to a later and yet more pertinent and significant case—the Mormon rebellion. These profligate outcasts, who have always been hostile to your moral and political institutions, were treated with by commissioners."

These "outcasts!" Mr. Speaker, I am told and this House is told that the people of Utah are outcasts. I hurl back the accusation upon the gentleman. I pronounce it false. I pronounce the statement false that the people of Utah have ever been in rebellion against the Government or its laws. I have had some experience in the Territory of Utah for some years as its chief justice, and I take this occasion to say that the people of that Territory have always been submissive to the laws, have always been loyal to the Constitution and the Government, and have always been obedient to the authorities of the Federal Government in that Territory. I will tell you, sir, why this formidable military force was sent to Utah in 1858. John B. Floyd was then Secretary of War and James Buchanan was President of the United States; and it was for the purpose of bringing about this very state of things that now exists and prepare the way for it that a large force of ten or fifteen thousand men was sent into the Territory of Utah, and that, too, when the people of the Territory were pursuing their peaceful avocations, loyal to the Constitution and the Union. I say that there was no cause for sending that army to Utah. None existed whatever. There was no reason for it, but that arch-traitor, John B. Floyd, foreseeing, as he did, that the time was near at hand when the southern States would revolt against the Government and establish a government of their own, set on foot a large military force against the people of Utah, transporting to it an army at an expense of forty or fifty million dollars, thus impoverishing the United States Treasury, and for the purpose of preparing the way by crippling the North, with a view to the rebellion which is now upon us. These men were sent to Utah with all the paraphernalia of war, with infantry, artillery, and cavalry, for this purpose alone. The people were quiet; they were peaceful; they were loyal; they were submissive to the Government and to its laws. I say that it was for this purpose, and only for the purpose of impoverishing the Treasury of the United States and of disposing of the Army of the United States, for after that Army was recalled it was engaged at Fort Crittenden in destroying the munitions of war that they might not be brought back to the northern States to assist in putting down this rebellion.

Mr. SMITHERS. Will the gentleman from Utah pause awhile? He has already occupied the ten minutes he requested of me. I wish now to understand whether the time which he occupies is to come out of my hour? If not, I am perfectly content that he shall proceed.

The SPEAKER. The understanding is that the gentleman from Delaware has yielded the floor to the gentleman from Utah for a personal explanation by unanimous consent, and hence the time occupied by the gentleman from Utah will not come out of the gentleman's hour.

Mr. KINNEY. Mr. Speaker, it was for the reason I have stated, and for that reason alone, that the traitor, John B. Floyd, inaugurated this war against the people of the Territory of Utah; but I say to the gentleman that not a gun was fired upon either side, neither by the Federal troops nor by the people of the Territory. It was only the appearance of war, and it was for the purpose of destroying the arms and crippling the means of the Government and impoverishing the Treasury of the United States, as I have stated, that this large military force was sent forth against a peaceful and loyal people. The gentleman says that the people of Utah were in rebellion. Sir, they never have been in rebellion against this Government. They have not, as the gentleman from New York has, any sympathy with rebels. The gentleman should look to his own city. I think he has been a very distinguished citizen of the city of New York, and has had the honor of presiding over that vast metropolis; and it is said, I do not know with how much truth, that the recent riot in the city of New York, by which the streets flowed with blood, and innocent women and children were butchered—it is said that a large share of the responsibility of that riot rests upon the shoulders of the gentleman from New York. But, Mr. Speaker, when a man will stand up in the Halls of this Congress at this time, when it is important for every man, if he enunciates sentiments at all, to enunciate loyal sentiments, and attack the Government and the loyal people I represent, I trust that his attacks will be harmless and of no effect.

I would ask the gentleman if he did not, when vessels carrying arms to the South from New York were detained by the Government, and he was telegraphed to by the Governor of Georgia on the subject, telegraph to the Governor of Georgia that he regretted exceedingly that these vessels had been taken into custody by the Government, and that he had not the power of releasing them and sending them on their way rejoicing?

I presume such is the case; and are we, I say, are grave members of the American Congress, assembled to legislate for the best interests of the country, who are trying to save for posterity the Government bequeathed to us by our fathers—are we to sit here and listen to sentiments breathing treason against the Government without saying a word against it?

If I were a member of the House in full fellowship, in place of being a Delegate, the first thing I would do would be to introduce a resolution in this House to expel the gentleman, as unworthy to occupy a seat upon this floor. [Great laughter.] I think it is due to the dignity of the body, due to the nation, due to the people whom we represent, that he go back to his constituents, or rather to the place to which he more legitimately belongs—to the southern confederacy.

Mr. Speaker, I propose to quote a little further from the gentleman's speech; and I will say that the speech as it appears in the Globe and as it was delivered yesterday in the House differs in some very essential particulars. Undoubtedly it has been prepared with care by the gentleman, and that we have the right to take it as it appears in the Globe.

He says, in speaking of what he terms the Mormon rebellion—

"It commenced early in 1837. The immediate cause was opposition to the exercise of Federal authority and the appointment of a territorial Governor. On the 15th of September of that year Brigham Young issued a proclamation in the style of an independent sovereign, announcing his purpose to resist by force of arms the entry of the United States troops into the Territory of Utah. He proceeded to carry out this threat. He organized an army, declared martial law, seized Government fortifications, destroyed Government property, and put the Territory in a state of complete defense against the Federal Army."

I ask the gentleman for his authority when he says that Governor Brigham Young seized Government fortifications and destroyed public property. If he was as familiar with Utah as he seems to be with the rebels, he would never have made that statement. There were no Government fortifications in Utah at that time, and none were seized by Governor Brigham Young or by the people of Utah.

It is true, Mr. Speaker, that when the people of Utah heard for the first time after the Federal army was fairly on its way across the plains that a tremendous military force was on its way to that Territory for the purpose of destroying them, of exterminating them from the face of the earth, for the purpose of pillaging and plundering their fair possessions—it is true they did then precisely as any other people would have done under such circumstances: they prepared for their defense.

But that army entered Salt Lake City peacefully and in quiet. Not a gun was fired, not a drop of blood was shed. And this grand programme inaugurated by Floyd for the purpose I have indicated and as has since fully appeared to be true, after remaining there for some two years, destroyed nearly all their munitions of war (for they were engaged many months in doing it) and were then recalled, and the grand farce ended.

That is all there was of the Mormon rebellion, as the gentleman called it; not a rebellion by the Mormons, not at all, but a military expedition, set on foot and carried into effect in 1858 by John B. Floyd, for the purposes which I have already stated; and it has had its effect. It has crippled the North. For the time being it crippled and impoverished the Treasury of the United States; and Mr. Floyd and Mr. Buchanan were content, for it cost the Government nearly fifty million dollars.

Sir, the people of Utah have under all their discouragements and embarrassments built up a beautiful city in the midst of the great American desert. They are feeding, and have been for years, the employes of the overland mail. They are furnishing the necessary supplies for the purpose of developing the resources of the rich mineral regions which surround them. They have afforded a safe retreat from the Indians to the wayfarer as he passes on his weary pilgrimage to the other side of the Rocky Mountains for the purpose of developing the resources of the Pacific coast.

The time may come, Mr. Speaker, and I hope it will come during the present session of Congress, when I may have the opportunity of elaborating this subject, and showing to the American nation that the people I have the honor to represent upon this floor are a much-abused people; that they are entitled to receive, in place of the condemnation of the country and of those who represent the people in Congress, their sympathies for what they have done in establishing a colony in the great heart of the American desert which is indispensable to the people and to the Government. Thanking again the gentleman from Delaware very kindly for his courtesy in yielding me the floor, I will not detain the House longer.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I hope that the House will bear with me for a moment.

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I rise for the purpose of saying a few words in reply to the Delegate from Utah.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Delaware yield for that purpose?

Mr. SMITHERS. I extend the courtesy to the gentleman from New York, with the request that he will be brief, for I may be taken off the floor by the expiration of the morning hour.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Mr. Speaker, I promise the House that I shall only have a few words to say.

In the course of my argument yesterday, it became necessary, in illustrating the statement that it had been the practice of the Government to appoint commissioners to treat with rebels in arms against its authority, to allude to the Territory of Utah. In doing so, sir, I had no expectation of exciting the ire of the Delegate from that Territory. The statements I made were gathered from executive documents on file in the archives of the Government. Almost every allegation that I uttered with reference to the Delegate's constituency were nearly verbatim extracts from official papers.

Mr. KINNEY. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I cannot yield to the Delegate a courtesy that he denied to me.

Mr. Speaker, I was exceedingly guarded in my reference to that question, lest I might be seduced into some assault upon the peculiar institutions of that region, lest I might call upon the gentleman's political friends to know why, when they are suppressing, as they allege, the vile institution of slavery, they do not, as promised by the Chicago platform, suppress that other of "the twin relics of barbarism," polygamy? [Laughter.] But, sir, I avoided any reference to those peculiar institutions which I believe under the theory of our Government, so long as they are republican in form, we are obliged to tolerate, whether they are moral or immoral.

The Delegate tells us, Mr. Speaker, that the Government of the United States made war upon Utah; that the Secretary of War sent an army to conquer Brigham Young. Well, sir, I again refer the gentleman to the public archives. I refer him to the report of the Secretary of War made to the President of the United States, and which was transmitted to Congress, where it is distinctly stated that it became necessary to send an army, under General Alfred Sidney Johnston, because the Government officials were denied access to the Territory; because the Governor appointed by the President, and confirmed by the Senate, as well as the United States territorial judge, also appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, were denied the exercise of their official powers within the Territory. It also became necessary for the President to appoint two commissioners, ex-Governor POWELL, of Kentucky, now a Senator of the United States from that State, and Ben. McCullough, formerly of the Army of the United States. They went out with instructions from the President; they did proceed to the gentleman's Territory; they did meet a commissioner representing the other side, and did treat with Brigham Young; they did meet with the leader of the rebellion; and they did finally amicably adjust the questions at issue. That is all I said.

I thank the gentleman from Delaware for giving me this opportunity to say that my statements of yesterday were made from official data. If the Delegate from Utah chooses hereafter to dispute them I shall be prepared to furnish the documents to which I have referred.

One word, Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, as to a matter alluded to by the gentleman, and which is personal to myself. He inquired whether, when I was mayor of the city of New York, I did not send a communication to the Governor of Georgia regretting that arms had been stopped on their way to the South. I thank the gentleman for this opportunity to deny most emphatically and positively that there is any other foundation for that, other than this: before the commencement of this rebellion, and before any action by the Federal Government, the municipal police of New York stopped in transitu, upon the wharf, and when going on board the Savannah steamer, merchandise of every character whatever. Not arms, sir, not munitions of war, but the merchandise of New York merchants engaged in a lawful commerce. And then the Governor of Georgia telegraphed to me to know about the matter. The fact, sir, that the telegraph was in operation unrestricted; the fact that there was no interruption of intercourse between Georgia and New York, and the fact that mails were being carried as regularly as ever, are sufficient to prove that so far as the States of Georgia and New York were concerned, there were no unfriendly relations upon which to allege that there was any correspondence of an improper character. The Governor of Georgia telegraphed to know whether it was by my order, as mayor of the city of New York, that merchandise in transitu was thus stopped. I replied it was not; that under our municipal regulations the police of the city of New York was not responsible to the mayor, and that he had no control whatever over them.

That was my reply, and that is the matter upon which the gentleman from Utah hinges his accusation against my loyalty. I am not called upon to defend my loyalty, and I charge any man with falsehood who impugns it. My loyalty, and the threat of the gentleman to expel me—I will be ready to meet that question here and elsewhere when any gentleman has sufficient temerity to make the proposition.

Again thanking the gentleman from Delaware for this opportunity to reply, I yield to him the floor.

Mr. KINNEY. Will the gentleman from Delaware yield to me for one moment?

Mr. SMITHERS. I think this debate has gone far enough, and I decline to yield.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The House then resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, on which the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. SMITHERS] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITHERS. Mr. Speaker, though the question before the House is strictly the consideration of the amendment to the resolution explanatory of the act of 1862, yet, as it has been considered as involving the power of Congress to inflict forfeiture in fee as punishment for treason, I propose, among other things, to present my views briefly upon that subject. I offer no apology for occupying the time of the House on questions alike novel and important; and though I may fail to affect the opinion of any gentleman upon the floor, I shall, however imperfectly, have but performed a duty.

The rare occurrence of the crime since the adoption of the Constitution has prevented any authoritative judicial interpretation, and the meager comments of elementary writers afford little aid in its exposition. It must therefore be treated as a case of first impression, and the instrument must be its own interpreter. In determining its meaning the words are to be taken in their natural and common acceptance, except only where technical terms are employed they are to receive a legal and artificial construction. The framers of the Constitution fully understood the force of the words used in relation to a matter so familiar. Perfectly cognizant of the terrible evils attendant upon a power in the judiciary to declare cases of constructive treason or in Congress to define in what it should consist, they ordained a constitutional definition, and prescribed that it should "only consist in levying war against the United States or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort." Having thus limited and hedged about the crime by exclusive words, they left to Congress the whole power of declaring its punishment, coupled with a qualification the object and construction of which is the matter in dispute. It will be observed that the power is granted in general terms:

"The Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

If there be any denial or restriction upon the capacity by legislative enactment to affix any measure or mode of punishment known to the common law, or to the Parliament of Great Britain, upon the trial and conviction of the traitor, it is contained in this clause, and in that other provision which declares that "cruel and unusual punishments shall not be inflicted." I say upon the trial and conviction of the offender, for I maintain that this section has no reference to the odious and abominable practice of declaring persons attainted by bill without indictment or form of trial, as practiced by the British Parliament, and which is specially prohibited by a preceding clause of the Constitution. A careful inspection of the sentence will show that the object was not to limit the power of Congress, but to restrict the operation of attainder in its well-known attribute of working unlimited corruption of blood and perpetual forfeiture of estate. For it will be observed that the power to attain is not denied, but impliedly granted and recognized as within the power of Congress to impose as a specific punishment. The forfeiture restricted by the Constitution to the period of the life of the offender was that worked by attainder, and has no reference to forfeiture specifically imposed as punishment uncoupled with attainder and prescribed in the exercise of the general power precedent given to declare the punishment of treason.

The clause is properly no restriction on the power of Congress to impose a penalty, but only a constitutional definition of the consequence and limitation upon the operation of a particular mode of punishment, known as attainder. It declared in effect that Congress might attain, but that such attainder should be deemed to work forfeiture only during the life of the person attained.

In this connection it is suggestive that the clause under consideration is contained in the article of the Constitution vesting judicial power, and from its location would seem to be a rule of judicial construction; limiting the courts in determining the consequences of attainder to confine its operation to the period of life only. It announced that when the heir came to claim the estate which had descended to him from his attainted parent, or through that parent from a more remote ancestor, he should not be held in law as being debarred from his inheritance by the technical operation of a common law punishment, following conviction and working absolute forfeiture and indefinite corruption of blood.

I incline to differ from those who construe the words "except during life" as referring to the point of time at which the forfeiture is worked, and not to the quantity of estate divested. I differ because of the nature of the attainder whose operation is thus restricted. Unless my reading of the provision be erroneous, the attainder referred to is such only as at common law resulted from conviction on indictment. It has no relation to such attainders as were imposed by statutes, operating immediately without process, ordinarily called bills of attainder.

These were the terrible engines of despotic cruelty by which men were punished for acts which when committed were not criminal; exhumed after death, and branded with the infamy of treason without trial; their estates forfeited without process of law, and their posterity rendered incapable of inheriting from or through them to the remotest generations. The power to enact such statutes is expressly denied to Congress by that clause which ordains that "no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed," and the clause under consideration contemplates it as being specially provided as punishment for crime—to be pronounced upon the conviction of the offender as a part of the sentence of the law upon the judgment of the court. If this view be correct it would seem to follow that the operation of the attainder to work forfeiture must necessarily arise during the life of the person attainted, and that upon the construction contended for by those who limit the words as defining the point of time when its operation commences, this provision was unnecessary, as the attainder imposed as punishment upon conviction, and which alone is recognized by the Constitution, must of necessity work during the life of the culprit; and as the divestiture of estates, which occurred after the death of the person attainted, resulted from corruption of blood, and did not accrue by way of forfeiture as the immediate consequence of attainder, corruption of blood being wholly taken away, these words would seem to indicate the quantity of estate forfeited.

But it is also suggested that by the imposition and execution of the sentence of death the forfeiture worked by the attainder was no material punishment, and that therefore these words are to receive a construction as declaring the time at which forfeiture shall be worked. This argument would be potential if Congress had no right to impose any other penalty, and if the object of the Constitution had been to vest in Congress the power to declare that form of punishment instead of being to vest a general discretion; to exclude the conclusion of the necessity of resorting to that form, and to limit the effect of attainder when prescribed. But Congress is intrusted by the Constitution with the unlimited power to declare what penalty it will inflict. It has chosen to prescribe death, omitting attainder; but imprisonment, banishment, forfeiture, or all of them, or any other, if deemed appropriate and adequate, were equally within its legitimate authority. To the penalty of death it might have added attainder, which by its own operation, and not by force of the statute, would have worked forfeiture. I say added attainder, for I hold that under our Constitution attainder is not a consequence of the judgment, at common law, but must be specially declared by Congress as part of the punishment, but when declared and pronounced by the court, immediately worked forfeiture according to the limited operation prescribed by the Constitution. I say worked forfeiture, for if the forfeiture were contained in the statute and imposed as specific punishment of treason, then it was not the consequence of attainder, but existed independently of it.

This general power to prescribe the punishment of treason is in accordance not only with the spirit of the Constitution, but with its literal text, which was so justly vindicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts by his acute criticism upon inspection of the original instrument, and which agrees with the history of the clause, as shown in Elliot's Debates, and with the punctuation of the older editions of the Federalist. No other construction can rescue its framers from the monstrous absurdity of permitting Congress to punish minor felonies, and even misdemeanors, by the total deprivation of property and compelling the Government to hold, as trustee, the remainder in the whole estate of a convicted traitor, contingent upon his death, for the benefit of his heirs at law. Nor is there any authority, judicial or elementary, which has been cited, that, in my judgment, properly considered, militates against this construction. The comment of Mr. Madison, contained in No. forty-three of the Federalist, is confidently relied on as an authority. Now, to my mind, it is perfectly clear that Mr. Madison was treating of the operation of the common-law punishment of attainder. I quote his language, not an unconnected clause, but the whole paragraph:

"As treason may be committed against the United States, the authority of the United States ought to be enabled to punish it; but as new-fangled and artificial treasons have been the great engines by which violent factions, the natural offspring of free governments, have usually wracked their alternate malignity on each other, the Convention have, with great judgment, opposed a barrier to this peculiar danger by inserting a constitutional definition of the crime, fixing the proof necessary for conviction of it and restraining the Congress, even in punishing it, from extending the consequences of guilt beyond the person of its author."

It is manifest that the distinguished author, in this comment, alluded to the practice of corrupt and subservient judges of inventing constructive treasons, of allowing convictions upon insufficient proof; and dominant factions, possessed of legislative power, of enacting modes of punishment operating through corruption of blood, to visit the guilt of the parent upon his innocent posterity. In no sense does forfeiture antecedently prescribed and operating immediately upon the party convicted visit punishment otherwise than upon the person of the guilty author. The estate divested is his, the fine collected is out of his property, and the sentence of death, if executed, is upon him personally. It is true that his children are forestalled in the one case of the wealth, and in the other deprived of the society of the parent, but in either case only in the form of punishment applied directly to the criminal.

The great name of Judge Story has been invoked as conclusive against the doctrine of the right of Congress to forfeit. If indeed he has so written, although not of the force of a judicial determination, it would go far towards settling the controversy, not only in my mind, but, which is far more material, in the opinion of this House and in the judgment of the country.

Before yielding, however, unqualified assent to the position claimed as having been established by this authority, it will be well to review what Judge Story has really written. Commenting on this clause, he says:

"Two motives, probably, concurred in introducing it as an express power. One was not to leave it open to implication whether it was to be exclusively punishable with death, according to the known rule of the common law and with the barbarous accompaniments pointed out by it, but to confide the punishment to the discretion of Congress."

Now, it is incontestable that he here not only admits that the whole matter of determining how treason should be punished, is vested in Congress, but declares that it was so vested purposely to prevent the conclusion which might otherwise have been drawn, that the only allowable mode was that practiced in England, death and attainder, and closes with the express declaration that the choice of the measure of punishment is confided to the discretion of Congress, and clearly evidencing as his opinion that in the exercise of that discretion it might prescribe death or any other form and measure which it might deem adequate and appropriate. He then proceeds:

"The other was to impose some limitation upon the nature and extent of the punishment, so that it should not work corruption of blood, or forfeiture beyond the life of the offender."

Can any one fail to perceive that the great commentator had in his mind the common-law penalty of attainder? He speaks of a punishment which worked corruption of blood and forfeiture. What punishment had this effect except attainder? What other worked corruption of blood? What other reached beyond the life of the offender? He is not speaking of a punishment specifically imposed, such as death, forfeiture, imprisonment, and the like, but of that one which in addition to its own imposition wrought, by its operation, corruption of blood and forfeiture of estate. It is true that in treating of the policy of forfeiture he urges with much power its tendency to alienate the affections of the children from that Government which has deprived them of enjoying the possessions of their ancestors. But this is a mere question of policy, and does not affect the consideration of constitutional power. It is for Congress to determine whether it may not be the better policy to divest the whole estate of traitors, not only to prevent the alienation of the residue falling in after the life estate shall have been exhausted, as suggested by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOURWELL,] but, which I consider of more importance as securing the future peace of the Republic, to teach those who may hereafter be inclined to rush into rebellion against the United States, that they cannot do so without exposing themselves to the utter forfeiture of their estates, and their posterity to the loss of that property which they might otherwise have inherited.

On this subject I have no mawkish sentimentality, no such acute sensibility as to lead me to be more careful of the prospective interest of the children of traitors than those to whom they were by nature intrusted, and who, as vigilant guardians, should have looked well to the future before taking up arms against a Government under whose benign protection they have acquired and held all that property which they have now so justly forfeited by rebellion against its authority. No such consideration of sympathy will restrain me from voting any measure of punishment whatsoever. I shall act irrespectively of their advantage and only for the interest of the Republic; and in my judgment that interest will be best promoted, future peace most effectively maintained, and the permanency of the Union most efficiently guaranteed by visiting upon the wicked leaders utter confiscation of estates and deprivation of political rights, and by showing mercy and amnesty to the deluded masses who by their devices have been deceived and by their bayonets driven into rebellion.

But, Mr. Speaker, though I maintain that, under the third section of article three, Congress has power to punish treason by the forfeiture of the whole estate of the traitor, I do not consider the act of 1862 as within this provision.

It prospectively announces to the rebellious subjects of the Government that they shall lay down their weapons and return to their duty as citizens, and prescribes the penalty of their failure. This act proposes to aid in the suppression of the rebellion by the seizure and confiscation of that which helps to foster and sustain it. It is restricted in its operation to the seizure of the property of those who are actively engaged in armed hostility to the Government, or who are exercising the functions of a usurping power set up against its lawful authority and directing or aiding in its administration. It prescribes the mode of its enforcement, and declares that it shall be made operative by proceedings in rem, and only upon proof that the owner is actually engaged in rebellion, and then that it shall be condemned for the use of the Government.

I ask what principle renders such property incapable of condemnation by a court acting in rem? What provision of the Constitution inhibits Congress from declaring such penalty and enforcing it by any tribunal upon which it shall confer jurisdiction? It is too late to contend that it is obnoxious to censure as violating that clause which declares that no person shall be deprived of property without due process of law. Such proceedings have been too often resorted to and are too familiar in practice, operating to divest property and to deprive the owner of his title. All that is necessary to confer jurisdiction is that there be seizure and reduction into possession by the Government.

Congress has the right to enact its own laws, define its own penalties, and prescribe for itself the mode of enforcement, only responsible to the Constitution of the United States. There is no other tribunal that has any control over the subject, and whether it will proceed in rem or in personam is a matter of discretion, to be determined only by the exercise of its own will.

The persons against whom it has decreed its penalties are citizens of the United States. The things upon which it operates are within its territorial jurisdiction; the tribunals which it invests with authority to adjudicate are its own courts. It invokes no law of nations. It does not inquire, for the purpose of giving validity to this statute, whether other Governments have consented that the property adjudicated upon has been ordinarily the subject of admiralty proceedings. It is no matter whether the things confiscated be or be not contraband. This is no question arising between this Government and the subjects of foreign Powers determinable upon the principles of international law, and in reference to which sovereigns may be appealed to for the protection of their citizens.

The seizure contemplated by this statute is for a breach of the law, and made only within those limits over which Congress has the right to legislate in virtue of the sovereign dominion which it possesses within the territory of the nation. This power is the same in peace and in war, and is exercised according to its discretion.

But, Mr. Speaker, while I do not admit that it was requisite, to authorize jurisdiction to be conferred by proceedings operating in rem, that there should be any definite connection between the thing seized and the breach of law committed, yet I contend that if even this test be applied, the Legislature will be vindicated in having provided the mode of enforcement in conformity with that principle.

Is it not manifest that the things confiscable are valuable to the owners for the purpose of enabling them to maintain the struggle against the Government, and conducing to the violation of the law which required that they should return to their duty? Does the act confiscate slaves? They are the laboring population by whose active assistance breadstuffs are raised for the support of the army. Are cattle taken? It deprives the offender of the power of converting them into food for the maintenance of his troops. Is land seized? It constitutes the very fountain from which he draws his supplies, and forms the basis of taxation for the continuance of the rebellion.

But, Mr. Speaker, the doctrine is advanced by gentlemen of eminent ability on this floor and elsewhere, that the United States are at war with a foreign nation, that the rebels are to be regarded as alien enemies, and the territory that may be wrested from their possession is to be treated as conquered country. I cannot agree to this proposition. I hold that they are still within and subject to the jurisdiction of the United States. I maintain that, however organized in rebellion, no act which they have committed has absolved them from the allegiance which they owe to this Government, or from criminal responsibility to its laws; that the right of intraterritorial jurisdiction is as perfect as before the rebellion; and that however they may have affected their own condition so as to deprive them of the right of denying the application of the stern rules of war when enforced in that character, even such application is merely in addition to the ordinary incidents of sovereignty; and from this cause they can have no right to claim that they do not owe allegiance to the Government of the United States.

The capacity of enforcement of municipal law may be suspended, the government of States may be temporarily overthrown, the instruments of power may be usurped; but all these do not deprive the sovereign of his right of jurisdiction over his own territory and subjects. Nothing can alter their condition or convert them into aliens or relieve them from criminal liability except ultimate success terminating in the establishment of their independence. So long as we continue to employ against them the ordinary means of warfare with any reasonable prospect of their reduction, they are still subjects of the United States, and any other hypothesis would, to my mind, carry with it the recognition, either of the original right of secession, thereby converting them into an independent people, or that their relation has been changed by the successful arbitrament of the sword.

These views seem to me to derive entire confirmation from the case of Rose vs. Himely, decided by Chief Justice Marshall and reported in 4th Crauch, 241. It arose upon an appeal from the sentence of the circuit court for the district of South Carolina, and briefly upon these facts: the schooner Sarah, after trading with the rebels of San Domingo, sailed thence with a cargo purchased there for the United States, and after proceeding more than ten leagues at sea was captured by a French privateer, and the cargo sold by the captors. They were carried by the purchaser into Charleston and there claimed on behalf of the former owners. The seizure and condemnation were based upon a decree of the French Government, which declared that "the port of Santo Domingo was the only one of the colony of Santo Domingo open to French and foreign commerce, and that every vessel sailing within the territorial extent of the island (except between Cape Raphael and the bay of Ocoa) found at a less distance than two leagues from the coast should be arrested and confiscated." The condemnation was reversed by the court, and restitution awarded on the ground that it was a mere breach of a municipal regulation, and therefore not warranted by the law of nations.

In pronouncing the opinion of the court, Chief Justice Marshall uses the following language, which is so appropriate to the question under consideration that I quote it even at the expense of prolixity:

"Admitting that the ordinary tribunal erected in St. Domingo was capable of acting as a prize court, and also of taking cognizance of offenses against regulations purely municipal, it is material to inquire in which character it pronounced the sentence of condemnation in the case now under consideration. In making this inquiry the relative situation of St. Domingo and France must necessarily be considered.

"The colony of St. Domingo originally belonging to France had broken the bond which connected her with the parent State, had declared herself independent, and was endeavoring to support that independence by arms. France still asserted her claim of sovereignty, and had employed a military force in support of her claim. A war de facto then unquestionably existed between France and St. Domingo. It has been argued that the colony, having declared itself a sovereign State, and having thus far maintained its sovereignty by arms, must be considered and treated by other nations as sovereign in fact, and as being entitled to maintain the same intercourse with the world that is maintained by other belligerent nations. In support of this argument the doctrines of Vattel have been particularly referred to. But the language of that writer is obviously addressed to sovereigns, not to courts. It is for Governments to decide whether they will consider St. Domingo as an independent nation, and until such decision shall be made, or France shall relinquish her claim, courts of justice must consider the ancient state of things as remaining unaltered, and the sovereign power of France over that colony as still subsisting.

"It is not intended to say that belligerent rights may not be superadded to those of sovereignty. But admitting a sovereign who is endeavoring to reduce his revolted subjects to obedience to possess both sovereign and belligerent rights, and to be capable of acting in either character, the manner in which he acts must determine the character of the act. If, as a legislator, he publishes a law ordaining punishments for certain offenses, which law is to be applied by courts, the nature of the law and of the proceedings under it will decide whether it is an exercise of belligerent rights or exclusively of the sovereign power."

"Nothing can be more obvious than that these are strictly territorial regulations proceeding from the sovereign power of St. Domingo, and intended to enforce sovereign rights. Seizure for a breach of this law is to be made only within those limits over which the sovereign claimed a right to legislate in virtue of the exclusive dominion which every nation possesses within its own territory and within such a distance from the land as may be considered as a part of its territory. This power is the same in peace and in war, and is exercised according to the discretion of the sovereign."

"It is true that the revolt of the colony is the motive for this exercise of sovereign power. Still it is an exercise of sovereign power restricting itself within those limits which are the province of municipal law, not the exercise of a belligerent right."

I have cited this opinion at some length, Mr. Speaker, as being more cogent, more authoritative, more conclusive than any argument I could possibly make. It establishes the position that municipal and belligerent rights may coexist and be concurrently exercised.

Neither blockading ports nor exchanging prisoners is in any respect incompatible with the maintenance of sovereign power. Miserable would be the condition of that nation which would be compelled to leave its citizens languishing in dungeons under penalty of abandonment of its sovereignty by consenting to their release. More merciful and reasonable is that rule which permits the mitigation of human sufferings and the alleviation of the horrors of war without altering the status of the belligerent parties. The act of 1862 is a municipal regulation growing out of a state of war, but prescribed by the sovereign through the usual forms of legislation, and enforced by the ordinary tribunals of justice.

So much, Mr. Speaker, for the question of power. I hold, also, that the confiscation of the estates of the leaders in this rebellion is defensible as a measure of sound policy, and necessary to the future peace of the Republic.

It will be remembered that this is no sudden outbreak, no whisky insurrection, no Shay's rebellion, to which it has been likened by the gentleman from New York. It was the result of no gross wrong or intolerable grievance. Its authors had been in possession of the Government for thirty years, enjoying its patronage and administering its functions. No miserable peasantry, stimulated to violence by oppression or deceived by the wiles of ambitious demagogues, but men of culture, the lords of the soil, who appreciated the nature of the contest and understood the consequences of their crime. Aristocratic by education and habit, they saw in the advancing march of free institutions the onward tread of an adverse civilization which, in its peaceful progress, was destined not only to deprive them of the administration of the Government but finally to revolutionize their social system. Against this result they rebelled, and inaugurated a war, not only against the United States, but the immutable law of the Almighty. The conflict, which before was peaceful, always irrepressible, is now to be terminated by arms. One system or the other must be dominant; they will break us or we must reduce them. Left in the enjoyment of their slaves and their lands—the instruments of their power—they remain masters of the position, and we but entail upon posterity the renewal of a strife which it becomes us now thoroughly to quell.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that these views are not in unison with the sentiments of the gentleman from New York who addressed the House yesterday. When he becomes their advocate, I shall distrust their soundness. To opinions such as he has expressed is justly attributable not only the inception but the prolongation of this mournful contest. The rebel leaders would never have undertaken the revolt had they not been persuaded that they would have been permitted to go in peace. The rebellion would have been overcome had it not been for the malign counsels of those who have distracted the nation and prevented the concentration of its undivided energies in its suppression.

The gentleman from New York, under the guise of peace, is the most efficient promoter of war; and, standing here as the practical advocate of recognition, charges the majority of this House with preventing the maintenance of the Union.

"Quis tulerit Gracchos de seditione querentes?"

Mr. Speaker, the denial of the right to exercise the sovereign powers of government has characterized this struggle from its inception. Constitutional questions have been raised against it at every step of its progress. In the beginning it was announced, even by the President of the United States, charged with the solemn duty of the preservation of the Union and the enforcement of its laws, that, though there was no right to secede, the Government had no power to coerce. This miserable sophism, officially promulgated at the other end of the avenue, not only betrayed the weakness of the Executive, but paralyzed the whole energies of Government. Rebellion thus invited to advance, hastened its preparation, armed its partisans, consolidated its strength, until, before the nation woke to the magnitude of the danger, its serried legions were almost thundering at the doors of the Capitol. On every subsequent occasion of invoking active and efficient powers, whether in the recruiting of negroes, the enlistment of slaves, the suspension of the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus as against active sympathizers aiding the rebels or obstructing the Government, or in the enrollment and draft of citizens for military service, the Administration has had to contend against some adverse theory derived from constitutional construction. Now, when, in the exercise of that just measure of authority with which Congress is invested, it is designed to proceed further toward the suppression of re-billion by the forfeiture of the estates of those who persistently continue in defiance of the motions of a prescribed statute, we are again attempted to be frightened from the performance of our duty by the ghost of a murdered Constitution.

Mr. Speaker, the Constitution has been neither murdered nor emasculated. Engaged in a struggle for existence, I have yet to learn that there is any limitation upon the power of the Government to weaken the enemy, and render him less capable of continuing his assault upon constitutional liberty and the national life. I have yet to discover upon what principle an instrument, ordained for the preservation of the Union, can by the implication of a denial of power be converted into its permissive executioner. By that Constitution we are specially clothed with power to raise armies, to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, to make rules concerning captures on land and water, and to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and protect them against invasion. We are also vested with the capacity to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution these powers, and all others vested in the Government, or in any department or officer thereof.

This broad warrant of constitutional authority is ample for the exigency even of the suppression of a gigantic rebellion. The mode in which we shall act is not specified. With wise forecast the framers of the Constitution left to Congress the choice of the means necessary to be employed in any exigency. It is enough that they shall bear some relation to the end proposed. It has chosen to declare that to insure the speedy termination of the rebellion it will deprive the guilty agents of the means of carrying it on. It has vested the President with authority to seize, and clothed its judicial tribunals with power to condemn. It has done this by virtue of its sovereign power over its own guilty citizens. Who can deny its authority? Who can sit in judgment upon the exercise of its discretionary powers? He who expects to find in the Constitution specific rules for the conduct of a nation in a crisis like this, though he may be a learned man, can hardly be deemed a wise one. He who would place a limitation on the power of a Government to preserve its own existence and make that limitation the want of power to forfeit the estate of an armed rebel, lest that his children should be prevented of the inheritance of their father, though he may be never so sympathetic, can hardly be called just. He who construes the Constitution as authorizing against an insurgent population, banded for the destruction of the Government, only such measures of resistance or penalty as would be proper to disperse or punish a civic mob, has an inadequate conception of the scope of its powers.

"Hic unde vitam sumeret inscius, Pacem, duello miscuit."

Mr. Speaker, the people expect that we shall faithfully and firmly discharge our duty; omitting nothing, evading nothing, withholding nothing, but steadily looking to the utter and absolute suppression of rebellion; that we shall most speedily and effectively reduce the insurgents to submission, restore the active supremacy of the Constitution and laws, insure future tranquility by the extirpation of African slavery, the root of bitterness that has poisoned the fountains of our peace, and plant everywhere over the whole land the ensign of the Republic, the symbol of sovereignty and emblem of freedom, mightier than the red cross of England, holier than the labarum of Constantine.

Mr. FINCK obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules takes precedence.

THE ENROLLMENT BILL.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to say, before that motion is put, that the enrollment bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, amendatory of the Senate bill entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, was ordered to be printed a few days since. In that printing so many errors occurred in the arrangement of the sentences and otherwise, that it was found necessary to have the whole reprinted. It has now been reprinted, and will be furnished to members in a correct form, as reported by the committee.

I yesterday entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill was sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. To-morrow, when this printed form, as reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, is before the House, I shall move to take up that motion to reconsider.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion of Mr. MORRILL was then agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill of the House (No. 151) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, on which the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Chairman, while I would not like to retard the progress of this bill by the discussion of irrelevant matter, I regard early action upon the joint resolution for the termination of the reciprocity treaty as no unimportant matter; and, not knowing when the Committee on Commerce will be able to report upon that subject, I shall avail myself of the privilege of general debate, not yet closed, to present the views I had designed to, whenever the subject should be properly before the House.

The joint resolution relative to the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain was introduced by me for discussion and action now because the allotted time when the year's notice for the termination of the treaty can be legally given draws near, and because it is a subject upon which, however we may be divided upon other questions, I am willing to assume every member of this House will reach and act upon conclusions justified by sound statesmanship and supported by what I take to be the general voice of the American people, as it is not too much to take for granted that no part of our people are contented with the treaty as it now stands.

We are a nation of producers, and one of the paramount duties of legislators is to see that producers are profitably employed and have a market for their products. Now, more than ever, should exports be encouraged, and any excess of imports vigilantly avoided. But the treaty is framed on the idea that we are a nation of consumers, and therefore it gives employment, not to us, but to provincial producers. It furnishes a new market for the agricultural productions of the provinces, rather than for those of the United States.

The joint resolution is not moved from petty spite, engendered by the unfriendly sentiments which a few subjects of the British Crown have been recently so swift to avow, as it appears to me for the interest and reputation of both countries to maintain the cordial relations of perpetual amity and good will; but the treaty, whether viewed as a foreign or domestic measure, seems to have been equally impolitic. Beyond all cavil it has proved unfortunate as a contract, and to me it appears equally clear to be, so far as it is a positive or negative revenue measure, unconstitutional. Not only is it one-sided, and profitless to our people, but among its fruits we do not find any compensation of gratitude or increased respect for us on the part of the Government or of those of its dependencies most benefited, and our own self-respect requires its earliest termination. In the disposal of this and kindred questions, it is also time the authority of this House was asserted and vindicated.

The framers of the Constitution of the United States intended to place the power of taxation, whether external or internal, within the control of the House of Representatives, the most numerous legislative branch of the Government and most directly responsible to the people. With this view they copied a part of the unwritten constitution of England which has prevailed there since the time of Charles I, and is to this day more resolutely insisted upon by the House of Commons than any other privilege of liberty wrung from reluctant nobles or obstinate kings. Our Constitution declares that "bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives." Thus far the practice, so far as it technically relates to such "bills," has never been directly in hostility to this rule, although in 1856, under the lead of Mr. Hunter and Mr. Toombs, the Senate attempted to originate appropriation bills. These money bills were placed in the control of the Representatives of the people as an offset for the equal representation of States in the Senate. In bills of supply in the British Parliament, so jealous are the Commons, that in the preamble the name of the House of Lords is omitted—the enacting clause reciting the grant as wholly their own.

The originating power of taxation is indubitably placed in the House of Commons, which claims to have a fundamental right as to matter, measure, and the time. The exalted attitude of England, it is declared by British authorities, is mostly owing to this transference of executive power to the House of Commons.

On this subject it was intended to confer upon the House of Representatives power and responsibility which cannot be and ought not to be renounced. To Congress—not to the treaty-making power—belongs the power of regulating commerce with foreign nations, as well as the power to levy and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises.

I do not hesitate to say that commercial treaties, of the character of the reciprocity treaty, go far to wrest from the House its proper constitutional authority, and the coöperation of the House puts in peril the rule which is one of the prominent safeguards of American liberty. So long as external taxation, or a duty upon imports, or so long as internal taxation or a tax upon home productions, must be resorted to for the support of the Government, the House of Representatives has no right to surrender or even hold in abeyance any part of its legitimate functions touching the power of taxation. Such treaties obviously shackle us by engagements which preclude the free regulation of our domestic interests, however great the emergency.

The unlimited power of the British Crown to make treaties and to make war, places this question there, it is true, upon a different footing from what it rests on here under the Constitution of the United States. A treaty made only in behalf of colonies, also, is not the same as one embracing the mother country. And, furthermore, as a practical question in Great Britain, no other nation producing manufactures more cheaply, revenue from duties upon imports has become of trivial importance.

It will hardly be controverted that the House of Representatives should be free at all times, and especially now, to exert its just powers untrammelled by treaties and clear of encroachments upon the part of other branches of the Government. It cannot be for the interest of any department of the Government to see any other crippled or falling into disuse and disrepute, and it is in the interest of liberty that the rights and privileges of the House should be always maintained in full strength and proper proportions.

I have not time within an hour to even present all the facts at hand relative to the economical value of the reciprocity treaty, and therefore the constitutional question, save to a limited extent, will be left to abler hands, although I may say it is of greater importance than even the large economical interests involved. I may, however, be pardoned for recalling to the notice of the House some portions of the history of the treaty proposed, but not ratified, with the Zollverein, by Mr. Wheaton, (March 25, 1844,) and made on the basis of equivalent and reciprocal reduction of duties.

Although the President in his message announced to the Senate that it would be, when ratified, transmitted to the House of Representatives for its consideration and action, the treaty was rejected by the Senate, and properly rejected, on the ground, as stated in the report of the Committee on Foreign Relations, that it was "An innovation on the ancient and uniform practice of the Government to change (by treaty) duties laid by law."

And that

"The Constitution, in express terms, delegates the power to Congress to regulate commerce and to impose duties, and to no other, and that the control of trade and the function of taxing belong, without abridgment or participation, to Congress."

Secretary Upshur was not entirely unmindful of the rights of the House, as in his instructions he had directed Mr. Wheaton to proceed.

"Bearing always in mind that the sanction of Congress, as well as of the Executive, will be indispensably required before we accomplish the object in contemplation."

He ought also to have remembered that what one Congress might sanction another might not, and that one Congress cannot by its action deprive any succeeding Congress of its constitutional privileges.

If the treaty embraced subjects set apart and confided to the consideration of Congress under the express provisions of the Constitution, it would seem to follow that such a treaty would be void ab initio, for one House, or the Senate, is concluded from any exclusive control of these subjects. A power held by both Houses jointly can only be exercised jointly. The treaty-making power cannot set itself up as "supreme" to the Constitution. And where the subject-matter embraced is of the class which in its inception exclusively belongs to the House of Representatives or will trammel the exercise of the provision that "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," it is an evasion which only requires to be carried far enough to practically extinguish one of the plainest edicts of the Constitution, and would nullify that popular control which it has hitherto been supposed wise for the House to maintain over the purse-strings of the nation.

Such a treaty when ratified could hardly be made more valid by a previous transmission to the House for its action thereon. Their opinion would be entitled to the same legal force as that of any other equal number of equally respectable gentlemen, and no more. All the binding force of forms would be perfect without that courtesy and without their action. The fact of exceeding their powers by the Executive and Senate, the other high contracting party, unless first noted on their part, would not be bound to regard, and a non-fulfilment of the treaty would furnish sufficient reasons for reprisals, and in the sequel possible war. This is the construction given by our own Government, under General Jackson in 1831, to the treaty of indemnity with France for spoliations when the French legislative bodies refused or neglected to appropriate the amount of indemnity stipulated by the treaty. The only safe policy for the Executive of the United States in relation to such treaties is to renounce forever the power to make them.

It is not a little surprising that in 1854 the House of Representatives should have been less mindful of their own privileges than the Senate had been ten years before. The reciprocity treaty concluded with Great Britain went much further even than the proposed treaty with the Zollverein. While the latter only proposed a reduction of duties, giving and receiving supposed equivalents, the former struck off all duties from numerous and a very important class of products. The inconvenience of this treaty has been more or less dormant while our revenue was abundant, but when the present rebellion burst forth, and it became necessary to largely augment the resources of the Treasury, the inconvenience was demonstrated at every step. In the adjustment of the internal revenue, as well as the tariff, the hands of the Government were tied up. Large resources were utterly lost because the waste-gates in the Canadian frontier were open and could not be closed, at least until the treaty should be terminated. We had not only to forego revenue, abandon legitimate objects of taxation, but were compelled to make taxes more burdensome upon our own people in order to continue unimpaired the favors heedlessly lavished upon neighbors-in-law, whose friendship for the past few years, if it had been exhibited, might have been appreciated and proved current as some compensation for the pecuniary sacrifices made under the treaty.

The legislative action on the part of the House, perhaps, binds the good faith of the nation to the execution of the reciprocity treaty, though there is no more doubt of the power even to repeal the act which gives it vitality than of any other act of Congress. But its repeal prior to the expiration of the term as agreed upon, like a refusal to observe any other contract, might furnish good cause for complaint and damages on the part of the British authorities, as there is, unfortunately, too much evidence of the advantages accruing on their side with not enough of counterbalancing offsets to mitigate damages.

Under the stipulation contained in nearly all recent commercial treaties, to give all privileges subsequently granted to the most favored nation, it might be difficult to see why any nation with whom we have such treaties could not, by admitting free of duty the schedule of articles as named in the reciprocity treaty, legitimately demand equal favors. Such an expansion of the contract might not very much increase the exposure of our interests, as other countries are too remote to reap any considerable advantages thereby, but the entanglements of our diplomatic relations and of our revenue laws would be serious.

Complications sometimes arise by virtue of treaties not anticipated nor intended. When there is a conflict between a law of Congress and a treaty, the Executive practically decides the question at issue, and feeling more directly responsible for the latter as the "supreme law" than the former, sustains and executes, not the law of Congress, but the Executive version of the treaty. A signal instance of this sort is furnished by our treaty with Portugal of August 26, 1840. In this treaty we find the following words:

"No higher or other duties shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of America of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the kingdom and possessions of Portugal, than such as are, or shall be, payable on the like article, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign country."

In the tariff of 1842, two years later, specific duties were imposed upon wines, some of which were described by their common names and some with no other description than the name of the country from whence they came, at rates varying from six to sixty-five cents per gallon, and it was provided in the act:

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed or permitted to operate so as to interfere with subsisting treaties with foreign nations."

Soon after this tariff came into operation, Portugal, by her resident minister here, made representations that the law was in conflict with treaty stipulations, claiming the admission of her wines (Madeira and port) and those of her possessions, being higher priced than most other wines, at the lowest rate at which wine of any country or of any sort, no matter how paltry the quality or price, was or should be admitted. After protracted discussion by an eminent Secretary of State, it is curious to find that our Executive wholly abandoned the tariff law of 1842, so far as it related to Portugal wines, collected duties upon the Portugal construction of the treaty, and even refunded such duties as had been collected upon any other basis.

It should be admitted that the tariff of 1842 in some instances, barren as it was of any description save the name of the wine country where produced, was to a limited extent defective; but the pretension of the minister of Portugal that under the treaty the United States were precluded from levying specific duties upon wines, with rates according to their commercial value, on the ground that wine was a generic term, not divisible into species, and therefore embracing in a single word the weakest claret and the strongest port, "old Falernian," or such as will be improved when it is called vinegar, all equally alike, little deserved, it appears to me, the complaisance it obtained. If the Portuguese argument was valid, all our tariff laws have been at fault through their diverse classifications of coal, iron, hemp, and even as to carpets and other articles which might be easily cited, not unlike in name, but of widely dissimilar character and value.

The position of Portugal was and is wholly untenable, or would be were it not sustained by so respectable American authority. All that it is necessary for Congress to do in order to maintain its constitutional power, as it appears to me, is to frame a law descriptive of the class of wines it may be proposed to tax—not leaving it solely dependent for its nomenclature upon the name of the country from whence it comes, as that hardly concerns us in the adjustment—and a specific duty upon wines, with as many rates as sorts, if you please, may be imposed with propriety, without infringement of any treaty and with great benefit to the revenue. It may be added that it was possibly in deference to the Portuguese argument, to which our own Government had so patiently succumbed, that the tariff of 1861, if not that of 1846, did not secure more revenue from high-priced wines, and which seem to possess favor and flavor in the ratio of cost. It is some consolation, perhaps, that a considerable boon was yielded to an inferior and friendly Power and not to any menace. As it is, however, cheap wines are taxed too much and expensive or luxurious wines too little.

From the recital of this case it is plain that the power of the House of Representatives over subjects of taxation may easily be tampered with, circumscribed, and perhaps be gotten rid of altogether by the Executive and Senate, should they ever persistently combine for this purpose, and there appears to be no remedy. Having, under the forms of treaty-making, usurped the powers of legislation, the Executive might at once proceed to enforce that legislation as "the supreme law of the land." If it be admissible to regulate with one nation by treaty the rate of duties on imports, would it not be equally so to fix by treaty the rule of naturalization with any other nation?

There is something so attractive in the terms reciprocity, equality, and free trade, that our assent is yielded to measures which they are presumed to cover without antecedent inquiry or subsequent reflection, and it is only after a patient examination of the facts of history, the results of indisputable experience, that we become disgusted with terms which, if not invented for the purpose, mislead the understanding, and are made to mask a whole series of antagonistic principles.

What reciprocity is there in making cotton free to the United States from Canada when Canada produces no cotton? "King Cotton" was in no danger from long staple or short raised north of the forty-fifth degree. Whose ax is ground by making grindstones free to Canada from the United States, when the United States are mainly dependent upon the British provinces for their own supplies? What equality is there in exchanging the grain and cattle markets of New York and Boston for those of Montreal and Quebec, when the former in their normal condition are twenty-five per cent. better than the latter, and when the latter under no circumstances can be available to the United States? What is the advantage of free trade in lumber with a country whose forests are inexhaustible and "coeval with the world"? Who proposes to carry coals to Newcastle or donkeys to Spain? What is the advantage of free trade that does not include something we make to sell or something that somebody is ready to buy?

The facts set forth by the report of the Hon. Israel T. Hatch, after a laborious investigation, in relation to the operation of the revenue laws and the reciprocity treaty, communicated to Congress June 18, 1860, would have attracted more consideration but that it was manifest no change would be made until the expiration of the full term of the treaty. I shall reproduce some of these facts, with many others of later date derived from United States and British documents, but confining myself mainly to the trade of the Canadas, as our trade with these provinces is much the largest, and so are our complaints.

In the four years from 1850 to 1853, inclusive, the importations free of duty from Canada to the United States were $4,107,392, while the importations paying duty were $15,002,634, or nearly four times greater. But the importations free of duty, after the treaty took effect, in four years, from 1856 to 1859 inclusive, were $59,419,925, and those subject to duty had fallen off in the same time to $2,150,394, or only one in twenty-eight. This is the first exhibition of reciprocity.

In 1858, when the United States collected duties only on $313,953 in value of Canadian productions, those of American labor upon which duties were paid in Canada amounted to $4,524,503. This is the next exhibition of reciprocity, being on the scale of forty-five to one! During 1856, 1857, and 1858, the amount of American industry taxed in Canada was $18,294,293 more than that of Canadian productions taxed in this country. By the returns of later date it would seem that their trade has almost ceased to be a source of revenue to us, while from our trade they obtain their accustomed liberal contributions.

In 1856 the articles received from Canada, and made free by the treaty, amounted to $17,810,684; and if valued according to the prices actually obtained in our markets, doubtless the amount exceeded twenty million dollars. Had it been subject to an average rate of duty, the revenue would have been not less than three or four million dollars, and to that extent was mainly a bonus to the provinces.

By the treaty the ancient laws of trade have been subverted, and our exports to Canada, which formerly largely exceeded our imports, are now greatly less. They sell to us, but go elsewhere to buy.

Our domestic exports to Canada for a long series of years prior to the treaty were generally about double the value of our imports, and in addition our exports of foreign merchandise were sometimes equal and generally not less than half as much more. The relative position of the trade is now reversed.

The amount of goods exported to Canada in 1855 subject to duty was $11,449,472, and in 1862 no more than $6,128,783. The exports of manufactures, candles, soap, &c., to Canada in 1859 were, in round numbers, $4,500,000, and they had decreased to $1,500,000 in 1863.

The imports from Canada for the last eight fiscal years averaged in value $16,643,825, of which only an average of $467,488 paid duty on entering the United States.

Canadian tables show that for eight years, 1855 to 1862, inclusive, an average of $9,340,000 of our exports to Canada paid duty, and $10,720,000 were free. It will be seen that we are charged by them with duty on an average value of $8,725,500 more than they are charged with by us.

In the first four years after the treaty came into operation we received of the list of articles named in the treaty $28,771,691 in value more than Canada received from us. If this is reciprocity, the less we have of it the better. In 1861 the imports from Canada were $18,645,457, and our exports were $14,361,858, or an excess of imports over exports of $4,273,599. This amount is to be augmented by $2,611,877 of goods of foreign origin which merely passed across our territory and were transmitted in lieu of exchange or gold to meet our indebtedness, and would not have been received by Canada but for the fact that they were obtained cheaper thus than they could have been through the St. Lawrence.

The amount of our export of coin for this year I have been unable to ascertain, but Canadian returns credit us in 1862 with $2,530,000, and in 1863 with $3,502,180. That it was much more there can be no reasonable doubt. The fair inference would be that not less than $10,000,000 are annually drawn from us in gold, or its equivalent, to pay for agricultural productions not required, and to glut markets which our own people are all the while eager to supply. We have no reciprocity treaty with any other country, and no other presents so unfavorable a balance-sheet. Even our trade with China is more profitable.

That the profits of such a trade accrue to the Canadians is manifest, as it would be preposterous to charge a profit to the side of gold, exchange, or foreign merchandise. Thus millions annually are transferred from American to Canadian pockets. Is it wonderful that magnificent railway improvements cut their way through Canadian forests?

Considerable merchandise is also taken from the United States into Canada in bond, which does not figure in our tables of exports at all; and there may be, for aught I know, as there are few difficulties in the way, a corresponding amount smuggled into our ports from the Canadas, which of course does not figure in our tables of imports. The trade of goods in bond, which is no part of the reciprocity treaty, by the by, has grown to be large. It serves to pay off, as far as it will go, our indebtedness to Canada in lieu of coin. At one port, Island Pond, Vermont, the foreign merchandise in transit to Canada under bond in 1861 amounted to $6,608,509. It is remarkable that our domestic exports at the same point were only $219,746. These are in lean thousands, while the former, handled by us gratis, loom up in millions! Like the traffic of Falstaff, it is a "half-pennyworth of bread to an intolerable deal of sack."

The amount of revenue now collected by the United States upon importations from Canada is pitiable enough; and if we deduct the articles not actually there produced, we shall find that in four years, from 1856 to 1859, inclusive, the average amount was only on about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars annually, yielding not more than $25,000 of yearly revenue, and not sufficient to pay a tithe of the annual expense of the collection districts, scattered, as they are, along a frontier of six thousand miles in extent; and yet one fourth part, or nearly that, of all Canadian revenue is derived from duties on merchandise from the United States.

Neither our people nor the Government derive advantage from this reciprocity treaty. The trade has, it is true, largely increased; but the footsteps of the profits all point to the lion's den, none returning outward. We are the factors serving without pay or commissions.

When one nation admits cotton or any raw material free of duty, other nations are forced to follow the example, or cease to manufacture beyond their own consumption, unless they give an equal compensatory advantage upon exports. This policy has already made free of imposts throughout the world a large class of productions. They cannot be longer relied upon for purposes of revenue. Canada, like other countries, had and still has a large free list. What articles can now be exported to Canada free under the treaty had the same freedom to be so imported prior to the treaty, and mere self-interest would have compelled an adherence to that policy, whether the treaty had been made or not. We got nothing new on this score, but surrendered much. We conceded to them what we do not concede to others, but what was conceded to us was either not new, or conceded to everybody, treaty or no treaty. What we export free under the treaty, therefore, gives to us no special favor, as the Canadian markets are open to all the world for almost the entire list of articles named in the treaty, many of them being such, at the same time, as we levy or might levy duties upon when imported into the United States from other countries, and for which the provinces have no vent but in the United States.

The changes made in the Canadian tariff from the specific to the ad valorem system, and by steadily advancing the ad valorem rates of duty each and almost every year after the date of the treaty, were avowedly made not only for revenue but to favor British industry, which was reconciled to an increase of duties by a more exclusive enjoyment of the Canadian markets thereby secured. By having the dutiable value of merchandise estimated at the last port or place from whence imported, it was correctly supposed British merchandise would obtain the advantage of a duty computed on the naked valuation at home, with no addition for freight, insurance, exchange, or other charges—with the door open, also, for undervaluations—while American merchandise would be taxed on the value here at the very gates of Canada. A difference of perhaps twenty-five per cent. in favor of British goods, made by cheap labor and by the use of long-accumulated capital eager for safe employment at any price! How long American trade would thrive against such odds, when forced to pay twenty dollars duty where others pay only fifteen, was easily to be foreseen, and, no doubt, keenly appreciated.

It was thus Canada reversed its own policy, and turned its back upon that of the mother country, so industriously proclaimed for the last fifteen years, for the purpose of excluding American productions, as competition was mainly to be apprehended from this quarter. Not only were low duties exchanged for much higher duties, but a sound system was abandoned for a vicious one, according to British authority and practice, for the reason that (the reciprocity treaty having been secured) the old system might inure to the benefit of the United States and not of Great Britain. And this, I suppose, to adopt the language of the Canadian minister, is "only proof of the wisdom of the means employed, not evidence of a design merely to injure others." Great Britain could be benefited only by the exclusion of America; and thus it happened, from no design or ill-will, that America was excluded. It was not to rob Peter, but to pay Paul, that Peter was robbed! It is not wonderful that Canada earnestly seeks an extension of the reciprocity treaty, so felicitously improved, nor that her minister should denounce "the extreme folly of all those who would needlessly seek to disturb it."

When Canadian policy has been unequal to the work of securing further advantages, the mother country comes in as an efficient coadjutor. Under the treaty timber from the British provinces is admitted free; but Great Britain, when timber was sent there, maintained, until 1860, a system of differential duties in favor of colonial timber. They had a right to do this; and I only urge, while they act independently of us, that we shall act independently of them.

It may be suggested that action upon the tariff subsequent to the treaty by the American Government now precludes complaint, on our part, for the advanced scale of duties levied by the Canadian tariff. The facts, however, will not cover a resort to this argument. They had nearly doubled their tariff by yearly additions as early as 1859. We had reduced our tariff about twenty per cent. in 1857, and afterwards, it is true, it was increased, but not until 1861, when the Canadian tariff was still further advanced.

The tariff of 1861, approved by a Democratic President, was framed, firstly, to obtain a revenue equal to our expenditure, based on a scale of strict economy; secondly, to furnish a steady revenue, avoiding actual discriminations against and to allow some discriminations in favor of American labor; and lastly, to establish a principle that would enable the American importer to introduce merchandise with no higher payments of duty than those paid by foreign manufacturers or by foreign merchants engaged in the American trade. In other words, specific duties were adopted where ever practicable; but so far as the British provinces were concerned, this gave the man advantage over more distant countries, and was the very principle discarded by them, because of the local favor of which it was susceptible. It is a great though a common error to assume that this tariff fixed rates of duty much higher than that of 1846. It translated many of them into specifics upon an average value computed for a series of years, and restored many others to the same ad valorem points, with as many lower rates as higher, where they stood under the act of 1846. In the language of geometry there was only a change of terms, or the reduction of an uncertain quantity to an equivalent and certain quantity. Some additions were made to the free list, and in some instances a mixed or compound system—the specific and ad valorem combined—was adopted, but this system is regarded as most useful by both Great Britain and the Canadas. It was an effort to carry out the theory sanctioned by the experience of nearly all civilized nations who have adopted specific duties as the only mode of escaping from the perpetual variations and vexations of the ad valorem system; but the amount of duties to be levied was not, upon a general average, much advanced. The effect was to collect whatever in fact was levied. It computed the duty upon a just valuation, and that duty, always the same, was to be honestly collected of both the Jew and the Gentile.

It should be understood that any change in the United States tariff would not sensibly affect Canadian trade. All articles of the growth or produce of Canada, which she had to sell, were already free by the treaty, and would, therefore, be left untouched. Canada really produces little in the way of manufactures, and the treaty nearly covered all other exports they had from one extremity to the other. But it was far otherwise with the United States.

One of the arguments most persuasive to us at the time of the adoption of the treaty—always excepting the undeveloped good will—was the low rates of provincial tariffs; and this might have proved less potential but for the seductive entertainments, the bird suppers and champagne, which sometimes win their way where the diplomacy of arguments might despair. The wax on corks often has an intimate relation to the wax on parchments. I only mean to assert that secret service money, by the United States as well as by Canada, it is widely understood, was actively employed in bringing about the treaty; and if our share, as well as that of Canada, was not expended here, it is difficult to see where it was expended. It is a silly sheep that bribes the lion to a repast of mutton. The provincial appetite needed no whetting.

Of course it was neither suggested nor anticipated that the policy of specific or low duties might be suddenly changed, nor is the fact mentioned to reproach Canada with bad faith, but as a warning to such as have faith in further lessons of reciprocity.

The British provinces are not remote nor unconnected, and it would seem that we might hope from them sentiments of ordinary good will. If they were independent, and united or not united to us, we might count upon some positive friendship. But they touch us throughout the whole breadth of a continent, and they are yet merely in the rank of colonies, and being so their rulers appear to be more or less moved by selfishness and by that unceasing spur of an inferior with the rôle of a rival—jealousy. Their Government is less anxious to become the exponent of the voice of their own people than to echo that of a far-off ancestral aristocracy. We may wish it were otherwise, but a reciprocity treaty only aids to confirm such facts.

Other reasons alleged for the increase of the Canadian tariff are that the Government had embarked in extensive works of internal improvements—railroads and canals—and must have revenue to pay the interest on the outlay. In order that these might carry freight at low rates, or without tolls, the Government assumed heavy burdens, and now levies taxes upon their whole people for the benefit of freighters. The completion of such subsidized works, supported upon such national principles, is conclusive and inexorable upon the competition of private enterprise. Like the steam-vessels, to which the British Government pays subsidies, wherever they touch private adventures vanish and American interests are overmastered. Merchandise from the United States is taxed with increased duties to enable Canadian roads and canals to carry not only their own products, but to underbid for the carrying-trade of American products, and to work so cheaply as to deter and discourage rivals from springing up on American soil. They propose for a consideration to undertake our railway transportation at reduced rates, but at last we find the railway charged to us in a bill of items! I do not point out these things in the mood of wailing for wrongs, but to show there is a people across our borders quite as cute at a bargain, or in securing the mastery of accidents, as those who dwell on this side of the line. We must do our own carrying-trade on land and water, and not forget that one nation which builds iron ships imposes their construction upon others. It will hardly be said that Canada can better afford national subsidies to thoroughfares than the United States.

Our laws, which do not permit foreign ships to carry from one of our ports to another, yet permit foreign railroads almost an unrestricted enjoyment of the privilege so jealously denied on the ocean, rivers, and lakes. Thus, through our own laws and treaties, we seem to have been for the last ten years preëminently employed in building up the trade of a people who sell to us but who will not buy; who carry not only their own products to market but American, and who build their own ships and are eager for such an extension of the reciprocity system as will allow them to do the little shipbuilding and such coasting trade as may remain for American commerce. There is no labor from which they would not relieve us until they have relieved us of our gold.

Our position gives to us the carrying-trade over about one hundred miles of railroad, controlled by a perpetual British lease, and in whose prosperity no American has either a dime or a vote, from Portland to Canada line, which the giant corporations of the British provinces have anglicized and monopolized; and for this equivocal favor we have, with excessive liberality, allowed more than one thousand miles of Canadian railroads to successfully compete for the carrying-trade from one point to another in the United States.

The western, or agricultural States, have suffered through the operation of this treaty as much, if not more than any others, and have made least complaint. Their products are so immense that they do not miss what is filched from them by land-rats or water-rats. Such of the eastern States as fail to produce their own breadstuffs, or their butchers' meat, or their wool, or their horses, would not be likely to protest against supplies from Canada, and the consequent reduction of prices. The European markets present no opening to the United States or Canada for agricultural productions, except in seasons of deficient crops. The northern and eastern United States furnish the only reliable markets, year after year, for any surplus produced by even Canada, as well as the western States. For example, all the wheat and flour sent by the United States to England in 1858 and 1859 amounted to only $1,736,152, or less than half of the amount thrown into our markets from Canada during the same time, which was $3,665,502. There is no year when her entire trade with us has not been much greater than with all other countries.

The highest authorities upon political economy lay down the principle that, if there are one hundred stores or houses to be let in a city, when only ninety are wanted, the price of rents will go down, and the one hundred will rent for no greater sum than would the ninety alone. When there is not a market abroad and Canada becomes a competitor with the western States for the American markets a similar result must follow. The whole amount taken from Canada comes out of the price of the much larger amount taken from the western States, and no more is paid for the whole than would have been paid to the western States for their contributions alone. This influx of Canadian productions so far is a benefit to the Atlantic cities and manufacturing towns; but it is a benefit that rebounds to the injury of all agricultural districts, including western States, and which, fairly computed, would enable them soon to create for themselves means of cheap transit by land or water, rivaling all that appear across the line to have prospered at our cost.

But manufacturing villages and even cities can only prosper by finding an outlet for manufactures and the various articles which by the manipulation received in these places are prepared for sale, and Canada has no market for any such American productions. That is entirely absorbed by England.

It may be supposed that Chicago, the busiest city of the world, has a large interest in this trade, but the whole amount of merchandise received there under the treaty in 1862, was but $45,763, and of that $16,640 was brought by foreign vessels. In 1863 the trade was $58,238, and $27,877 of that was brought in foreign vessels. The same exclusion of American shipping interests tracks this trade even in the East. At Boston, of $1,330,781 of merchandise received in 1862, only $148,327 was brought in American vessels. At New York, of $636,891, only $22,592 was brought in American vessels, and in 1863 it was still worse, when out of $633,419, all but $7,831 came in foreign vessels. Such are the fruits of reciprocity!

The wheat which we send to Canada generally goes there to be ground, and we receive an equal or greater amount in flour, or it is merely there in transit for a market abroad. It is certain that it does not go there for consumption. Formerly we helped to stock the Canadas with horses, cattle, and sheep; but now they have an annual surplus of all these for which there is no other market than that of the United States. Can the western agriculturists prefer the prosperity of the British provinces to their own? Do they wish to grant such favors as shall leave Canada farmers no room for envy? Do they wish to create a rival for foreign emigrants? *†

* Extract from the Montreal Herald:

"There is no getting round our unfortunate geographical position; while at no time independent of our neighbors for a market, we are for five months in the year entirely dependent on them for a support. Fancy what the condition of the millers and farmers of western Canada would be today without the American market. What would become of our surplus products in the present absence of English demand? The statistics of the astonishing growth of our frontier trade since reciprocity, reveals to any administration disposed to use it, the power they possess over our progress, either for the purpose of snubbing England through us, or retaliating our want of sympathy and good neighborhood in this time of their discomfiture."

† Extract from an address of Hon. Isaac Buchanan, M. P. for Hamilton, Canada West, 1859:

"And Lord Elgin bribed the Americans by sharing with them our fishery and navigation rights to give us the reciprocity treaty, which while it exists removes the Canadian farmer's cause of complaint. Now, therefore, the preservation of this reciprocity with the United States is shown to be not only the interest of the farmers and through them of all others in Canada, but of the British Government, as without it Canadians are left in a position to be much benefited by Canada being annexed to the United States. I speak plainly, viewing him the most loyal man who speaks most plainly at such a crisis."

"And but for the most obvious providences, among which is the obtaining of our reciprocity treaty with the United States, the disruption of the empire would have been endangered ere now."

"The great practical end of all our efforts is to arrange that the Canadian farmer has nothing to envy in the condition of the American farmer."

The treaty as now developed totally ignores American interests; certainly the compensations received when found will have to be diligently sought for. If the rebels of to-day, animated by all their fiercest hate, were at liberty to bind us by a convention with their newly-found admirers, it might be found difficult to concoct an arrangement bearing the semblance of two high contracting parties, more detrimental to the interests of the United States, more wholly vicious toward the North and West, or more utterly valueless to the South.

In the abstract, no objection appears to the principle of reciprocity, but practically the treaty falsifies at every step the doctrine of its framers. A treaty possibly comprehensive enough in all its details might be made so as not to disappoint in its results either party who made it, nor be capable of evasion by either party through hostile legislation; but, with our recent experience, he would be a hardy statesman that should undertake it with a people who are proud to maintain a foreign "allegiance and affection," and whose utmost inclination must be to mete out no more to us than what is "nominated in the bond."

Commercial treaties for so-called reciprocal duties have been regarded by all writers upon the subject of political economy as hostile to free trade. They are certainly hostile to uniformity and to equality with all nations. They start with the idea of favoritism. To show preference by treaty or by law for one nation over another is to give them just grounds for complaint. The American mode of bringing about reciprocity and free trade has been by the admission of new States upon an equal footing with the old, and it was, perhaps, a legitimate mode, certainly not an unfair mode where all parties consented; but we have now no gifts of this kind to obtrude upon reluctant recipients, nor for even the warmest of suitors. Until the contest in which we are engaged shall be ended, it is unworthy of our dignity to proffer or accept of any new alliance. Proud of the past, we will not doubt the future. We stand up now to despise cynical criticisms as we shall stand hereafter to despise hollow congratulations.

When the reciprocity treaty was made, we seem to have forgotten the naval raid upon our fishermen two years before, and our ears were tuned to harmonies, to the interchange of acts of national kindness and increased neighborly intercourse rather than to the sharp advantages of commercial profits; but even in this aspect the treaty has turned out a melancholy failure. The perfume of sweet words quickly evaporated. The provinces, as represented by their mouth-pieces, were as eager for the wager of battle when the subject of the Trent came up as were the foremost among the representatives of England herself. They have greeted the traitors, embraced the pirates, and lauded the chiefs of the rebellion as heartily, and they sustained the British ministry as fully when British-built ships were permitted to go and make piratical war upon our commerce as the pro-confederates of England. Not content with the illicit trade, in violation of the blockade, in which they had embarked with a shameless greed, it is notorious that their accredited organs, while we were admitting provincial products free to our war markets, were vociferously sustaining the policy of the British ministry in letting slip the Alabama, Sumter, Georgia, and other piratical ships, to capture and destroy our peaceful commerce. They have smitten us severely on both cheeks, and there is no Christianity that requires an exposure to further blows.

I do not suppose a majority of the people of the provinces sympathized with these British outrages upon justice, decency, and international law, but no remonstrance and no petition has ever gone forth against those unfriendly manifestations from even Canadians, who are reported more friendly than the people of some other provinces, where descendants of Tory refugees have not yet buried the hatchets forged by their forefathers to stay the Revolution of 1776. They have not dared to be otherwise than dumb in presence of what they supposed might be the august public opinion of Great Britain.

As an American, whatever I may have thought heretofore, I declare that I have now no disposition to see the Canadas, with these recent evidences of their temper, annexed to the United States. They have played the part of subalterns so long that I am led to doubt their capacity for independent government. The task of State administration may be above their present reach. The mother country, with an enlightened self-interest, has often evinced a disposition to be rid of the charge of these provinces; it professes no high regard for their mixed population, who appear to lack the spirit to go through the door that is pointed out to them, and though told often that they are unprofitable servants.* Such a people can take time to cultivate self-reliance, to develop their own statesmen, and to create some feeling of independence before their alliance will be so esteemed as to be eagerly courted.†

There have been, it is said, no infractions of the reciprocity treaty, and none, it is believed, have been or are intended. This is much the stoutest defense of the Canadian minister of finance for all American complaints, and yet it is plain that Canadian policy has so manipulated its revenue laws, and its system of canals and railroads, with the collateral support of Great Britain, as to secure many and important advantages not dreamed of by our negotiators or by our people at the birth of the treaty. We propose to abide by it to the bitter end. Good faith requires nothing beyond. British subjects will have obtained for eleven years, by virtue of the treaty, the chief commercial advantages they must have derived as States of the Union without contributions of service, imposts, taxes, or good-fellowship. If they are to retain them longer, let us know the reason why! During this time, and for the first time in their history, they have become our peers in the ratio of increased wealth and population, and this mainly in consequence of our unrequited commercial hospitality!

The fact, if it be a fact, that such a treaty may be literally complied with, and yet in its operations may present so many subjects of discontent, is a strong proof of its fundamental impolicy. In spite of ornate pretension, each country, when put to the test, will seek to promote its own interests regardless of those of the other; and in the case of the provinces, colonial dependents, the next best friend to be next served is the mother country, to whom they owe an exhaustive "allegiance and affection," and to whom they look for military defense and protection against all foreign foes. Among the chief of such sinners, I am sorry to say, they are suspicious of the United States. The interests of Canada first, and of Great Britain second, will be, as they have been, studied and artfully promoted by all the means and appliances of adroit ministers of both countries, while the United States comes in as the goose to be plucked, and the lauded principles of reciprocity, like garments worn at court, will be, as they have been, laid aside upon the resumption of the ordinary business of life.

The Committee on Commerce (by Mr. WARD) made a very elaborate report to this House on the reciprocity treaty, (February 5, 1862,) wherein they argued that the grave faults already developed in the treaty should be remedied by a greater extension of the same system, even to the extent of the German Zollverein. Doubtless they had read:

"For shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
But drinking largely sobers us again."

This is good poetry, but I submit is not sound advice for us, though the Canadians reprinted and adopted the argument, rejecting only the conclusion. The principle of the Zollverein, or toll-alliance among several States, as to imports, exports, and transit, was a happy thought for the numerous but small German sovereignties with

* Those familiar with the tone of the London Times toward the Canadas will see that it scolds in the same imperious tone practiced by Burke in generations gone by:

"The province of Nova Scotia," said Mr. Burke, "is the youngest and favorite child of the Board of Trade. Good God! what sums the nursing of that ill-thriven, hard-visaged, and ill-favored brat has cost this wretched nation! Sir, this colony has stood us in a sum not less than £700,000. To this day it has made no repayment; it does not even support those offices of expense which are mis-called its government. The whole of that job still lies upon the patient, callous shoulders of the people of England."

† Extract from the Duke of Newcastle's dispatch to Governor General Monck, August 21, 1862:

"A country which, however unjustly, is suspected of inability or indisposition to provide for its own defense, does not, in the present circumstances of America, offer a tempting field for investment in public funds or the outlay of private capital. Men question the stable condition of affairs in a land which is not competent to protect itself."

similar peoples and no natural geographical boundaries; but it is not applicable to a great nation with a large territory, independent and determined so to remain. There could be no rule of division for revenues so obtained but that of population; and it is too obvious that the people of the provinces do not and cannot consume, per capita, anything like the amount of merchandise charged with duties consumed by citizens of the United States. They simply have not the ability to do it.

It is, however, idle to discuss this matter. The proposition of the Committee on Commerce has been before the Canadian Government, and while they want a chance to sell ships and a further share of our coasting trade, their conclusion was that the Zollverein is wholly inadmissible. Mr. Galt, "the minister of finance, to whom was referred the report of the Committee on Commerce of the House of Representatives on the reciprocity treaty," in his cautious report to his excellency the Governor General in Council, March, 1862, sums up the case as follows:

"The undersigned can have no hesitation in stating to your excellency that, in his opinion, the project of an American Zollverein, to which the British provinces should become parties, is one wholly inconsistent with the maintenance of their connection with Great Britain, and also opposed on its own merits to the interest of the people of these provinces."

After a response so explicit, I trust we shall not be so unwise as to press for a reconsideration of an offer we cannot seriously afford to make.

In the disposal of this question it is proper to consider all the advantages, directly or remotely derived from the reciprocity treaty. The chief of these, if any can be found, are supposed to relate to the fisheries. Prior to this treaty, we were confined to the stipulations of the treaty of 1818, having weakly surrendered our rights under the treaty of 1783, and this gave to us privileges only upon the coasts and shores within certain boundaries, while we renounced all claims to anything beyond. By the reciprocity treaty we obtained some privileges in common with British subjects upon the coasts and shores generally of British American possessions, and gave up to the common use of British colonial subjects similar privileges on our own coasts, shores, and islands north of 36° north latitude, mutually excepting shell-fish and the salmon and shad fisheries. The favors so exchanged were reciprocal and equal, unless the fishing grounds near the United States are the least productive; and however that may be, the fisheries of the United States, as a whole, have not acquired thereby additional prosperity. The exception of the shad and salmon fisheries gives to the provinces an entire monopoly of that trade; and yet our markets were made free, even for the fish we are precluded from catching! Here are free imports, and a decidedly fishy reciprocity. To the late-mackerel fisheries the treaty may have been of some service, and especially to that of Gloucester, which has increased; but in many places since the treaty the business has diminished and is slowly disappearing. Late in the season fishing near the shore for fat mackerel is indispensable to success; but the main catch is outside of these limits; and codfish is now mostly dried on shipboard, and then brought home to be cured. Provincial shores are therefore less needed than formerly. The provinces are allowed by the treaty to bring into our markets free of duties fish of all kinds, fish oil, and "products of fish, and all other creatures living in the water;" and it is this permission which supplants our fishermen, and robs them of their occupation.

The fish part of the treaty had been steadily refused by us when tendered alone or conjoined to other propositions up to 1854. The proposals made by Canada, from 1847 to 1851, for a "free interchange of all natural productions," were not accepted by the United States. The British minister in 1851 offered "if the United States would admit all fish, either cured or fresh, imported from British North American possessions in vessels of any nation or description free of duty, and upon terms in all respects of equality with fish imported by the United States," that they were prepared to throw open their fisheries, with certain limitations, to us, with a threat of measures to be adopted if no arrangement on the subject should be made; and this overture was also declined. Mr. Seward, in the Senate, agreed with the President that if anything was to be done, it should be by reciprocal legislation. (That, by the way, is our only true course now.) The provinces were disappointed, and, with the alacrity of those already scenting their prey, they obeyed and joined England in that stroke of policy—setting up a new interpretation of the treaty, excluding us from bays, and running the line of three miles from shore, not according to the shore line, but from headland to headland—to compel us in 1852 to accept of reciprocity, which resulted in the advent of a fleet of naval vessels to seize such of our fishing vessels as might pass beyond the new interpretation so suddenly and without notice to be enforced. They assumed to "hold us to our bargain," as they styled it, unless we consented to give them a still better one. War was played as a game.

Mr. Webster, then Secretary of State, in a speech made at Marshfield, said:

"The fishermen shall be protected in all their rights of property and in all their rights of occupation. To use a Marblehead phrase, they shall be protected 'hook and line, bob and sinker.'"

Who could have supposed that in two years (under a new Secretary of State) the reciprocity treaty would have been an accomplished fact, or that history would require the "Marblehead phrase" to be prefaced by the word gone?

It would be just to revive the rights so fully conceded to us by the treaty of 1783, which were secured through common treasure, and won more by the repeated prowess of our own people, in the days of our colonyhood, than by that of Great Britain, who often surrendered our conquests here to recover her losses elsewhere; and these rights permitted our fishermen to go wherever they had been accustomed to go. Anything less now would be un-American and fall short of our due. In time we may reach a higher plane when freedom of the seas will comprehend freedom of fisheries. No nation can have an inherent right to map off the ocean and claim exclusive enjoyment of any inexhaustible fishery.

To go back again to the treaty of 1818, as the worst possibility that might happen, would subject American fishermen to the inconvenience of keeping off three marine miles from shores to which that treaty gives us no privileges, leading to occasional disputes, and might prove an injury to the late-mackerel fisheries; but these evils are not wholly insurmountable and by no means of the weight of the general considerations exacted of us as equivalents. These would be the proper subjects for treaties and would be readjusted in some subsequent convention. It is no longer doubtful that our fishermen lose more from the free admission of fish from the provinces than they gain from the privilege of fishing inside of the line of three miles from certain shores. When the catch is short they make nothing, and when abundant the glut from provincial competition steps in between them and all legitimate profits. Besides the near-shore fishermen lose their hardiness and become idlers. Thus our people, renowned for their aptitude and success in securing "the wealth of the seas," behold their empire passing to the hands of strangers.

The lumber trade from the British provinces has given some commercial life to towns and cities where it might not without the treaty have been found, but even this is at the expense of American interests. The pines of Maine, of New York, and of Michigan must wait for the ax until the black forests of the provinces have been culled and exhausted. The timber lands of our own States, exposed to this unlimited Canadian rivalry, are indefinitely postponed, and will not be cleared and fitted for cultivation while timber at a less cost can be obtained anywhere this side of Labrador.

If the sources of our supply were again to be mainly confined to the United States, the prosperity obtained by even the local distributive points would not be lost though in some degree changed to other localities. An equal trade would spring up somewhere, differing chiefly in the sources of supply, and that difference would be a positive gain to the United States. It is also true that provincial lumber, if subject to a moderate duty, would not be wholly excluded, but would still float to a considerable extent to United States markets. Provincial lumber might be sold at home for a trifle less, or as much less as the duty, and would be offered here without any material advance.*

Looking at Oswego, the port where perhaps the largest amount of the lumber trade centers, and the fact is evident that it is mainly in the hands of Canadians. In 1862 there was $3,551,239 in value of merchandise received under the treaty free of duty, but of this more than five sixths, or $2,973,783, was taken there in foreign vessels. It was even worse in 1863. Of $2,627,723 then received $2,253,349 came in foreign vessels. Our export trade at this port and many others appears to be falling off. The exports to Canada of domestic produce in 1856 were $4,787,750, and in 1861 they were only $2,075,895. The exports of foreign merchandise in 1856 were $686,357, and in 1861 they were only $275,265. The domestic exports from Chicago in 1856 were $1,345,223, and in 1861 they were $352,343. The ports of Detroit, Oswegatchie, Genesee, Champlain, and other places present similar unfavorable comparisons. Surely the commercial interests have no reason to look upon such a trade with special favor.

By article four of the treaty, we have the privilege of using the Welland and all the St. Lawrence canals upon the payment of the same tolls as are or may be exacted of her Majesty's subjects, but with the right retained to suspend the privilege upon due notice. Except in time of war, when, of course, the canals would not be exempt from the law of the strongest, the Canadian Government from sheer interest would seek such patronage upon such conditions. Tolls would not be refused while the grist came to their mill. But, notwithstanding this provision, vessels of the United States have practically been made to pay ten times as much toll as Canadian vessels. This has been brought about by legislation, which provides that vessels producing certificates that they have landed and discharged their cargoes at Canadian ports shall have ninety per cent. of the tolls refunded. Provincial vessels, of course, naturally do this, but American vessels naturally do not. We use their Welland canal, and for that we are taxed as much as we should be if we used all their canals going to Quebec. What we want they tax heavily, but what we do not want they tax lightly. Here is a discrimination legally and dexterously made, which strikes a heavy blow against American shipping interests.

The only other advantage expected (but not realized) under the treaty that occurs to me was the free navigation of the St. Lawrence, for which we gave in return that of Lake Michigan. This might be desirable to complete the circuit of water communication, if we used it, but we do not; or if we had any interest in building up Montreal and Quebec at the expense of Portland, Boston, and New York, but we have none. In the first six years after the treaty only forty American vessels, all of small tonnage, passed seaward through the St. Lawrence, and of these but nineteen ever returned. But in one year (1857) one hundred and nine British vessels left a single port of Lake Michigan. In practice, British reciprocity is made up of similar unequal makeweights, and we may say of the whole as we do of this part with great propriety, we got a useless river by giving up a magnificent "inland sea."

If we examine the reciprocity treaty on general principles, as a question of constitutional, political, or domestic policy, the deduction is inevitable that it is radically wrong, unwise, and, under present circumstances, no longer to be tolerated. And if we analyze it in all its varied relations, patiently examining fact by fact, there will not remain enough of sound base to prop it up an hour beyond the period when it can be properly overthrown.

I could wish, in our great historic struggle in behalf of republican institutions and the triumph of world-wide liberal principles, that we were called upon to make some sacrifices on this question in acknowledgment of good-fellowship manifested by our younger brethren across the line, but among their Government organs and press

* Our consul at Bristol, England, September 10, 1862, says there is a deduction on railroad iron of six dollars per ton since the tariff (of 1861) passed, and he adds that crockery "can be purchased at a deduction equal to the percentage of the tariff. The same is probably true of cutlery."

we search almost in vain for any words of good cheer, though we go to Montreal, St. John, or Halifax. Exhibiting no affection, but clutching the commercial advantages of the treaty and flattering themselves that it must be perpetual, they became truculent and exultant in proportion as the rebellion seemed to prosper. If no reverses should befall us, they may be expected to cultivate a more placid temper. But whatever others may do, let us consult our own judgments, our own welfare, and soberly, calmly, and without a lingering regret request the President to give, at the proper time, the notice for the termination of the reciprocity treaty with Great Britain.

Mr. W. J. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to make some observations upon the late annual message of the President. What I think of it I shall say without prelude; what I believe of his notions and purposes will not be attended or followed by any cringing explanation or apology. I assert as my deliberate opinion that the message was prepared by the President and those who acted as his immediate advisers with direct reference to a prolongation of the war, and that this desire to protract hostilities has for its object no other or higher aim than the reprehensible and criminal one of reflecting himself President, continuing the present party in power, and protracting the existing reign of plunder and robbery. By his own words, and by declarations of his chief advisers, he stands convicted of criminal hypocrisy in regard to matters vital to the existence of the country; and now, having thrown off those restraints which were for a while imposed alone by his timidity, he unblushingly proclaims himself the arbiter of States, and assumes to deal with their governments and the rights and property of loyal people with a sway more cruel and despotic than is claimed for any monarch or despot in the world. Not content with violating his official and other pledges, and a total disregard of the platform upon which he came into power, he has usurped the forbidden powers of the Constitution, and assumes to deal with individuals and States as though they were the playthings of his malice or mere fields of plunder for his adherents.

I shall pass by the causes of the war. With the executive department in his hands, it proved inevitable. Though many believed that war, no matter how produced, would in the then condition of the public mind prove the grave of the Republic, yet when the dire necessity came a very large majority of the people accepted the issue which rebellion had tendered and lavishly offered their blood and treasure to the cause of the Government. And I assert that never, in ancient or modern times, were the issues of any war so clearly made or so sharply defined. On the one side was an open, bold, and organized resistance to the lawful authority of the Federal Government; on the other the military power of that Government was invoked for the purpose, the sole purpose, of putting down armed rebellion and enforcing its rightful authority wherever it had been obstructed or opposed. I repeat that this was the only issue, the sole purpose, for which, before the 22d of September, 1862, a million soldiers had rallied beneath the flag of the Constitution.

I said the President and his advisers had been guilty of willful deception. I will make good the charge. It is true that in the attempt I shall submit nothing which should be new to any member present, nor can I hope to excite even a feeling of shame on the part of those who, though subordinate in position, are in complicity with the President. Though less potential for mischief, there are present those who are blessed with better faculties and higher endowments than the President, and who are therefore no less guilty of the wicked purposes which I impute to him.

The object of war among civilized people should be PEACE. War as a means to any other end can never be justified. What, I repeat, produced the war? All men know it was armed resistance to the rightful authority of the Government. What end and aim did Congress and the loyal people propose when they authorized the employment of the largest armies of modern times? Let Congress, the Executive, and his advisers answer; and when they have answered, let the unerring facts of history brand them as false-hearted triflers with the lives of the brave men who are daily filling unnoticed graves; and let patriots everywhere who still love constitutional liberty rise up, and by the powerful engine of the ballot, which despotism cannot now wrest from them, hurl the present imbecile from power, and save the country, which at this moment is struggling in the agonies of eternal death. I omit, for the present, all reference to the President's inaugural. When it was spoken hostilities had not begun. I come down to a later day, to the first battle of Bull Run, at which time Congress was in session. Before this the war had been regarded by public men of "the last dollar and last man" persuasion, and by persons who, however unsound on Christ, were orthodox upon the nigger, as a mere holiday sport.

Buggies, hacks, gigs, Jersey wagons, mules and horses were in demand at fabulous prices; the road from Washington to Bull Run was crowded with Senators and Representatives, contractors and courtesans, eunuchs and strong-minded women, all intent upon witnessing the impending rout of the rebels. The sequel is known. The panic in this city among those who are now chiefs among the Loyal Leaguers will be long remembered by all who thought the public safety would be promoted by retaining a quorum of Members. When the panic was over and Beauregard had failed to occupy the capital, the House of Representatives adopted the following resolution, introduced by the venerable and patriotic Crittenden, now no more, with but two dissenting votes:

"That this war is not waged in any spirit of oppression, or for any purpose of conquest or subjugation, or purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of these States, but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired, and that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

Immediately after the passage of this resolution, every approach to the capital was crowded with regiments and brigades who had tendered their services in a war to be conducted for the holy purpose avowed in that resolution. So great was the rush to arms that, shortly thereafter, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate had to announce that more troops were being offered than the Government could accept. And much more than this, the Union men of the South were cheered and strengthened by this formal assurance that they had been right in defending the President when charged by the rebels with designing a grand John Brown raid upon the slave States, and the degradation of the whites to the level of the negro. A short time afterwards a similar resolution was submitted to the Senate by Andrew Johnson, of Tennessee, and, my recollection is, unanimously adopted. But a few days before this, on the 4th day of July, 1861, the President spoke to Congress as follows:

"Lest there be some uneasiness in the minds of candid men as to what is to be the course of the Government toward the southern States after the rebellion shall have been suppressed, the Executive deems it proper to say it will be his purpose then, as ever, to be guided by the Constitution and the laws; and that he probably will have no different understanding of the powers and duties of the Federal Government relatively to the rights of the States and the people under the Constitution than that expressed in the inaugural address. He desires to preserve the Government, that it may be administered for all, as it was administered by the men who made it. Loyal citizens everywhere have the right to claim this of their Government; and the Government has no right to withhold or neglect it. It is not perceived that, in giving it, there is any coercion, any conquest, or any subjugation in any just sense of those terms."

About the same time, a member of the Cabinet, Hon. Caleb B. Smith, since deceased, proceeded to Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, and addressed to the public the following cheering words:

"The theory of this Government is that the States are sovereign within their proper sphere. The Government of the United States has no more right to interfere with the institution of slavery in South Carolina than it has to interfere with the peculiar institutions of Rhode Island, whose benefits I have enjoyed to-day."

"But, my friends, during the last summer, when the great political contest was raging throughout the land, then it was that designing and dishonest men, for the purpose of accomplishing their own selfish schemes, appealed to the prejudices of the southern people, denouncing those who supported Mr. Lincoln as abolitionists; as men who would disregard the constitutional rights of the South, and transcend the powers of the Government. Excited by means of these iniquitous appeals, they were ready to take arms to prevent the inauguration of that President whom a majority of the people had declared to be the man of their choice."

"My friends, I have known the President long and well. It has been my fortune to be selected as one of his constitutional advisers. I have had the honor of being connected with this Administration since its commencement, and I tell you to-night that you cannot find in South Carolina a man more anxiously, religiously, and scrupulously disposed to observe all the features of the Constitution relating to slavery than Abraham Lincoln."

"My friends, we make no war upon southern institutions. We recognize the right of South Carolina and Georgia to hold slaves if they desire them. But, my friends, we appeal to you to uphold the great banner of our glorious country, and to leave the people of that country to settle these domestic matters according to their own choice and the exigencies which the times may present."

"Let New England rally promptly and earnestly, and I tell you rebellion will be crushed to the earth, and the stars and stripes will be raised over a united country. Then we shall have peace. Peace will spread her benign influence over this land, and happiness be restored, business revived, and the blessings of a free Government enjoyed."

"I do not invoke you to engage in this war as a war against slavery. We are warring for a different principle."

"It is not the province of the Government of the United States to enter into a crusade against the institution of slavery. I would proclaim to the people of all the States of this Union the right to manage their institutions in their own way. I know that my fellow-citizens will recognize that as one fundamental principle upon which we commenced this contest. Let us not give our opponents any reason to complain of us in this respect. Let us not bring to bear upon them the power of despotism, but the power of the people of a republican Government, where the people rule."

It was in this spirit, and about the same time, that Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State, issued his instructions to our representatives abroad, in which he directed them to make public avowal of the purposes which would control the Government in prosecuting the war.

In his dispatches to Mr. Dayton, our minister at the court of St. Cloud, he used the following language:

"The framers of the Government, therefore, placed the entire control of slavery, as it was then existing, beyond the control of the Federal authorities, by leaving it to remain subject to the exclusive management and disposition of the several States themselves, and fortified it there with a provision for the return of fugitives from labor and service, and another securing an allowance of three fifths of such persons in fixing the basis of direct taxation and representation."

"The condition of slavery in the several States will remain just the same whether it (the rebellion) succeed or fail. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail; for the rights of the States, and the condition of every human being in them, will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration, whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it shall fail. In the one case, the States will be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other, they would, as now, be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions in either case will remain the same."

"It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrages he has come into the Administration, has always repudiated all designs whatever and wherever imputed to him and them of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the Constitution and laws. The case, however, would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional, and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people."—Instructions to Mr. Dayton in 1861.

Mr. Chairman, I might consume my hour in producing the proofs of the falsehood and perfidy of those who thus deceived and betrayed the people of the North, and insulted and exasperated the Union men of the South.

What other evidence is needed of this shameless perfidy than the fact that the murderous adherents of John Brown, and the rebel adherents of Jefferson Davis were made glad? For so soon as the President avowed his purpose to change the war to one of crusade against slavery, of plunder and extermination, the apostles of Brown and the disciples of Davis were heard in mingled strains of joy and gladness. Each hoped and believed that the President had rendered a restoration of the Union impossible. Each being disunionists per se, each could afford to rejoice at every crime and blunder which paralyzed the arm of those who struggled and fought for peace and a reunited country. The effect of converting the war into a struggle for the freedom of the negro and the subversion of the slave States has unmistakably been to prolong and intensify the contest; and in that contest, while the South may be victims of the torch and the sword; while those who gladly welcomed the flag may be robbed of their property, and compelled to starve or swear to become the slaves of Lincoln, in the free and populous North the seeds of corruption and tyranny are beginning to bring forth their baleful fruits. Even here almost every house except the habitations of contractors and abolitionists has become the abode of bereavement, often of desolation; taxation is grinding all classes except the petted plunderers of the Government; and while national and individual bankruptcy is impending, a more terrible doom is apprehended and feared. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the elective franchise is endangered. We have seen the rights of the people usurped in Maryland and Delaware and in portions of Kentucky. We have seen their constitutions and laws suspended by the edicts of the President and his minions, the ballot-box trampled into the dust, and the slavish creatures of his favoritism foisted into office and honor, not to represent the interests or the voice of the people of those States, not to discharge the duties incident to the offices which they obtained by a combination of fraud and force, but to register and assist in executing the decrees of a master, whose slaves, violator of the Constitution as he is, they are totally unworthy to be.

When this terrible issue is presented to the people of the free North next fall, as I am sure it will be, then we will see the beginning of the end. Every barricade which cruelty or malignity may erect between the voter and the ballot-box will be removed; the corrupt instruments of so monstrous a proceeding, whether black or white, whether mere provost marshals or major generals, will find the people of one State, at least, more anxious to preserve the purity of the ballot-box than the carcasses of those who may seek to enslave them. The late message, fairly construed, amounts to an unblushing avowal of this despotic intent. It is true that the purpose is at present avowed with reference only to the rebellious States; but the President has assumed to attach a condition to the right of suffrage there, which he may at any time as rightfully apply to the State in which I live. I do not now discuss the terms which he offers to rebels in arms. The only answer most of them will make to his proposals is that of defiance. I allude to the fact that he denies the loyal men of the South the right of suffrage; and asserts that they who have committed no crime shall have no legal or political rights unless they will first subscribe to a degrading oath, an oath so slavish, that we may rightfully assume that it will be evaded or disregarded by many of those who may subscribe to its terms. But I ask whence comes the President's power thus to deal with loyal men who have violated no law, and consequently forfeited no rights of person or property? We can all understand how the loyal men of the South may lose their property. The armies which were created for the sole purpose of vindicating the law are stationed in the South; the President is "Commander-in-Chief," and he has grown fond of issuing imperial decrees which that Army is commanded to enforce. Almost every officer of independence of character, who has exhibited the slightest repugnance to executing his decrees, has, when blandishments failed to seduce him, been dismissed the service in a manner designed to insure his disgrace. Why, then, should the President fear to issue an edict as sweeping and unrelenting as the torch of Omar; and by which, at one dash of the pen, he attempted to destroy property valued at $2,000,000,000, and that, too, without reference to the sex, age, condition, or opinions of its owners?

The press had been muzzled; Congress had become the mere register of his will; the loyal people of the South were either within rebel or Federal lines. No protest would be heard or heeded, while corrupt creatures might everywhere be found to flatter the author of such unpardonable maladministration. Or why then should we marvel that he who affected scorn for the Pope's bull against the comet should now claim mastery over the minds and consciences of men; nor be deterred from demanding of those who execrate his name and memory an oath—a solemn oath—to be true to his bulls buried at sovereign States and the deep convictions of a majority of the people? I repeat that the President proposes terms to the loyal people of the South which all sensible men must know they will regard as degrading. The jackals who follow the Army for the purposes of plunder are no part of the southern people; and the Loyal Leagues which they may form within military posts I do not take into the account. Nor do I allude to those exercises upon the political and military system known as "military governors"—such adventurers upon the hazard of a terrible civil war as Johnson of Tennessee, and Hamilton of Texas. They have been selected, I suppose, to "govern" those who hate them, just as eunuchs are appointed to guard the harem. Each excites the disgust of those who are compelled to endure their presence.

But, Mr. Chairman, the highest degree of iniquity in the President's bull against slavery and State rights, is to be found, perhaps, in his requirement of the same terms of the loyal men of the South to retain their rights, as are tendered to the vilest rebels in the land as the conditions upon which theirs may be regained. Take, for example, the State of Tennessee. More than sixty thousand freemen of that State refused to vote for the ordinance of secession. About forty thousand voted against the secession of the State, although a large portion of it was occupied by rebel troops, and every means was used to overawe the people. That State has now one of its citizens upon the supreme bench. It has furnished over thirty thousand troops to the Government. Yet these soldiers, and other loyal people of that State, are to be disfranchised unless they will take the oath prescribed by the President for armed rebels. I repeat, if these terms can be imposed upon the loyal people of Tennessee by the President, why may he not require the same thing of the people of Illinois? Imagine, if you please, General Butler swearing in the chivalry in that hall at Charleston in which for so many days in 1860 he alone, of all the men of New England, voted for his friend Jefferson Davis for President, in the hope of defeating the great Douglas by dividing the Democratic party sufficiently to make a victory of abolitionism certain, and thereby furnish a hollow pretext for Davis, Yancey & Co. to secede. Or, if you prefer it, go to Knoxville and witness the ministrations of Parson Brownlow while swearing in the Union men of East Tennessee—the true Union men who refused so long to swear fealty to Jeff. Davis. They will hardly degrade themselves by kneeling side by side with their rebel persecutors, and swearing fealty to Lincoln and all his proclamations in regard to slavery.

There is a building in Knoxville, I am told, in which, in June, 1860, that revered champion of "Honest Abe" penned and published an appeal to the people of Tennessee to rally against Lincoln, the abolitionist, and Hamlin, whose color was suggestive of a "free negro." In that building we will imagine him holding his high court of political expurgation. We can almost see him now as he opens the proceedings with prayer. Behind the reverend operator in Greek and hell-fire may be seen the heroic but saintly face of Horace Maynard, while the martial form of Brigadier General Andrew Johnson, in full military dress, glows as brightly as when he wrote his letter to Abraham, assuring him of General Bull's treason. We can almost hear them now calling for mourners, and administering Lincoln's oath. No doubt those sturdy mountaineers will on bended knees solemnly swear to "abide by and faithfully support all proclamations of the President made during the rebellion having reference to slaves." Mr. Chairman, at any other time such mockery would excite only that pity which we feel for the mummeries of the insane, and that contempt which fills us for those who engage only in works of sacrilege. But the times are too perilous, the issues too grave, to be passed thus lightly by. And this is the medicine, this the great panacea which is offered as the restorer of a dismembered Union! And there are those who profess to find in this silly proceeding a "wise plan" for bringing peace to a distracted and bleeding country. It does not rise to the dignity of respectable madness; it is too weak and contemptible for the epithet of imbecility. Sir, by what process are freemen not in the land or naval service of the country to be deprived of life, liberty, or property? Before the Constitution became obsolete the answer would have been, only by "due process of law" after "presentment or indictment of a grand jury." But in this age of political prostitution and indiscriminate robbery, we find that estates are confiscated without indictment or trial, and, finally, the right of suffrage, the surest safeguard and final defense of a free people, is to be taken away by one who, beneath all the usurpers he would imitate in everything save in his disingenuous spirit. The usurpation is too monstrous to be defended by any one who has just claims to manhood, and in fact I am persuaded finds but few defenders save among the corrupt and slavish menials who are unfit to be free. And this is the man whom my colleague [Mr. ARNOLD] associates in argument with the Saviour of mankind. He reads an extract from the irrepressible conflict speech which Lincoln made some years ago, and exclaims:

"This, the first emphatic enunciation of the philosophical fact of the antagonism between liberty and slavery, the eternal and 'irrepressible' conflict between them, electrified the country, and made Abraham Lincoln President of the United States."

"When the Son of God proclaimed a common Father and the universal brotherhood of man, He enunciated the great moral principle which brought on the irrepressible conflict with slavery."

Here he informs us that Christ only "enunciated the great moral principle which brought on this irrepressible conflict," while it was reserved to Lincoln eighteen centuries thereafter to make "the first emphatic enunciation of the philosophical fact of the antagonism between liberty and slavery," which he graciously tells us "electrified the country and made Abraham Lincoln President of the United States." I protest against this robbery of the illustrious dead. What will John Brown's ghost say when that apostle of bloody pikes finds himself thus unceremoniously kicked out of the company of Christ to give the seat of honor to the saintly form of Abraham? What will Jennison and Montgomery say? Lincoln had not so much as burned a barn upon the Missouri border, when saintly freedom-shriekers, now occupying high stations, civil and military, were holding up their bloody hands for favor at the orgies held over successful robberies, murders, and assassinations. What will Fremont and Hunter say? It was they to whom was first revealed the saving grace of proclamations of freedom. What will some of the sanctimonious constituents of my colleague say when they remember their pious pilgrimage from Chicago to Washington; and how, while they implored a proclamation in the name of God, Abraham was too carnal-minded to grant it? What will be said by the bolder pioneers in the "irrepressible conflict" who are now languishing in the penitentiaries for negro-stealing? They were brave enough to commence the work of emancipation without purse or scrip, each for himself, and solitary and alone, while Abraham could not come up to the good work until he thought himself backed by an army of a million of armed soldiers and sustained by the prayers of whole divisions of contractors and contrabands. If any one is to be placed before Christ, let it be John Brown or Montgomery or Jennison. Even my other colleague from the Bureau district [Mr. LOVEJOY] has antecedents in this regard entitling him to a higher seat than our distinguished Chief Magistrate. Seriously, Mr. Chairman, when my colleague [Mr. ARNOLD] again proceeds to enlighten us as to the pedigrees of these illustrious reformers, I hope he will reconcile the command of our Saviour, that servants should be "obedient to their masters," with the injunction of Brown, Lincoln & Co., which requires masters to be obedient to their slaves. But a few days ago, a Norfolk correspondent of the New York Times wrote as follows in regard to a negro raid which General Butler caused to be made into North Carolina:

"The material results of the raid may be summed up as follows: Between two and three thousand slaves were released from bondage, with whom were taken along about three hundred and fifty ox, horse, and mule teams, and from fifty to seventy-five saddle-horses, some of them valuable animals. The guerrillas lost thirteen killed and wounded; ten dwelling houses, with many thousand bushels of corn belonging to them, were burned, besides two distilleries; four of the camps were destroyed, and one of their number was hanged; and one hundred rifles, uniforms, infantry equipments, &c., fell into our hands as spoils, with a loss on the part of the brigade of twelve killed and wounded and one man taken prisoner. Besides this, fourteen rebel prisoners and four hostages were brought in."

"In regard to its moral and political results, however, the importance of the raid cannot be overestimated. The counties invaded by the colored troops were completely panic-stricken. Scores of families, for no cause but a guilty conscience, fled into the swamps on their approach. Never was a region thrown into such a commotion by a raid before. Proud scions of chivalry, accustomed to claim the most abject obedience from their slaves, literally fell on their knees before these armed and uniformed blacks and begged for their lives. I was frequently asked how I, a citizen, dared to trust myself among such incarnate demons. 'What shall I do to be saved?' was the question asked on every side."

Mr. Chairman, the faith of any one must be weak indeed if, after reading the many glowing accounts of expeditions, of which this is a specimen, they do not regard the war as over, and the people of both sections ready to embrace and forgive each other. We are told that the guerrillas lost in killed and wounded the immense number of thirteen, while our victorious army burned only ten habitations! But the greatest satisfaction is felt when we are assured by the writer that "in regard to its moral and political results, however, the importance of the raid cannot be overestimated." Certainly they cannot. "Scores of families," "fled into the swamps on their approach." The President, no doubt, feels well assured that those "proud scions of chivalry" who so abjectly "fell on their knees before these armed and uniformed blacks and begged for their lives," exclaiming "What shall I do to be saved?" will not hesitate in the presence of these armed negroes to take the oath he has so magnanimously prescribed. Of one thing, that they will keep an oath administered under such circumstances, he can feel no doubt. His rigid adherence to his own oaths will cause him to suspect no mental reservation in others. This raid, Mr. Chairman, is but a specimen of the movements which have characterized many of our military operations during the past year in the valley of the Mississippi, and especially in the department of the Gulf. Plunder, wholesale and indiscriminate, upon the loyal and disloyal alike, if we may believe the correspondence published in our own papers, and information derived from other reliable sources, has been so common and conducted upon a scale so vast that it has become no longer a matter of surprise. It is perpetrated in every form, under the semblance of trade regulations, impressments by pretended levies upon the disloyal, and by military orders which afford sufficient pretexts for those whose choice pursuit is plunder. It is true that we hear occasionally that such men as Butler and Curtis have been suspended; but the hungry cormorants who seek plunder, and know they can obtain it under the auspices of such men, are not long in having them restored to commands where their cupidity may be gratified. The robberies under the reign of Butler at New Orleans have been so palpable as to shock the sensibilities of mankind. No prize was too great, no inducement too small for his enterprise. From the State capitol to the graveyard, from the parlor to the kitchen, his grasping hand was extended. All accounts agree that things have been done at New Orleans under the flag of our country which if not disavowed will disgrace the Government in all coming time. I will mention one instance as it was published in the New Orleans Era. That paper is the organ of the Administration there—the most of its articles are headed "by authority." I will read the Era's report. It is in the following words:

"CONFISCATION OF TOMBSTONES.

"There was one splendid monument—a stately column or pyramid, intended to mark the spot where rest the remains of Colonel Charles D. Drexel, the youthful orator who fell early in the war in command of a confederate battalion. This was constructed at a cost of $1,500, and under the hammer of the auctioneer it brought but $100. Cheap monument, if the purchaser intended it for his own tomb. There was another monument equal in size and beauty which brought only thirty dollars. Tombstones sold as cheap as marble."

The whole world is familiar with the plunder of costly mansions and large estates, with robberies of churches and public institutions. From these we turn to the public sale of a dead man's tombstone. Nothing seemed too high or low for the robber's grasp. The result is that, instead of a restoration of law and order, the country occupied by our armies has in many instances been given over to pillage and plunder; and they who watched the approach of our proud old flag as the harbinger of peace, look now only upon a ruined country and a pillaged people. The just and considerate portion of our people will remember the barbarities, the shameless robberies of this man who so suddenly rose from the ranks of his original secession friends to the grade of major general of volunteers; nor will they forget that his fame rests more upon his persecutions of the unarmed and unoffending than the terror he has caused among the rebels in the field. It is now nearly three years since he donned the Federal uniform. During that time he has planned Big Bethel and other similar disasters; but he has never, I believe, been in personal danger, or a party to the most unimportant skirmish, although by alleged violations of the laws of civilized warfare he has won for himself the outlawry of our enemies. This has been his chief military distinction; and now, after a year of repose in New England, we find him appointed to an important command in Virginia and North Carolina. With a cruelty quickened by public exposure, with his avarice stimulated by the success of former pillaging, and with a slavish subserviency to those whose motives he denounced for many years of his life, he is turned loose upon a rebellious people, who, whatever their sins may be, are at least sincere in regarding him as a monster. And when a few days ago a member from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] submitted a resolution calling for a committee to inquire into his conduct, the Republican members of this House, aided by one of the President's military appointees from Kentucky, [Mr. ANDERSON,] voted to suppress the investigation; and it was suppressed, and this man whose career is coupled with so many crimes is assured of immunity, and launches again with renewed license upon additional fields of plunder.

You may declaim as you will of your anxiety for peace, but with the President's programme of subjugating whole peoples and subverting the governments of States, and with such men as Butler despoiling whole communities in the name of confiscation, we cannot believe you sincere; and if sincere, it but demonstrates the utter unfitness of the party in power either to conduct the war or administer the Government in times of profoundest peace. I know that in calling attention to these things I shall be accused by paid officials and hired sycophants of sympathy for the rebel cause. The fate of all who have hitherto spoken boldly of the public peril, or dared to arraign the motives and conduct of the Administration, warns me that I need not hope to escape the tide of calumny which is ever in reserve for the defenders of constitutional liberty. I have counted well the cost of these things, and am prepared for the onset. Claiming to be a Union man, I am so unconditionally. I have been so consistently and persistently ever since the firing upon Fort Sumter, whatever censure I have cast upon those who could and ought to have avoided the war; and here in my place do I arraign the President and the supporters of his insane policy as willing or mistaken instruments of disunion. Doubtless some are so, because they do not perceive the fatal tendencies of the policy to which they adhere; but the contest is now no less with armed rebels than with those who avow their purpose to change or destroy that Union which is the creature alone of the Constitution. They are, wherever found, traitors of the basest kind. Destitute, as they know themselves to be, of principle or personal courage, they are prompt in the presence of provost marshals and military guards to eject their spleen upon those who adhere to the Constitution. They are imperious and insulting now because their master is near; but their cowardice is too patent to be disguised, and the "stop thief" cry of treason which they impute to others will not always shield them from personal exposure and chastisement.

Those who are now loudest in shouting "loyalty" have spent long years in teaching treason to the people of the North. Their personal cowardice alone restrained them from open rebellion, but their teachings and principles were in all respects as treasonable as the ravings of the vilest secessionists in the land. Chase, Sumner, Phillips, Beecher, Wade, Fred. Douglas, Seward, John Brown, and most other representative men of the Republican party, have advocated the higher law doctrine of rebellion for the last ten or fifteen years, and one of them has had the courage to make practical application of his principles. I allude, of course, to John Brown, who suddenly rose from the level of a horse-thief to the dignity of a Republican god, and who is now accepted by the President and his adherents as the prince of Republicans, a type of the true Christian reformer and "loyalist." I, sir, denounce the heretical teachings which caused John Brown to make his murderous foray upon Harper's Ferry, just as I do the rebellious teaching which caused the attack on Fort Sumter. Brown acted under a provisional government in antagonism to that of the United States; so did Davis and Stephens; Harper's Ferry belonged to the United States, so did Fort Sumter; Harper's Ferry was retaken by the military forces of the United States, Fort Sumter should have been reduced long ago; it would have been, had operations there been directed to a reduction of the fort instead of establishing free negro colonies at Hilton Head and Port Royal. John Brown was made prisoner, tried for murder and treason, found guilty, and hanged. Davis may be when he is captured or surrenders. Who, then, I ask, dared openly defend the crimes of John Brown? Only a few of the bolder fanatics who, like Wendell Phillips, had avowed themselves disunionists from the first. Who sing hosannas to his memory now? At least three fourths of the Black Republican party, and the whole of that numerous class of paid stipendiaries and placemen who disgrace the press and the offices of the country. The rebels have never showered half so many honors upon their dead or living leaders as you have upon this old murderer whom you venerate simply because he was a traitor.

The soldiers who volunteered for the sole purpose of putting down rebellion and vindicating the law are often forced to march among the women and children of the South, who are too often insulted and plundered by the bad spirit and pillaging propensity which seem to enter so largely into the policy upon which this war is to be conducted; and they who impatiently listened for the airs and anthems which once told of union and nationality, often hear only from negro soldiers doggerel praises of John Brown and his murderous crew. The uniform which is the badge of a gentleman and the ensign of honor is worn now by depraved negroes whose instincts are almost as low and brutal as those at whose instance the profession of arms has been disgraced. The proud, brave, and patriotic white soldier, who left home, family, business, and everything in order to fight for and, if necessary, die for a restoration of all the States to the Union, is, by the present military policy, degraded to a level with the ignorant and brutal negro; and if he complain, is punished, and his officer who may chance to share with him in his complaints is dishonorably (that's the word they use) dismissed the service. And these things, Mr. Chairman, are done by those intolerant zealots who would brand the defenders of the Constitution with such epithets as "traitor," and "copperhead!" I repeat, sir, I am among the unconditional Union men of the country.

Jefferson Davis and his adherents who sought to destroy the Union by dismemberment are traitors to the Constitution; but they were bold enough to avow their purposes, to appeal to the sword, and risk the dreadful consequences of their crimes. Their followers may have been wicked or misguided, but they made the issue boldly, and have so far met the consequences, like brave and fearless men. I repeat, they are traitors; and to the laws of war first, and of the United States afterwards, they are amenable; but they are not the only traitors to the Constitution with whom we have to struggle. They may be honest and misguided, but throughout the entire North they are numbered by the thousand and tens of thousands; and here, here among the representatives of the people, are to be found dozens and scores who are as disloyal and treasonable to the Constitution as the oldest and most hardened rebels in the South. It is with you as well as with the rebels of the South that the unconditional Union men have to deal. Jefferson Davis professed to be a Union man, but only upon his terms; but the unconditional Union men of the country rejected his conditions, and pointing to the Constitution they said, "We will have no terms but the Constitution as it is, no Union but that which it made." Sumner, Chase, Lincoln, Beecher, and all the leading spirits of this Administration profess to be Union men; but like the original secessionists of the South they are so only upon their own terms. What are those terms? Indiscriminate robbery by military confiscation, and the subversion of the governments of almost half the States of the Union; converting them into territorial dependencies, changing the whole structure of the Federal Government, and ruling millions of people by standing armies and the sword. Such men, I repeat, are disunionists. Too cowardly to avow their purpose at the beginning of the war, they now seek to use the men and money which were given for the suppression of the rebellion to overthrow the institutions which all departments of the Government stood pledged to maintain.

For myself, while I reject the terms of the reb-

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 29, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 25.

els, I turn with equal disdain from the no less reasonable conditions of those who seek unconstitutionally to overthrow the rights of individuals and of States. In my opinion, those who adhere to the cause of Jefferson Davis are no more reasonable in their aims than those who would apotheosize old John Brown, or join Fred. Douglass and Sumner in their schemes to annihilate the States of the South and obliterate them from the map of the world. Upon this issue, thus forced upon the loyal people, the battle of the Constitution is soon to be fought. Upon the result hangs a nation's existence. The forces are being marshaled for the fray. The ides of November will end the throes and agonies of an imperiled country, or the dead corpse of the Constitution and the liberties of the people will have found a sepulcher. The issue is vastly more important than the gravest which has yet been submitted to any portion of mankind. Trained, as I have been, to be ever hopeful of the good fortunes of my country, I will not now despair. The frightful corruption and bold usurpations of this Administration I will hope have not affected the integrity and patriotism of the mass of the people. This Capitol, from whence the stream of profligacy, venality, and corruption is issued, I trust is not at all symptomatic of a general relaxation of public morality. Always confident of the honesty and intelligence of the people, I will not despair of them now when such momentous issues are at stake. Knowing as they do that all our past greatness and glory resulted from adherence to the Constitution, they will cling the more closely to it now when dangers are thickening on every side. Their forbearance will be sorely tried. Every obstruction which usurpation can erect will impede their efforts; but they will never yield the right of suffrage while life remains. In every northern State, with two or three humiliating exceptions, a majority of the people are lovers of the Union, and will array themselves upon the side of that Constitution by which it was made. Amid long suffering they have exhibited patience; should force be invoked to drive them from the polls, they will manifest the spirit of men who know their rights and have the courage to maintain them. They have been already warned, and being warned they will not wait to be told to prepare. They are ready now; impatient for the hour when, with that weapon which is "formidable to tyrants only," they may speak peace to an agonizing people, reunion to a torn and dismembered country.

And why, I ask, should not the people everywhere array themselves upon the side of the Constitution? Those who talk of peace upon any other terms than the preservation of the Constitution, pure and simple, and a reunion of the States under it, are traitors at heart to that instrument, with whom I make no terms here or elsewhere. Upon all such, arguments are thrown away, but the people, the real people everywhere, those upon whom the burdens of the war fall most fearfully; whose industry is paralyzed by taxation, and whose homes, day by day, are being desolated, are impatient for the end of this unnatural struggle. It would be ended before the return of spring if common sense were allowed to control our rulers for a day. The people are not unmindful of the blessings of peace; they have felt the horrors of war; and they know that any peace, based upon the supremacy of the Constitution and followed by a reunion of the States, will be no less honorable to themselves than beneficial to them and their posterity. But the subjugation and degradation of five millions of free men cannot result in peace. A temporary truce you may have; a sullen silence may reign in a land made desolate by fire and sword; the hoof of the Federal horseman may press every foot of rebel soil, but there will be no peace. It will be a nation of permanent malcontents; and while the hand of social and political inequality rests upon them, the fires of vengeance will burn in every heart, and the flames of rebellion will again light up the land. None of us need be ignorant of the temper and character of the people who are in arms. They are of the same race as ourselves. They were born free, and have been taught principles of Anglo-Saxon liberty in the same schools with us. While we may abhor the treason which first impelled their leaders and deplore the delusion which nerves the arms of their followers, we cannot shut our eyes to the fact that the great body of them have been sincere. It is evidenced by their patient endurance and terrible courage, their trials and sufferings, and the tenacity with which they cling to a desperate contest. I am not alone in this estimate of rebel heroism. I will remind those who declare it reasonable to find anything to admire in the character of a foe, that more than I have said was admitted during the last year by one sufficiently fanatical to pass as orthodox, even among contractors or contrabands, Loyal Leaguers or Free Lovers. During the last year the Reverend Henry Ward Beecher published an article in his newspaper, the Independent, in which he said:

"In another column of our paper Mr. Greeley expresses his opinion that the war draws to a close, and that this year will probably see it ended. He does not give the facts on which such judgment is based, and it must be regarded as the impression produced by the whole course of events, and their present condition, upon his mind.

"But judgments of this kind are but little more than the reflection of personal temperament. Opposite opinions will be formed, in view of the same facts, by two men equally wise, simply because one is sanguine, and dwells upon the hopeful aspects, while the other, cautious and slow of belief, weighs the difficulties and dangers.

"We can see how the war easily might be short, and that it may be near its close. But we see with equal clearness that it may be protracted for several years to come. Nor is it in the power of any man at present to judge which of the two possible courses events will follow.

"We see no substantial evidence that the South is yet discouraged. What legislature, convention, or influential man, even, has uttered a desponding word? The spirit of the people is not broken. With a few exceptions, the intelligent prisoners who are taken hold one language, and that is of firm, resolute, bitter determination to resist to the uttermost. Nor can we learn that those who stay at home, and who suffer great deprivations, are weary or discouraged. Even when hunger drives women to riot and violence, it is remarkable that they demand 'bread,' but never 'peace!' Indeed, we are free to say that we cannot repress our admiration of the conduct of the southern people in this terrible struggle. It needs only a worthy cause to be regarded as heroic. They seek to establish a detestable system of slavery. They seek for that end the overthrow of a beneficial Government. Their cause is as bad as it well can be. Nevertheless, they have given up all things for what they regard as their country. They have relinquished luxuries, submitted to hardships, suffered bereavements and losses, not only without murmuring, but eagerly; and after two years of trials that may be said almost to have revolutionized the interior of southern society, and reduced them to the minimum of comfort, they are undiscouraged. They are even more fierce and bolder than ever."

Sir, every candid man knows that this is a correct representation of the spirit of our enemies. It is still unbroken; and if this Government persists in rejecting those moral agencies which should accompany the sword, other sanguinary battles must be fought, in which the slaughter will be commensurate with the heroism of the combatants. That heroism is the birthright of all American people. Do not wisdom and humanity require that such a people should be won back to allegiance rather than driven to that resistance which is the desperate offspring of despair; and that our own brave soldiers should be restored to their families and friends, rather than be further sacrificed to the designs of those who would protract the war for plunder or power? Each party to the contest has exhibited that courage and endurance which will illustrate our annals in all coming time. Each can boast of its heroes. I would to Heaven each had fewer martyrs to mourn. Everywhere the prayers of millions are being offered up for a return of peace. There is scarcely a rude hamlet in the land in which the cry of sorrow is not heard; not a household without its seats made vacant by the destroying hand of war; not a village which is not shrouded in the drapery of woe, because of sons and brothers, husbands and fathers, numbered among the absent or slain. Are not these things alone sufficient to incline our hearts to peace, and to cause us to seek it wherever it may with honor be found? He who in this hour of impending peril refuses to hear or heed the wail of lamentation which comes up from the hovels of the poor and unoffending, or to avail himself of every honorable means to stay the further effusion of blood, is a wretch unfit to live and too base to die. If asked how I would stop the war, in a manner honorable to my country, I would answer, cease robbing whole communities, cease your vandal attempt to melt all mankind of every race, color, and condition into one crude, inorganic mass; cease to spurn the counsels of the Union men of the rebellious States; cease to place them upon a footing with traitors and rebels; cease to regard non-combatants, women and children, as alien enemies fit only to be plundered. Place your armies under the control of those who war only upon armed enemies, and who will make the flag of your country a sure protection to all who, during the long night of rebellion, have so eagerly watched its coming. Let your only object in fighting be, and so declare it to the world, to put down rebellion, restore all the States to the Union, protect and defend the Constitution with all its guarantees. Let your President annul those proclamations which stamp him as a usurper, and offer amnesty and pardon in good faith to all who will lay down their arms and take an oath to support, not his free-negro proclamations, but the Constitution of the United States. Do this, and before the breath of spring has melted the ice from your northern lakes, the armies of rebellion will have melted away. Such a result is foretold by all who are familiar with the temper and feelings of the people of the South, no less than by all the teachings of history.

England has tried for centuries to anglicize Ireland by the hand of political and religious inequality; the result is that the Irish as a class are as alien to England as they were one hundred years ago. For ages Russia has pursued a similar policy in regard to Poland; the result is that all Europe is at this moment convulsed because the first military Power of the world cannot learn that the prejudices of a whole people can be removed only by confidence, forbearance, and respect. Sir, it is not to considerations of humanity alone that I look in urging upon you a total change of the policy which animates our rulers in the conduct of the war. I have said that the fate of the nation is involved; that the perpetuity of the Union and the liberties of the people of the North are imperiled. I know how difficult it is to reach the ear of the President or touch the understanding of his advisers. While all military operations are suspended and our armies compelled to remain inactive because of the rigors of winter, the White House is besieged by an army of officials whose surest passport to promotion is a blind and slavish admiration of him who dispenses power and patronage. He hears nothing but from sycophants; heeds nothing which is not laudatory of his greatness; reads nothing but fulsome praises of his administrative abilities, and hearkens to no counsel which does not assure him of a reelection. To such an extent does this mania for reelection control him, that only a few evenings since he attended a model artist's exhibition in this Hall, at which an unsexed woman nominated him for reelection. It was done in his personal presence, amid the applause of the ladies and gentlemen, courtesans and contractors, parasites and placemen, then and there assembled. While our sentinels were freezing at their posts; while brothers were perishing by slow degrees in a hostile conflict, rendered doubly appalling by the fury of the elements, the Chief Magistrate of the country was in attendance at a political "Canterbury," where the chief and most ludicrous act was his own nomination for reelection. The performance being unique, of course the attendance was large. The chief political danseuse proposed the name of Abraham Lincoln, as previously arranged by the managers, and all the attachés said ay, as they thought of their days of lengthened official repose in Abraham's bosom.

Every cloud is said to have a silver lining, and the worst of evils not to be wholly inseparable from good; and should the people again elect "the honestest man in Springfield" to the Presidency, may we not hope for some change in the personnel of the Government? The brave and intrepid Sumner may yet command the army of the Potomac; Fred. Douglass may yet succeed the irrepressible Seward; while the "political woman" may be installed as grand inspector of the royal household. Doubtless when a few more strong-minded women have gathered around the Capitol the avenue will emit a sweeter fragrance, quite as delightful as the odor of the presidential mansion on New Year's day, when greasy negroes were presented to the President amid the blandest smiles of their fair countrywomen of American descent. What American citizen who witnessed the animating scene did not rejoice at the rapid social progress the country has made under the rule of Abraham the First? Our colored friends, who under former administrations dared not obtrude themselves at the White House, are now allowed to be gallant to the estimable ladies of high officials, while that high functionary, the President, looks approvingly upon the bewitching scene. Amid so many gay and festive scenes as are daily transpiring at the White House, it is unreasonable to expect that the President can bestow much attention upon public affairs. The crowds of daily visitors, male and female, black and white, are so large and continuous that his Excellency's time is chiefly consumed in thanking the different delegations who are sent to invoke his acceptance of a second official term. With his surroundings, it cannot be expected that he will hear or heed those who believe that his reelection will be the greatest calamity which can befall our country. Were he disposed to give thought or attention to the mutterings of fearful apprehension and discontent which are audible throughout the North, I would commend to him the words of Sir Francis Bacon, who, whatever else he might have been, was the profoundest thinker of his age. Said he:

"As for discontents, they are in the body-politic like to humors in the natural, which are apt to gather a preternatural heat and to inflame; and let no prince measure the danger of them by this whether they be just or unjust, for that were to imagine people to be too reasonable, who do often spurn at their own good; nor yet by this, whether the griefs whereupon they rise be in fact great or small, for they are the most dangerous discontents where the fear is greater than the feeling. Do lend a modest mien to them. Besides, in great oppressions there are things that provoke the patient to withdraw into the country, but in fears it is not so. Neither let any prince or state be secure concerning discontents because they have been often or have been long, and yet no peril hath ensued; for, as it is true that every vapor or fume doth not return into a storm, so it is nevertheless true that storms, though they do blow over divers times, yet may fall at last, and, as the Spanish proverb noteth well, 'The cord breaketh at last by the weakest pull.'"

I will not assume that the President is one of those who can neither learn nor forget anything. He has learned boldness as a usurper, and how to be false to his pledges. But, if I may be permitted to appeal to the selfishness of his peculiar admirers, I would suggest that a further continuation of war in a manner which involves unnecessarily such vast expenditures of life and treasure, is not the surest way to perpetuate power; and those who have so suddenly acquired fortunes by availing themselves of the public calamities might pause to ask if peace will not more surely secure their present gains than war add an increase of store. There is a point of endurance beyond which even nations cannot go—a precipice which they cannot safely approach. I fear we are already standing at its verge, beyond which the yawning gulf of social and financial ruin awaits us all. A people hitherto unaccustomed to taxation, with no knowledge of a public debt but traditional horror of its miseries, is suddenly called upon to confront a national indebtedness of over two thousand millions! These figures are startling, yet the sum is increasing at the rate of more than two millions per day, presaging inevitable paralysis and bankruptcy to all. No interest is too great, no industry too small, no investment too secure, to escape the storm which is gathering and impending over us. The annual interest upon our public indebtedness, at six per cent. per annum, will amount to over one hundred and twenty millions—nearly twice the amount of the ordinary annual estimates of the expenses of the Government under former Administrations, nearly double the sum of our annual average expenditures during the Administration which waged the war with Mexico. If we grant that this indebtedness has been necessary or unavoidable, the figures still stare us in the face, suggestive of a future financial crisis which a wise statesmanship would seek to palliate or avoid. How this in my judgment can best be done, I have indicated in what I have already said. What disasters your policy will force upon the country I shall not attempt to portray. You seem not to be wholly insensible to the danger, though you have manifested your unfitness for meeting or avoiding it.

True, you may for a while delude your victims by pointing to the abundance of money which is seeking investment, stimulating the marts of business and enlivening the avenues of trade; but a day of those panics which logically follow inflated issues of paper, and which feed upon the fears of commerce and industry, will remove the delusion. Then the people will learn that money is not mere promises to pay; that wealth consists not in what they owe themselves; and that the elevation of the negro to social and political equality with the whites is a poor equivalent for national bankruptcy, repudiation, and ruin. For days and weeks your ingenuity has been sorely tried in devising some mode by which immense sums of additional taxation may be wrung from the pockets of a hitherto uncomplaining people. Every step you have taken but disclosed the magnitude of the amounts already expended, and the additional sums you propose to squander. Taxes heretofore imposed with caution, and submitted to reluctantly by the people, are now to be doubled and quadrupled. Labor which only staggered under blows hitherto inflicted, is soon to be paralyzed by increased burdens; prices which have advanced articles of necessity to the poor almost beyond their reach, are to be pushed to the point which wholly prohibits them; while gold, the only true representative of values, is to be banished from the country, or hoarded until bankruptcy shall have left the labor and industry of our once happy land to the mercies of the miser and his capital. The full details of your mammoth schemes of taxation cannot now be known; but the country may rest assured that every interest will soon feel the shock of your inexorable demands. While their sons and brothers are being unwillingly dragged into the Army by a more rigorous conscription, or forced to give their all to avoid its requirements, an army of volunteer tax-gatherers is being organized for a campaign throughout the free States of the North. There is not a conscript or private among them. Each is a veteran volunteer; each carries the commission and wears the badge of his master. Already they are beginning to hover around the cabins of the poor. As carrion birds instinctively scent their prey, so they can discern from afar the pittance of the poor. But I prefer that time shall unfold to them the sufferings and indignities which they are yet to endure. I pray they may have the courage and the patriotism to feel that their country demands the sacrifice they are soon to make. History, while it teaches that its laws are, in the main, general and unerring, has recorded certain apparent exceptions. To these exceptions we are apt to recur as safe precedents when the logic of events begins to expose our fallacies. In my judgment those who regard a public debt so enormous as ours as a public blessing, or who affect to see no danger in attempting to wring from the people the burdens which your taxation imposes, will find themselves mistaken. England, which for ages has ground her poor to pay the expenses of ambitious ministers, has suddenly become a model government with many of the supporters of this Administration, while, in Dixie, the adherents of Davis have discovered that a limited monarchy is the best guarantor of constitutional freedom. Whatever England may now be, this we know, that she has attained her present position by protracted wars and oppressive taxation; and if you who boast of England as a model of good government will only inform our people of the road she has traveled, and point them to the privations of her poor, I shall have increased confidence in the future good fortunes of my country. Sidney Smith, whose name alone suggests to all intelligent men who and what he was, left nothing more valuable to mankind than his picture of the costs of war and the expense of national glory. This is what he tells us of the condition of Englishmen as a consequence of war and taxation. Addressing himself directly to Americans, he said:

"We can inform Brother Jonathan what are the inevitable consequences of being too fond of glory. Taxes upon every article which enters into the mouth, or covers the back, or is placed under the foot; taxes upon everything which it is pleasant to see, hear, feel, smell, or taste; taxes upon warmth, light, and locomotion; taxes on everything on earth and the waters under the earth, on everything that comes from abroad, or is grown at home; taxes on the raw material; taxes on every fresh value that is added to it by the industry of man; taxes on the sauce which pampers man's appetite, and the drug that restores him to health; on the ermine which decorates the judge, and the rope which hangs the criminal; on the poor man's salt and the rich man's spice; on the brass nails of the coffin and the ribbons of the bride; at bed or board, couchant or levant, we must pay. The school-boy whips his taxed top; the beardless youth manages his taxed horse with a taxed bridle, on a taxed road; and the dying Englishman pouring his medicine, which has paid seven per cent., into a spoon that has paid fifteen per cent., flings himself back upon his chintz bed, which has paid twenty-two per cent., and expires in the arms of an apothecary who has paid a license of one hundred pounds for the privilege of putting him to death. His whole property is then immediately taxed from two to ten per cent. Besides the probate, large fees are demanded for burying him in the chancel; his virtues are handed down to posterity on taxed marble; and he is then gathered to his fathers—to be taxed no more."

Sir, none of us would have supposed four years ago that this picture of misery and oppression would be so soon presented to us as a terrible reality. But it is so. Nor will this generation live to see the shackles of taxation stricken from their limbs. Far off in the distant future, generations yet unborn will bewail the load of debt which is being entailed upon them by the madness of the times. I implore you in their name to retrace your steps, and that you listen to the voice of those who point you to the Constitution as the only road which leads to a lasting union and a permanent peace. Adherence to that instrument will speedily end this terrible war; it will secure and perpetuate the public repose. The friends of the Constitution look confidently to the approach of the November elections. Upon the result we stake the life of the Constitution, the perpetuation of empire. The armies of the Democracy are ready for the conflict. Their numbers already may be counted by millions. Whatever in the past their faults and errors may have been, they never oppressed the citizen or usurped doubtful or forbidden powers. Their past conflicts with the enemies of constitutional union will reanimate every heart and nerve the weakest arm. Their past history in warring against despotism and usurpation is a guarantee that they will not abuse power intrusted to them by the people. They will recognize as brothers all who vindicate the Constitution and cling to that Union which it made. Though the terrible convulsions of the times have driven many of its southern leaders into the armies of rebellion, though many of its once-honored chieftains in the North have yielded, like Judas, to the temptations of power, and are now among the basest of the venal tribe, that grand old party has lost nothing of its ancient prestige or moral power. Its expurgation has been thorough, its purification complete. Its Butlers, Dickinsons, Buxteds, and Milroys of the North, its treasonable leaders of the South, no longer defile the temple sacred to the true defenders of the Constitution. In their place we have all that was most respectable of the old-line Whigs, those who still cherish the teachings of their illustrious leaders, Webster and Clay. Honest Republicans will rally around our standard; and even the Know-Nothings—those who affected to tremble at the power of the Pope—will eagerly join that party which, in upholding the Constitution, secures freedom of conscience to all. Already they have learned that there is more to be feared from the unlicensed power of usurpation at home than from all the bulls which ever emanated from the Papal see. I say to the friends of constitutional union everywhere, be of good cheer. Hope illumines the future. The prize for which we contend is no less than the Constitution which our fathers ordained. It has borne us safely and securely amid the dangers of the past; if we are true to ourselves now we will rescue it from the hands of its destroyers, and, bearing it aloft everywhere, we will point to its pure and ample folds as the only harbinger of peace, the sole bond of union among the States, the last citadel in which the citizen may find security and defy the oppressor's power.

Mr. ARNOLD. I desire to say a single word before the committee rises in reply to the remarks made by my colleague.

Mr. Chairman, it is by the agency of speeches like that to which the committee have listened to-day, so far as they may have any influence at all, and like that made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] yesterday, that this war is to be prolonged. Such utterances made upon this floor uphold the hands of the rebels and encourage them to persevere in the war they are making upon the Government.

In order that the position of those gentlemen may not be misunderstood, and to recall to the recollection of the country the position which the friends of the gentleman from Illinois occupy, I desire to call the attention of the committee to a plank in the platform which the political friends of my colleague adopted at Springfield in June last. It will be remembered that at that time one hundred thousand gallant soldiers of Illinois were in the field, seeking to open for the purposes of commerce, and to restore to the flag of the country, the great river of the West. It will be remembered that at that time General Grant and the distinguished predecessor (General Logan) of my colleague, [Mr. W. J. ALLEN,] and their brave associates, were seeking to reduce the stronghold of Vicksburg; that General Banks was before Port Hudson, and the rebel General Lee was preparing to invade the North. It was at that dark period of the rebellion and the war that the political friends of my colleague, who has just taken his seat, met together at Springfield for the purpose of adopting such measures as they thought the exigencies of the country required. And they gathered there, not only those who sympathized with him in the State of Illinois, but the friends of Vallandigham from Ohio, and the friends of the distinguished gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] and those who sympathized with him in his peculiar views in regard to the war. And when they were gathered there for the purpose, I suppose, of aiding our gallant soldiers in the field, who were fighting for the old flag, and to sustain the Administration that was using the entire power and energies of the Government to put down the rebellion, these gentlemen adopted a resolution which I will send to the Clerk's desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"SPRINGFIELD, June 17.

"The Democratic mass meeting here to-day was largely attended, and passed off harmoniously. The Democrats estimate the number present from seventy-five thousand to one hundred thousand. There was great cheering for Vallandigham. William A. Richardson presided, with fifty vice-presidents. Speeches were made by Messrs. Richardson, Voorhees, Cox of Ohio, Lyle, Dickey, General McKinstry, Dick Merrick, H. C. Dean, and some twenty others. "Resolved, That the further offensive prosecution of the war tends to subvert the Constitution and Government, and entail upon the nation all the disastrous consequences of misrule and anarchy; that we are in favor of peace upon the basis of the restoration of the Union, and for the accomplishment of which we propose a national convention to settle upon terms of peace, which shall have, in view the restoration of the Union as it was, and securing by constitutional amendments such rights to the severed States and the people thereof as honor and justice demand."—National Intelligencer, June 20, 1863.

Mr. ARNOLD. I have only to say in regard to that resolution, that if it had been carried out at the period when it was adopted, the Mississippi river to-day would not have been open to our commerce. The rebel flag would still have floated over a large portion of it. If the spirit of that resolution had been carried out, the glorious victory which those gallant men who do not sympathize with the gentlemen in their peace resolutions and speeches were struggling to gain would never have crowned our arms. If that resolution had been carried out, our Army would never have accomplished its crowning triumph of Vicksburg, nor should we have had Gettysburg and Port Hudson.

No, Mr. Chairman, it is the friends, the pretended friends of peace, who have weakened the hands of the Administration, and their efforts are prolonging the war; it is they who are encouraging those who are fighting against our country to persevere. When we read, as we do day after day, of the exhausted condition of the rebels, giving ground of confident hope and expectation that they will ere long surrender, and thus this cruel war come to an end, we find these expectations are not realized, because of aid and encouragement given to the rebels by the speeches made upon this floor, and elsewhere, such as we have listened to to-day. These speeches are carried to the South and circulated there for the purpose of showing that there is a party here organized upon the basis of stopping the war. The rebels infer that there is a party here which, in the language of the resolution, is opposed to "the further offensive prosecution of the war." When the rebels see men in the Congress of the United States, whether avowedly or otherwise, seeking by these means, by attacks upon the Administration, by attacks upon the loyal men of the border States, such as we have just heard, to paralyze the arm of the Government, it affords encouragement to the almost exhausted energies of the South, and they resolve to hold out and prolong the struggle.

Now, this war will be ended when all this ceases, and when the people of the North unite and all rally to sustain the Administration in prosecuting it with vigor. Sir, it will be ended when the cause in which it originated shall cease to exist. As victory and freedom has extended South, loyalty has reappeared; so that liberty and loyalty have gone together. As our victorious flag extends toward the Gulf, liberty follows, and the loyal people rise up and reassert themselves. Such has been the result in Missouri, in Arkansas, in Louisiana, in Tennessee, in Maryland, in Kentucky, and in Western Virginia. Loyalty and liberty go step by step, side by side, and so they must progress until they shall have extended to the Gulf, and there we shall have a homogeneous, free, and united people, with no cause to distract our future harmony.

I have risen, Mr. Chairman, not to make any extended reply to the remarks of my colleague, but simply to call the attention of the House to the resolution which has been read, and to suggest to my colleague that he embody it in his speech as an appendix to it, in order that, through the appendix so attached, the object, design, and purpose of the speech may be better understood and appreciated by those who read it.

Mr. BALDWIN obtained the floor, but yielded it to

Mr. BRANDEGEE, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the special order, being bill of the House No. 151, making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1865, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

PROCEEDINGS IN ADMIRALTY.

Mr. ODELL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to facilitate proceedings in admiralty through judicial proceedings in the port of New York, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

MONEY ORDER SYSTEM.

Mr. ALLEY, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads a bill establishing a postal money order system; which was recommitted to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

And then, on motion of Mr. ALLEY, (at thirty-five minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report from the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with law, statements of the expenditures at the national armories, and of the arms, appendages, and spare parts made thereat for the years ending respectively June 30, 1861, June 30, 1862, and June 30, 1863; which, on motion of Mr. WILSON, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition of George H. Broadhead, Thomas E. Brown, and others, citizens of New York, praying for the establishment of a uniform hospital and ambulance system for the armies of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HOWE presented a petition of citizens of Wisconsin, praying that the reciprocity treaty may be so modified as either to prevent the admission of lumber from Canada, or that such a tax may be imposed as will prevent undue competition to the detriment of our own citizens; which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. VAN WINKLE presented resolutions of the Legislature of the State of West Virginia, in favor of the passage of an act providing for the adequate and permanent improvement of the navigation of the Ohio river; which were referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GRIMES. I present a memorial of the mayor, recorder, aldermen, and common council of the city of Georgetown, who represent that by an act of Congress passed in 1820 incorporating the city of Washington, this city was required to pay one half of the expenses of the orphans' court and other expenses incident to the county of Washington under the control of the levy court, and that by the act of 1826 the corporation of the city of Georgetown was required to pay one fourth of those expenses; that at that time the population of Georgetown was about one half that of the city of Washington, and therefore the proportion required to be paid by each corporation was fair and equitable as between the two; but since that time the population of Washington has greatly increased beyond that of Georgetown, so that now the proportion required to be paid by Georgetown is far greater than the assessable property and the amount of population in that city would justly require that it should pay. They therefore ask that Congress will pass a bill making a new apportionment of these county expenses between Washington and Georgetown. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the memorial of H. French, a commander in the United States Navy, who sets forth that he has been dealt with improperly by the naval retiring board. He represents that during the thirty-six years he has served in the Navy there has not been an unfavorable report made of him to the Navy Department. He therefore prays Congress to take such action in his case as will afford him a full and impartial investigation, that he may be restored to his rightful position in the Navy of the United States. As this subject, I understand, is before the Committee on Naval Affairs in some form for legislation, I move the reference of this memorial to that Committee.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. TRUMBULL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred sundry petitions and memorials praying for a modification of the fugitive slave law, and for the passage of an act emancipating all persons of African descent held to service or labor in the United States, asked to be discharged from their further consideration, and that they be referred to the select committee on slavery and freedmen; which was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 34) making appropriation for the support of the Military Academy for the year ending June 30, 1865, reported it with an amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. GRIMES asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 81) to amend the charter of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 82) concerning notaries public for the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. HOWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 83) to amend an act confirming certain land claims in the State of Michigan; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 84) to incorporate the Metropolitan Gas-Light Company in the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

DISTRICT BUSINESS.

Mr. GRIMES. I move that three weeks from to-day be set apart for the transaction of business relating especially to the District of Columbia. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] suggests that we had perhaps better have two days; but other gentlemen tell me that if we cannot get through the District business in one day they will give us two days.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa moves that this day three weeks, being Thursday, the 18th of February, be assigned specially for the consideration of business relating to the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to, two thirds of the Senate agreeing thereto.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That in all sessions of committees to take the testimony of witnesses in relation to any matter of fact pertaining to the conduct of any Department of the Government or of any branch thereof, the head of such Department shall be requested to employ some proper and competent person to aid in the examination and cross-examination of witnesses, and to furnish any other evidence or proof pertinent to the matter inquired into.

Mr. HALE. Let that resolution lie over until I can look into it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Being objected to, it will lie over under the rule.

Mr. SHERMAN. I would rather have that resolution referred, unless it comes from a committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire objects to its consideration, and it lies over under the rule.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection to its being referred. I objected to it simply because I have not read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It lies over under the rule.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole as the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday. The pending question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON.]

Mr. CARLILE. The Senator from Missouri is not in his seat this morning, and I therefore move that the bill be passed by the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia proposes to postpone the further consideration of this bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

PERUVIAN CLAIMS.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders, and proceed to the consideration of the bill reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations, in pursuance of a recommendation of the President to pay the claims recently allowed by the commission appointed under a convention between the United States and Peru.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens, under the convention between the United States and Peru, of the 12th of January, 1863, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs that for the purpose of discharging the obligations of the United States, under the convention with Peru, of the 12th of January last, there be paid to Stephen G. Montano, or to his legal representatives, in the current money of the United States, the sum of $41,782 38; and to Juan del Carmen Vergel, or his legal representatives, the sum of $1,170, in the silver money of the United States, or its equivalent.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF HOMESTEAD LAW.

Mr. CONNESS. I move to take up Senate bill No. 60, which was laid over yesterday at the request of the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK.] He now consents to go on with it, and it will take but a short time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 60) amendatory of the homestead law, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill provides that in the case of any person desirous of availing himself of the benefits of the homestead act of May 20, 1862, but who, by reason of actual service in the land or naval service of the United States, is unable to do the personal preliminary acts at the district land office which that act requires, it shall and may be lawful for such person to make the affidavit required by that act before the officer commanding in the branch of the service in which he may be engaged, which affidavit shall be as binding in law, and with like penalties, as if taken before the register or receiver; and upon such affidavit being filed with the register by the wife or other representative of the party, shall become effective from the date of filing, provided the application and affidavit are accompanied by the fee and commissions, as required by law.

The second section provides that besides the ten dollar fee exacted by the homestead act, the applicant shall hereafter pay to the register and receiver each, as commissions, at the time of entry, one per cent. upon the cash value of the land applied for, and like commissions when the claim is finally established and the certificate therefor issued as the basis of a patent.

The third section provides that in any case hereafter in which the applicant for the benefit of the homestead is prevented, by reason of distance, bodily infirmity, or other good cause, from personal attendance at the district land office, he may make the affidavit required by the original statute before the clerk of the court for the county in which he is an actual resident, and transmit the same, with the fee and commissions, to the register and receiver.

The fourth section provides that in lieu of the fee allowed by the twelfth section of the preemption act of 4th September, 1841, the register and receiver shall each be entitled to one dollar for their services in acting upon preemption claims, and shall be allowed, jointly, at the rate of fifteen cents per hundred words for the testimony which may be reduced by them to writing for claimants, in establishing preemption or homestead rights.

By the fifth section whenever any reservation is introduced into market as public lands under existing laws, the Commissioner of the General Land Office may fix the minimum price at which such lands shall be disposed of, but not to be less than $1 25 per acre.

The sixth section provides that where a pre-emptor has taken the initiatory steps required by existing laws in regard to actual settlement, and is called away from such settlement by being actually engaged in the land or naval service of the United States, and by reason of such absence is unable to appear at the district land office, to make, before the register or receiver, the affidavits required by the thirteenth section of the preemption act of 4th September, 1841, he may make that affidavit before the officer commanding, and upon the presentation by the wife of the pre-emptor, or other individual lawfully representing his interests, with proof, establishing the validity of the preemption to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, such wife or representative may make payment in full for the actual settlement, and make entry thereof in the name of the pre-emptor.

By the seventh section, the registers and receivers in the State of California are to collect and receive fifty per cent in addition to the fees and allowances provided by the act.

The Committee on Public Lands reported several amendments to the bill. The first was in line six of section one, to strike out the word "land" and insert "military;" so as to make the clause read, "by reason of actual service in the military or naval service of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was after the word "requires" in line nine of section one, to insert "and whose family, or some member thereof, is residing on the land which he desires to enter, and upon which a bona fide improvement and settlement have been made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line five of section two, to strike out the word "value" and insert "price as fixed by law."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, after the word "homestead" in line three, to insert the words, "and whose family, or some member thereof, is residing on the land which he desires to enter, and upon which a bona fide improvement and settlement have been made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the fifth section, in the following words:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That whenever any reservation is introduced into the market as public lands under existing laws, it shall and may be lawful for the Commissioner of the General Land Office to fix the minimum price at which such lands shall be disposed of, but not to be less than $1 25 per acre.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the word "land" in the fifth line of the sixth section and insert "military," so as to make it read "actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the following words in section six:

It shall and may be lawful for such party to make the said affidavit before the officer commanding, in like manner and effect, and with like penalties, as stipulated in the first section of this act; and upon the presentation by the wife of the pre-emptor, or other individual lawfully representing his interests, with proof establishing the validity of the preemption to the satisfaction of the register and receiver, it shall and may be lawful for such wife or representative to make payment in full for the actual settlement, and to make entry thereof in the name of such pre-emptor.

And in lieu of them to insert the following words:

The time for filing such affidavit and making final proof and entry or location shall be extended six months after the expiration of his term of service, upon satisfactory proof by affidavit, or the testimony of witnesses, that the said pre-emptor is so in the service, being filed with the register of the land office for the district in which his settlement is made.

So as to make the section read:

That where a pre-emptor has taken the initiatory steps required by existing laws in regard to actual settlement, and is called away from such settlement by being actually engaged in the military or naval service of the United States, and by reason of such absence is unable to appear at the district land office to make, before the register or receiver, the affidavits required by the thirteenth section of the preemption act of 4th September, 1841, the time for filing such affidavit and making final proof and entry or location shall be extended six months after the expiration of his term of service, upon satisfactory proof, by affidavit or the testimony of witnesses, that the said pre-emptor is so in the service, being filed with the register of the land office for the district in which his settlement is made.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section seven after the word "California," in line two, to insert "in the State of Oregon, and in the Territories of Washington, Nevada, Colorado, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add at the end of section seven the following proviso:

Provided, That the salary and fees allowed any register or receiver shall not exceed in the aggregate the sum of $3,000 per annum.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. These are the amendments of the committee. The bill is still open to amendment.

Mr. WILKINSON. I see by the second section of this bill that an additional fee is allowed to the registers and receivers. I would inquire why that is necessary, if there is any one here who has charge of the bill.

Mr. CONNESS. The object of that part of the bill is that we may compensate registers and receivers in proportion to the amount of labor they perform, rather than by an increase of their salaries. Formerly in the State of California the registers and receivers of the land offices received an annual salary of $3,000 each. It was found that there were in that State some land offices where the receipts were not equal to the expenditures; in other words, where there was comparatively little business done, as at Los Angeles, and in the land district known as the Humboldt district in that State; and by an act of Congress the salaries of the registers and receivers throughout that State were reduced to $500 per annum, so that in land districts in that State where there is a great deal of business, and where the business is of the most important character, the salaries of these officers are reduced to $500 per annum, and they received that in legal tender notes which are at an average of fifty per cent. discount in California, making it impossible to fill these offices or carry them on at all at present. On consulting with the land department here, and the Commissioner of the General Land Office, it was suggested by that department that the best mode of increasing the revenue of these officers, so that they may be enabled to perform their duties, would be by providing fees so that they should be paid in proportion to the amount of labor performed, and so also that their compensation should be partly derived from the parties who litigate land questions before them. Then it is further provided by an amendment of the committee, which is entirely acceptable, that in no case shall the salary and fees of any register or receiver exceed the sum of $3,000 per annum. The effect will be that those who require a salary and must have it will receive it, and in offices where there is little work done they will get no increase at all.

Mr. WILKINSON. The argument of the Senator applies to the cases in California; but this bill is general, and applies all over the country. It applies to land offices in Minnesota.

Mr. CONNESS. Then let there be a proviso that it shall apply only to the officers named in the seventh section of the act.

Mr. WILKINSON. But I read in the seventh section of the act that the fees are doubled in the States of California and Oregon and in the Territories of Washington, Nevada, Colorado, Idaho, New Mexico, and Arizona. The registers and receivers receive now about fourteen dollars for every entry under the homestead act, and it strikes me that that is sufficient. I am not advised as to whether the Commissioner of the Land Office approves of this provision or not.

Mr. CONNESS. The provision in the second section is inserted upon his special recommendation. I suppose he found it to be necessary. It will also be seen that the proviso restricting the entire allowance applies to all the States as well as to those named in that section.

Mr. WILKINSON. If the Commissioner recommends it, I will not move to strike it out.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

AGRICULTURAL COLLEGES.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I move that the Senate postpone all prior orders and take up Senate bill No. 12. It is a bill to which there can be no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 12) extending the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grant of lands made by the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862.

It provides that any State or Territory may accept and shall be entitled to the benefits of the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862, by expressing its acceptance thereof as provided in that act, within two years from the date of the approval of this act, subject, however, to the conditions contained in that act.

Mr. WILLEY. I offer the following amendment as an additional section:

And he it further enacted, That the benefit of the provisions of this act, and of the said act approved July 2, 1862, be, and the same are hereby, extended to the State of West Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ALBERT BROWN.

Mr. HALE. I ask leave of the Senate to introduce a resolution which I will explain in a minute, and ask its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims of the Senate be authorized to hear and report upon the claim of Albert Brown now before said committee.

The reason for this resolution is this: This claim was presented to the Senate at the last session, and referred to the Committee on Claims. They reported unanimously in favor of it, and the Senate passed a bill for his relief unanimously; but it failed to reach action in the House. It has been referred again at this session to the Committee on Claims of the Senate, but the committee feel embarrassed by the legislation of the last Congress, and some of them think that such a resolution as this is necessary to give them jurisdiction. That is all.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. CLARK. I am asked by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] to make some little explanation in regard to this resolution. At the last session this claim of Albert Brown was referred to the Committee on Claims of this body, and a report was made upon it and the bill passed. I think that the claim is founded upon a contract. By a provision of the act approved on the 3d of March last, all claims "founded upon any law of Congress, or upon any regulation of any Executive Department, or upon any contract, express or implied, with the Government of the United States shall, unless otherwise ordered by resolution," go to the Court of Claims. I had myself doubts whether the simple order of reference of a claim upon motion was such a resolution as this statute contemplated; and I thought it desirable that, if we considered this claim and reported upon it, there should be an express resolution authorizing us so to do, and I so stated to my colleague who had introduced the claim of Mr. Brown. It is to meet that objection that this resolution is offered.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I shall vote for this resolution upon this construction. If the committee shall find that the claim ought to go before the Court of Claims, I think that report ought to be made to the Senate, and the Senate ought to decide upon it when it comes before them. I think this claimant, with all other claimants, should take his chances before the court appointed by law to examine such cases, if it properly belongs there. I have no objection to the resolution with that construction placed upon it; but I should object to it if it is understood that the committee are to consider and report upon it on its merits, without regard to the question whether it should be examined by the Court of Claims or not.

Mr. CLARK. I suppose it will be perfectly competent when a report shall be made on the case, for any Senator to move to refer it to the Court of Claims, if that should be thought desirable. That has been the common practice.

The resolution was adopted.

PROPOSED EXPULSION OF MR. DAVIS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being no further morning business, if there be no objection on the part of the Senate, the Chair will call up the special order for one o'clock, being the unfinished business of yesterday.

There being no objection, the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, submitted by Mr. WILSON on the 8th instant:

Whereas Hon. GARRETT DAVIS, a Senator from the State of Kentucky did, on the 5th day of January, A. D. 1864, introduce into the Senate of the United States a series of resolutions in which, among other things, it is declared that "the people North ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands," thereby meaning to incite the people of the United States to revolt against the President of the United States and those in authority who support him in the prosecution of the war to preserve, protect, and defend the Constitution and the Union, and to take the prosecution of the war into their own hands: Therefore,

Be it resolved, That the said GARRETT DAVIS has, by the introduction of the resolutions aforesaid, been guilty of advising the people of the United States to treasonable, insurrectionary, and rebellious action against the Government of the United States; and of a gross violation of the privileges of the Senate; for which causes he is hereby expelled.

The pending question being on the amendment proposed by Mr. HOWARD, to strike out the word "expelled," and insert in lieu thereof the words "censured by the Senate."

Mr. WILSON. I desire to say a very few words upon that resolution, but if any other Senator desires to address the Senate upon the subject, I yield to him for that purpose, as I desire to close the debate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I did not propose to enter into this debate, nor do I now propose to do so at any length; but after the course of the discussion, and after the expression that has been made by the Senators around me, perhaps I shall be pardoned by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senate if I allude to the condition of the debate and make some remarks in regard to it, and in regard to what, as I think, is the proper disposition which should be made of the matter before the Senate.

These resolutions of the Senator from Kentucky, as has been said, are certainly very intemperate in language. They are, as I think, erroneous in statement. I may say that I think they might be calculated, if they were not intended—I do not think they were intended, because I am bound now not to think so, as the Senator from Kentucky has made a disclaimer that they were so intended; but they might be calculated—to lead to the consequences which the Senator from Massachusetts seems to have feared; that they were calculated to incite insurrection. If the Senator from Massachusetts believed them to be so calculated, I think he was entirely justified in introducing the resolution of expulsion; for I think there is no Senator who would desire to sit here with another Senator, or would desire a Senator to be a member of this body, who would attempt to incite a portion of the loyal people to insurrection against the Government, however much he might condemn that Government; and I think any Senator would be justified in introducing a resolution for the expulsion of such a Senator.

And here I desire to say a word in answer to an allusion that has been made once or twice, I think once certainly, by the Senator from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] in regard to what was said here months ago in their places by the seceding Senators, by the rebelling Senators, if I may so say, and what we bore from them when they were members of the Senate, without a movement for their expulsion. There were a great many things said then by the Senators on the other side which showed a determined purpose to break up the Government; yet we made no motion to expel them. Why? Because we knew that we were perfectly powerless, and in their control. They were holding their seats here; they gave their votes; and if we made any motion to expel any of them, the rest would all combine against it, and we had no power in the world to expel them. But the moment we arrived at that condition of things that gave us the power, when they had vacated their seats, and we had the votes, then the record shows that we expelled them for those rebellious utterances, and for that rebellious conduct. We should probably desire to do it now.

I have the good opinion of the Senator from Kentucky to believe that he is so sincere that if he believed this Government was so bad that the people ought to revolt against it, or if he was in sympathy with the rebellion, he would vacate his seat, and go to that rebellion. Therefore I say that these resolutions being introduced here, and the Senator from Kentucky having disclaimed any insurrectionary intention—if I may use the expression—and having stated that they were simply to advise the people to a certain course of conduct which might be proper under the law; if that is his intention, as I understand him to say now, then I think we are bound to accept that interpretation given to the resolutions.

Those who put the harshest construction upon these resolutions would say that, perhaps, they were ambiguous; that they were capable of different interpretations. The Senator from Massachusetts puts upon them the interpretation that the Senator from Kentucky meant to incite the people to actual hostilities. Some other gentlemen think he did not mean that; that he simply meant to advise the people to oppose the Administration of the Government, and take the Government into their own hands by their votes. If that was what he meant, that is perhaps legitimate; but if the other was what he meant, as the Senator from Massachusetts supposes, then I say the Senator from Massachusetts was justified in bringing in this resolution. But after it is brought in, I understand the Senator from Kentucky to deny that he had any such intention. I feel bound to accept his denial. I think the honorable Senator from Massachusetts will see that he ought to accept the denial, and that he ought not to proceed to the harsh measure of expelling a man upon a construction put on his words which he says he did not mean. I therefore suggest to the honorable Senator from Massachusetts whether it would not be better to withdraw the resolution. I make the suggestion with all due deference to him and the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, as no response is made to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from New Hampshire, it seems that the resolution is probably not to be withdrawn, and that a vote, therefore, must be had upon it. I will, in a very few words, give the reasons which will govern my vote.

In regard to the character of the resolutions which have been introduced by the Senator from Kentucky, I agree in substance with the remarks made by those with whom I usually act politically on this side of the Chamber. I consider them, in substance and in language, as improper to be introduced into this body. Even if I agreed, as I do not, as to the facts stated in them, with the Senator from Kentucky, I should, as I think, disagree with him as to the propriety of introducing such resolutions here. They charge high crimes and misdemeanors, formally and specifically, against the President of the United States. They charge against him offenses for which, under the Constitution of the country, he is impeachable before this body. We are his constitutional judges. If impeached by the House of Representatives, we should sit here as judges to decide upon his guilt or innocence. To assume in the outset, as we should by passing these resolutions, that he was guilty, seems to me to be transcending the proper limits which, as his judges, we ought to observe. I do not think the honorable Senator from Kentucky would wish to place himself in the position of having decided the case before he was called upon as a judge deliberately to pronounce judgment. That these resolutions charge against the President impeachable offenses nobody will deny. Is it right for us, if he be guilty, before we are called upon to sit in judgment upon him to decide upon his guilt or innocence?

Again, the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Kentucky not only impeach the President of high crimes and misdemeanors, but they impeach this body—that is to say, a majority of this body—and would make us wholly unfit to sit in judgment upon any person high or low in the community. Those resolutions charge in substance and in effect upon a majority of this body certainly what if true should disqualify us from sitting here, and indeed, as was once said of certain other persons, would disqualify us from sitting anywhere. One of these resolutions divides the people of this country "into two great parties, the destructives and the conservatives. The first," that is, the destructives, "consists of Abraham Lincoln, his office-holders, contractors, and other followers." I hope that the honorable Senator did not by either of these terms mean to characterize a majority of this body. We certainly are not his office-holders, certainly not his contractors; so we must come in, if at all, under the term—somewhat offensive, certainly—of "other followers." But I am driven to the conclusion that the honorable Senator means to class us either with "his office-holders, contractors," or "other followers," because when he comes to enumerate those who belong to the other party which he says compose the people of those States, he enumerates, "all men who are for ejecting Lincoln and his party from office and power."

These are the "conservatives," the men "who are for ejecting Lincoln and his party from office and power." The honorable Senator knows that a majority of this body are not for "ejecting Lincoln," as he familiarly calls him, "from office and power."

Mr. DAVIS. Will the honorable Senator from Connecticut allow me a word?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the language used in the resolution which the honorable Senator has just read cannot fairly be interpreted to include the Senate, and I certainly disavow any purpose of including the Senate in the phrases which the Senator has read.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I recognize the entire right of the Senator to construe his own language, and when he does construe it, in my opinion, the Senate are bound to take his construction, and to give to the words he uses the meaning which he says he affixes to those words. It is the honorable Senator's right to construe his own language. I confess, however, it did seem to me that the language which I have quoted was susceptible fairly of no other interpretation than that which I have put upon it; but I certainly accept the honorable Senator's explanation of his own terms; and as he disavows that interpretation, it is sufficient for me. In that connection I may say, as to the language employed in those resolutions, that when the honorable Senator disavows, as he has to a certain extent disavowed, what other gentlemen understood those resolutions to mean, I think, as I have suggested, we are bound to take his explanation rather than what might seem to us to be the import of the language used.

Under these circumstances, it is true these resolutions stand before us differently from what they would if we were left to give a construction to them ourselves; but I submit to the Senator that, after all, these resolutions must be understood as importing impeachable offenses against the President of the United States. The President may be guilty; but is it right for members of this Senate, before the President shall be impeached by the House of Representatives, to prejudice his case? Does the honorable Senator wish to prejudice his case? If he votes for these resolutions does he not prejudice his case? Does he not disqualify himself from sitting in judgment upon the President when he shall be, if he shall be, impeached by the House of Representatives for these very crimes and misdemeanors?

Mr. President, the honorable Senator is fond of recurring to past times, and properly. It is well, certainly, to derive as many lessons of wisdom from the past as is possible. If the honorable Senator will go back to the period of thirty years ago, when a very eminent citizen was President of the United States, and when it was his fortune or misfortune to have an opposition to his Administration in this body certainly inferior to no opposition in point of power, intellect, and influence ever encountered by any Administration in this country, he will find that such resolutions as these found no favor with those whom he would now quote as examples worthy to be followed. An eminent citizen of Kentucky, eminent over the world, introduced resolutions into this body respecting the then President of the United States, reflecting to some extent, and indeed very greatly, upon the manner in which that citizen administered the office of President of the United States; but on a suggestion that his resolutions contained impeachable matter as against the President of the United States, although he was acting with a majority in the Senate, and although his influence with that majority was almost controlling, at his own motion he modified the resolutions which he had introduced, and carefully stripped them of anything which would seem to be impeachable matter. That occurred in this Chamber thirty years ago; and the language as it was originally introduced was almost commendatory, even laudatory, compared with the language in which the honorable Senator from Kentucky now indulges as to the present incumbent of the presidential chair. It was no more than to assert this of the President:

"That he has assumed the exercise of a power, &c., not granted to him by the Constitution and laws, and dangerous to the liberties of the people."

That was deemed by Henry Clay to be too offensive, too strong for the Senate to pass—language now sounding so mild, so temperate—and it was by Mr. Clay himself modified in this way before the Senate were called to pass upon it:

"That he has assumed upon himself authority and power not conferred by the Constitution and laws, but in derogation of both."

And it was upon that only that the Senate were called upon to pass, Mr. Clay, as I have suggested, modifying those terms of his own motion in order that the objection made that the resolutions asserted impeachable matter might not be fairly asserted of the resolutions.

Still, Mr. President, even allowing the resolutions to stand just as they are, without the explanation of the honorable Senator from Kentucky, it is due to candor that I should say that I could not vote for the honorable Senator's expulsion because he had introduced them. I certainly should not have voted to print these resolutions if I had known what they were at the time the order to print was made. They were not read. I should have voted against printing them if I had known their contents. At the time when they were introduced and the order made, it passed unobserved in the Senate. When I saw the resolutions a day or two after, when they were laid on the desks, I made up my mind that in future I should ask for the reading of resolutions or ascertain something of their character before the order to print was made without any opposition from me. These resolutions are printed, however; they are here; and I do not think that expulsion is the proper remedy where such an act has been committed.

Nor, sir, do I think that a vote to censure an honorable Senator for introducing resolutions of this character is proper, either. What does a vote to censure a Senator mean? After it is passed, how does he stand in the Senate? Is he entitled to the same privileges as other Senators; the same courtesy and rights as other Senators? He must be, or not be here at all. And yet he is under some sort of ban while he is under a vote of censure passed by this body. And what is to be the effect of it? When is the offense to be expiated? Is the vote ever to be obliterated? Is any subsequent course of good conduct to atone, and the resolution afterwards to be annulled, reconsidered, or repealed? I know not, Mr. President, what answer is to be given to these questions; and I confess that for one I am somewhat afraid of this power as a precedent. Let this body be organized into a censorial tribunal to pass votes of censure upon its members, and to what may it not lead? No doubt under certain circumstances such a vote might be proper for gross breaches of order. There may be extreme cases where such a vote as this may be called for; but for the introduction of resolutions, however offensive, or for words spoken in debate where there is no intentional personal insult, no gross, willful indignity to the body, I should deprecate a vote of censure as a punishment. I think there would be more danger of increasing the very evil than probability of diminishing it by following such a course. We should almost inevitably fall into divisions and strifes here, the evil results of which no man can foresee. So far from producing greater courtesy in debate, I have an apprehension that there might be a desire on the part of gentlemen here to make themselves martyrs to free discussion, and to indulge in free speech for the very purpose of being either censured or expelled.

The right of free speech is too dear to the people of this country to be impinged upon slightly. So dear is it that wherever any grounds can be shown for believing that a party is intending to impair it or abridge it, the days of such party must be few and short in this country. I glory in the fact that it is so. It has been so in this country always, and it always will be so long as there is a love of liberty; for free speech, a free press, and the freedom of the people will live and die together. It is vastly better that we suffer any little annoyance, or any great annoyance, to which we may be subjected in this body by too great freedom of speech, rather than that we should right ourselves, or attempt to right ourselves, by laying the heavy hand of censure, or of expulsion, by vote, upon our members by way of improving their speech or reforming their manners.

While, as I have said, I look upon the resolutions of the honorable Senator from Kentucky as resolutions which ought not to have been introduced into this body, still, the honorable Senator judged differently. His right to judge is as perfect as mine, and I am as unwilling to attempt to impose my standard of what is right upon him as I would be to submit to having him impose—which I know he has no desire to do—his standard of right upon me. I must therefore tolerate, and not merely tolerate but acknowledge the right of the Senator, because I claim it for myself, to indulge freely and fully in debate here. So of every other Senator on this floor, so long as this is a forum where free discussion is tolerated.

I shall therefore, Mr. President, with this explanation, which perhaps was quite unnecessary, vote both against the motion to amend the resolution and against the resolution itself.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to say any more on the resolution. I have already stated to the Senate my objections to the resolution, either in its original form or as it is proposed to be amended. I rise merely for the purpose of saying, with that respect which I hold at all times for an opinion of the Senator from Connecticut, that he will pardon me for suggesting that I think one of the principles which he has avowed perhaps cannot be maintained. The opinion which I formed on that subject was formed at a time when the contest which presented it arose. I think it was in 1832 that those resolutions were offered by Mr. Clay.

Mr. FOSTER. It was in the session of 1833-34, if I mistake not.

Mr. JOHNSON. It was about that time. When those resolutions were offered and while they were pending, and either before or after they were passed, I forget which, the then President of the United States sent in a protest, in the form of a message, against their passage, founded upon the principles stated by the honorable member from Connecticut, that it would be upon the part of the Senate the expression of an opinion in advance upon a question on which they might afterwards be called upon judicially to decide. It is true that Mr. Clay modified his original resolutions; but it is equally true—I speak from personal knowledge—that the modification which he proposed was not because he himself doubted that it was within the power of the Senate to pass the resolutions in the original form, but because he was anxious to get such resolutions passed as he supposed would accomplish his object; that is to say, resolutions denouncing as unconstitutional some conduct on the part of the then President of the United States. When the protest which the President sent in was before the Senate, the principle to which my friend from Connecticut has adverted was discussed at large. As well as I recollect, not only Mr. Clay maintained the right of the Senate to express an opinion on all the acts of the Executive, but Mr. Webster did it in the strongest terms, and Mr. Calhoun did it, and almost every member of the Senate except those who were more exclusively the political friends of the President. It seems to me, as it seemed to the statesmen to whom I have adverted, to be very full of danger to deny to the Senate of the United States, or any member of the Senate of the United States, the right to express his opinion on the conduct of the Executive, and to express it in the broadest terms. If he believes that the President has done an act that is unconstitutional, whether he calls it usurpation, or, omitting the word "usurpation," says that he has exercised powers which are not found in the Constitution, I think it is his duty, if he believes any good will be accomplished by it to the country, so to state and so to endeavor to vote.

Now, I suppose that my honorable friend from Connecticut at that time, for I believe he was then a politician—

Mr. FOSTER. A very young one.

Mr. JOHNSON. A very young one, I know, but not less wise because young. I rather imagine that if he had been a Senator of the United States at that time, and believed that General Jackson had been sinning against the Constitution, usurping powers which the Constitution did not give him, and hazarding the interests of the country by the exercise of such powers, he would, in the Senate and out of the Senate, and on the hustings, and upon every occasion that might present itself, denounce it, and endeavor to satisfy the country that the President was acting beyond the sphere of his power.

So, too, in relation to the members of the other House. Now, as it seems to me, Mr. President, if we reflect for a moment, not exactly to the same extent, but in principle, the doctrine upon which it may be maintained that no individual Senator, that no majority of the Senate can express an opinion in relation to the conduct of the Executive in any particular which, if true, would be a just ground for impeachment, would deny to the members of the House of Representatives the right to express any such opinion. The answer might be, "You have no right to denounce the President of the United States except in the way pointed out by the Constitution; that way is by impeachment; and if you think that he has done an act for which an impeachment might be prosecuted, take that course; but do not denounce the President before the country." Suppose the President of the United States—I am only supposing it, because I am sure such a result will not happen; but it may happen in the course of time; we may get into the executive chair some man who is totally regardless of the restraints of all the Constitution; and suppose he should attempt by military usurpation, with the Army under his control, to break down the Constitution in all respects, to change the form of the Government, should attempt to convert us into a military despotism, can we not denounce it? Certainly not, (that being an act for which he is clearly impeachable,) if it be true that because it is an act for which he is clearly impeachable we are to be silent; and, as I said just now, if we are to be silent upon the floor of the Senate, I know not upon what ground we are not obliged to be silent outside of the Senate.

We could not go before the country and try to alarm the country, point out the danger, call them to the rescue of our free institutions, because it would be said at once, "The ground upon which it is improper for a judicial officer to express an opinion upon a question which may come before him judicially, is that he commits himself, he judges in advance upon the guilt or innocence of the party who may be before him for prosecution." Well, he can do that just as effectually out of the Senate as in the Senate; and the result of it would be, in such a case as I have supposed, that no one of us, however satisfied we might be that the freedom of the country was in peril, imminent peril, that the Constitution was about to be extinguished, all that our ancestors fought for and all that we have endeavored to preserve was about to be lost, could, either upon the floor of the Senate or in the country, either speak or write so as to keep alive the spirit of freedom and call upon the people, in whose hearts it might still exist more or less, to come to the rescue.

I merely rose for the purpose of saying—speaking for myself individually—that I shall always feel myself at liberty, should the occasion arise, to denounce the conduct of the Executive in the strongest terms, if I believe that strong terms can properly and with truth be applied to him, notwithstanding it might turn out and could constitutionally turn out that I might be called upon at some subsequent period to act, as a Senator, as one of the judges upon the President in the event of his being impeached.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. President, I am not aware that I differ with the honorable Senator from Maryland, (I certainly should do so with very considerable distrust as to the correctness of my own opinion,) on the subject of the right to discuss freely here the official conduct of the President of the United States. I meant to limit my remarks in their application to the propriety, to say nothing of the good taste, of introducing resolutions into this body of a character like this:

"Resolved, That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and of the United States, the civil courts and trial by jury; it has ordered ad libitum arbitrary arrests by military officers, not only without warrant, but without any charge or imputation of crime or offense; and has hurried the persons so arrested from home and vicinage to distant prisons, and kept them incarcerated there for an indefinite time, some of whom it discharged without trial and in utter ignorance of the cause of their arrest and imprisonment, and others it caused to be brought before courts, created by itself, and to be tried and punished without law; in violation of the constitutional guarantee to the citizen of his right to keep and bear arms, and of his rights of property, it has forcibly deprived as well the loyal as the disloyal of both; it has usurped the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus and to proclaim martial law and establish military tribunals in States and parts of States where there was no obstruction to the due administration of the laws of the United States and the States by the civil courts and authorities, and ordered many citizens, who were not connected with the Army or Navy, to be dragged before its drum-head courts, and to be tried by them for new and strange offenses, declared by itself and by undefined and indefinable law, being but the arbitrary will of the court; it has ordained at pleasure a military despotism in the loyal States by means of courts martial, provost marshals, and military forces, governed neither by law, principles, nor rules, from whose tyranny and oppressions no man can claim immunity; all of which must be repudiated and swept away by the sovereign people."

That, it is true, is not technically a bill of indictment, but in effect it arraigns the President of the United States before this body for almost every offense of which he officially could be guilty, and that almost in the formal language of a criminal information or indictment.

If the honorable Senator from Maryland thinks that it is proper for any Senator to introduce here such resolutions, and for us, as Senators, to sit here and debate them, and by debating them in effect try the President of the United States for these offenses, without the presence of the accused himself, without the presence of the constitutional prosecutors, to wit, the House of Representatives, without the Chief Justice of the United States to sit here and preside over us, although I am sorry to differ from the honorable Senator from Maryland, I must differ, and certainly do differ. I certainly have not any such understanding of the rights, duties, and privileges of this body. I cannot go with him if he goes to such an extent. I think such a course unconstitutional and dangerous. Within these limitations we may differ as to the prerogatives of the Senate. On the general question of the right of Senators here to discuss the conduct of the President and of any officer of this Government with the utmost freedom—I mean of course that becoming freedom which the honorable Senator from Maryland always prescribes to himself, and which I trust all Senators are disposed to prescribe for themselves—to that extent I go. As it respects the allusion I made to the course pursued by the Senate some thirty years ago in the case of General Jackson, though the honorable Senator certainly has much better means of information than I as to the views of the men of those times, I think the record will show—I have not examined it—that the Senators acting with Mr. Clay thought it would be unwise to put impeachable matter into resolutions relating to the President. They certainly meant to insist upon and to exercise most amply and freely the right to discuss the conduct of the Chief Magistrate; but they did not wish to place themselves in the attitude of sitting as judges without the presence of the accused and without the presence of his constitutional prosecutors.

I make this explanation, Mr. President, because I would not have it understood that I fall short of any man in my attachment to the principle of freedom of discussion here and everywhere.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I shall interpose no obstacle to any disposition of the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts which he chooses to make. I had occasion the other day to express my opinions as to the true, real meaning and intent of the string of resolutions offered by the Senator from Kentucky. I then gave it as my opinion that it was not only the tendency of those resolutions to stir up and incite insurrection among the loyal people, but that they were written for the purpose. I founded my judgment, as I announced that I should, in the effort to construe those resolutions upon their language itself; I resorted to no extraneous matter in interpreting them; I did not go out of the record; and I was bound to this by sentiments of fairness toward the Senator from Kentucky.

I said before all that I desired to say upon the interpretation to be given to those resolutions, and I rise now principally to express my dissent from some sentiments which fell from the lips of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] yesterday while he was addressing the Senate upon this subject. If I understood him correctly, and I endeavored to do so, he announced to the Senate that he did not regard it as any breach of the privilege of the Senate for a Senator here to rise in his place and by his language and appeals, if he should think the occasion justified it, call upon the people to resort to insurrection and violence for the purpose of resisting the Government. I did so understand the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. My friend will allow me to state what I did say. I said nothing about the privileges of the Senate. I said that we were not responsible out of doors for what we said here, that we were responsible in doors for any breach of the privileges of the Senate or for any impropriety in our language or conduct here, and we were subject to such orders as the Senate might pass in relation to that matter. I expressed no opinion upon the question whether this case ought to be so considered; I did not undertake to argue that matter; but I put my vote upon entirely different grounds. I said that, so far as the particular expression complained of was concerned, in I think, the thirteenth resolution of the Senator from Kentucky, I did not see that the necessary construction was such as had been supposed by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan, and that not being the necessary construction, I did not feel bound to put the most violent construction upon it, especially in the face of the disclaimer of the Senator from Kentucky.

Then, with regard to the other portions of the resolutions which I designated as abusive, I said that I did not believe it was good policy or good sense to pass votes of censure for language used in reference to the Executive Government, the Administration; that it was very important, in my judgment, to allow the largest limit for the expression of opinion on that subject, and that I would not pass a vote of censure by reason of it. That was substantially the ground which I took. Whether language had been used which was a breach of privilege, I did not choose to discuss; for myself, I did not undertake to act on that ground.

Mr. HOWARD. The honorable Senator from Maine is entirely correct as to the fact that he uttered then the sentiments which he repeats now. He certainly did express these same sentiments in the discussion yesterday; but I understood the honorable Senator to go much further in his declarations to the Senate than he now goes. I understood him to say that he could conceive of such a condition of public affairs, of such conduct on the part of the Executive Government, or those charged with the administration, as to justify a Senator here in invoking the intervention of insurrectionary proceedings on the part of the people. Sir, I do not understand the honorable Senator even now to disclaim that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No, sir; I repeat it.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, sir, that is the very point about which I rose to speak. I dissent from that view. I do not hold it to be the right of a Senator of the United States, or of a Representative in Congress, so to call upon the people under any conceivable circumstances, under our Government, in which he would be justified in making such an appeal. When a Senator comes into this body, he takes an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. That is his sworn duty; and I submit to the Senate that when a Senator under any circumstances of public affairs shall rise in his place here and invoke the Senate and the country to resort to insurrectionary measures against the Government, he is acting in hostility, in antagonism to the very oath which he has taken.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will my honorable friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HOWARD. Certainly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose that a Senator believes and sees, and it is patent, that the Executive Government is engaged in taking measures actually to overthrow the Government and the Constitution of the United States, as a remedy for which there is nothing but insurrection or rebellion against them, that being the only remedy, will the Senator say that he would submit to that or would not advise the people to take it into their own hands and prevent that wrong, in order to save the Constitution and not to overthrow it?

Mr. HOWARD. Such a state of things is not conceivable.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I said I could conceive of it. Of course if the Senator cannot, it is a different matter with him.

Mr. HOWARD. I cannot conceive of such a state of things under the Constitution. If the President of the United States shall himself become a rebel, if he shall take arms in his hands or employ the Army or the Navy of the United States, or exercise any of his other executive functions for the direct and palpable purpose of overthrowing the Government of the United States, then, sir, he becomes a traitor and is deserving of a traitor's doom.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What remedy, then, is there but insurrection?

Mr. HOWARD. You would hardly call a rising of the people to assert their rights and to maintain their Government against a traitor in the executive chair an insurrection. It would be an abuse of terms.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You may call it what you like. That was the idea that I conveyed palpably, that I could conceive of a state of things when the people must rise and take matters into their own hands, not to overthrow the Government, but to protect and to preserve it. That was the idea.

Mr. HOWARD. If I understood the language of the Senator, it was that he could conceive of a state of things in which the conduct of the Executive Government might be so tyrannical and oppressive as to justify an insurrection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Precisely. I say that still. That is the same idea in different words.

Mr. HOWARD. I can conceive of no such legal state of things. We are sworn to support the Constitution of the United States, and by that oath we are bound. The support of that Constitution implies every reasonable effort which we can make on our part to uphold and continue that Constitution in force, and to preserve the Government organized under it.

I set up no particular immunity in favor of the Executive Government of the United States against debate in this body or in the body at the other end of the Capitol. I claim for them no immunity. I set up no impeccability on the part of the President of the United States by which he is to be shielded either from resolutions or from debates uttered in this body. The conduct of the executive officers is as much a subject of fair comment in this body as the conduct of any other portion of the people of the United States, and nobody will pretend to deny it. Sir, I go further; I hold it to be our right fully to discuss and to express our opinions upon every act of the Executive Government, although that act may turn out to be a full and just foundation for an impeachment of the President of the United States. We are acting here in our legislative capacity; but when the question shall arise before us as a judicial body whether the President or any other individual charged with high crimes and misdemeanors is actually guilty of the charge, we must then assume the judicial functions, and pass upon the question impartially, and according to our oaths of office.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Suppose he has an army at his back, and will not submit to judicial trial, what will you do then?

Mr. HOWARD. He is then a rebel; he is then an outlaw.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What can you do then but fight him, or call on the people to fight him?

Mr. HOWARD. The Senator from Maine may put me a thousand questions as to what might arise from a state of absolute and universal anarchy throughout the country, and I should be just as unable to answer them as he; but I am speaking of a Government of law as it now exists. I should be very likely to fight, and fight, I dare say, as sharply and thoroughly as the Senator from Maine would in the case which he supposes.

But, sir, I hold it not to be the right of a Senator here by resolution or in debate to teach or inculcate treason or insurrection. It is contrary to the oath which we have taken. It conflicts with the very essence of the first duty which we owe to the Government and to the people living under it. It is an attempt in the highest possible place of the Government to assassinate the Government itself and to throw the country into absolute anarchy; and it was on account of this opinion of mine that I argued somewhat strenuously, but I still think justly and fairly, the propriety of censuring the Senator from Kentucky for the string of resolutions which he has introduced, and which in my judgment do inculcate treason and insurrection. I shall not, however, as I remarked before, interpose any objection to the course that my friend from Massachusetts may see fit to take with his resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I yield, Mr. President, to no man in or out of the Senate in devotion to free speech, to a free press, to free men, to a free country, to a free world. During more than twenty years of public life, at all times I have endeavored, by precept and example, to sustain the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and the freedom of man of every clime and race. But, sir, while I believe in the freedom of speech and of action, here and everywhere, I also believe in the right of the nation to hold men responsible for their words and their acts when those words and acts give aid and comfort to enemies who are seeking to blot it from the muster-roll of nations. The land resounds with the tread of more than a million of armed men; its waters are reddened and its fields are stained by the blood of civil war. The nation is staggering under the blows rained upon it by armed treason. The President of the United States is bending beneath the burden that presses upon him in his gigantic labors to carry the Republic through the fire and blood of revolution to peace, freedom, and unity. The President of the United States is known at home, is known abroad, is known by everybody to be one of the most moderate, just, humane, kind, and generous of men. Honest, conscientious, magnanimous, he ever leans to the side of humanity. This Chief Magistrate, whose name is as immortal as though it were written in letters of light on the bending arches of the skies, is arraigned before the Senate and the country by the Senator from Kentucky in a long series of accusative and vituperative resolutions. If guilty of the accusations preferred against him by the Senator from Kentucky, Abraham Lincoln is the enemy of his country, of the liberties of the people, and deserves to die a tyrant's death and leave a tyrant's name in the history of the Republic. The pen of Jefferson did not trace in the Declaration of Independence a series of the misdeeds of a British king so wanton and wicked as the accusations made in these resolutions by the Senator from Kentucky against the President of the United States, whom he was pleased to denounce the other day as "Abraham the First." But these accusations, born of partisan malignity, fall harmless at the feet of a Chief Magistrate who is shielded by the confidence, affection, and gratitude of the American people.

The Constitution of the United States imposes upon the American people the imperative duty of electing the Chief Magistrate of the Republic. When the Thirty-Sixth Congress assembled four years ago, the nation was preparing itself to discharge that transcendent duty. Then there came into these Halls the bold, arrogant, and domineering chiefs of the slavemasters, who threatened to dismember this Union of constellated Commonwealths if the people of America should dare elect a Chief Magistrate opposed to their sway over the councils of the nation. The Senate Chamber rang with passionate, vehement, and fiery menaces of disunion. It was our painful duty to sit here and listen to these treasonable menaces; but we hurled them back, and branded the men who uttered them as traitors to their country. Here upon this floor we told these plotters of treason that when the bloody work they threatened should begin, we of the North would be the last to go into it, but we would not be the first to come out of it; and to-day they are learning by the bitterest experiences that our defiant words are made true by the constancy and valor of loyal freemen. The ear of the nation grew weary during the first session of the Thirty-Sixth Congress with threats of civil war. But the American people in conscious strength marched to the ballot-box in November, 1860, and made Abraham Lincoln Chief Magistrate of the Republic. Then the men who had threatened to shiver the Union from turret to foundation stone leaped into the rebellion, and raised the standard of revolt against their country. When the Thirty-Sixth Congress reassembled, the rebel leaders came back again more bold, arrogant, and defiant than ever. Once again we were then forced to listen to their treasonable menaces. But they soon left these Chambers, organized the Confederate Government, seized forts and arsenals, erected batteries, opened their devouring fires upon Sumter, and plunged the nation into the nameless horrors of civil war. For nearly three years the nation has been struggling for the preservation of its menaced life against a revolt whose gigantic proportions astonish the nations.

When the nation is struggling for existence; when patriotism bids wealth open its coffers to meet the needs of the imperiled country; when patriotism bids fathers and mothers give the sons of their love and wives their husbands to the harvest of death; when patriotism bids the young men of America in the pride and bloom of manhood rally around the flag of the endangered country; when more than a million and a quarter have rallied around the banners of our unity and power; when they are toiling and fighting and falling and emptying their hearts' blood on the soil of the rebel States; when in northern churchyards fallen heroes sleep their last sleep; when vacant chairs are around tens of thousands of northern firesides; when thousands of families sit in mourning over two hundred thousand young men lying in bloody graves—in this hour, when every conviction of the soul and every pulsation of the heart should be with and for our struggling country, the Senator from Kentucky comes into this Chamber, presents this long series of accusations against the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, invokes the American people to revolt against their war leaders, and take matters pertaining to their country, the mighty issues of peace and war, the transcendent interests of the present and of coming ages, into their own hands. Senators, in their abounding charity, may pardon the Senator from Kentucky for this act; but the hearts of the toiling, struggling people of loyal America, whose dear and loved ones are baring their bosoms to the shot and shell and murderous rifle of rebel legions, will pardon him never; no, sir, never.

The Senator from Kentucky, not in a speech uttered here in the heat and excitement of debate, but in studied and measured phrase, invokes the people North and the people South to revolt against their war leaders, take the matters pertaining to the administration of the Government into their own hands, and elect members of a national convention of all the States, to terminate the war and adjust and reconstruct the Government. The plain, obvious meaning of this word revolt in this connection is clear to the comprehension of every intelligent man in America. It means in this connection precisely what it means in the sixteenth and seventeenth resolutions, where it describes and defines the rebellion of Jefferson Davis and his co-peers. The Senator from Kentucky, in the sixteenth and seventeenth resolutions, characterizes this bloody revolution in the so-called confederate States as a revolt. This word revolt in his thirteenth resolution means precisely and exactly the same thing in the connection in which it is used. To revolt means to renounce allegiance, to rebel, to desert, to forsake, to overthrow legitimate authority. This is the obvious import of the word, and no ingenuity, no explanation can make it mean anything else. What is it, sir, for the people to take this matter into their own hands? What matter? The issues of this contest, the issues of peace, of war—everything pertaining to questions of policy or of administration. These phrases in the connection in which they are used mean that the American people shall revolt against the Government of the United States now administered by Abraham Lincoln, and take the powers exercised by him into their own hands. Yes, sir, these phrases mean that the people shall take into their own hands the powers of the Government now exercised by the Secretary of State, by the Secretary of the Treasury, by the Secretary of War, by the Chief Magistrate, and all the men in authority who are acting under his direction and his orders. How are the people to exercise this power? After they have revolted and assumed these powers, how are they to exercise these powers? The Senator points the way: the people are to elect members from all the States to a national convention.

This convention is to assume the powers of a provisional government, representing a people who have revolted and taken matters into their own hands. It is to say to the President, to the Secretary of State, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Secretary of War, to the Congress of the United States, to the judicial tribunals, to the officers of the Government civil and military, this convention embodies the sovereignty of the people and will proceed to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilsmen in the loyal States, and threaten the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter. If such a convention should be elected, if it should assume to exercise the powers belonging to the President and those in authority under the Constitution, it would be nothing more nor nothing less than a revolutionary and treasonable provisional government. If such a convention should assemble, and if its members should attempt to exercise any powers whatever belonging to the Government of the United States, it would be the duty of the President to arrest, to imprison, to try, to convict, to condemn, and to hang the members of that convention for treason. This is the plain and obvious import and meaning of these words and phrases. This is the character of the tribunal the Senator proposes to establish to terminate the war and to reconstruct the Government. He means this, or he means simply that to revolt is not to oppose the Government; that to take the mighty issues of peace and war into their own hands is not to take anything at all; that when this convention of all the States assembles to terminate the war and to reconstruct the Union on principles of compromise it is to do nothing whatever. This is the absurd, impotent, and illogical conclusion the Senator comes to, unless we take his words in their obvious meaning and as they are understood by the common mind of the country.

When the Hartford convention was in session, some one, it is said, asked Josiah Quincy what the result would be; he replied, "a pamphlet." Perhaps, sir, the result of the Senator's mighty revolt of the people, of their taking matters into their own hands and electing delegates to a convention to terminate the war and reconstruct the Government, will be "a pamphlet" of vituperative slanders upon the administrators of the Federal Government, and the recommendation of some conservative reactionist as a candidate for the Presidency. The Senator invites us to witness the tragedy: we see only a farce.

But the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] whose abounding charity made him fertile in excuses, told us that the avowed object to be attained by the Senator from Kentucky modified the plain and obvious import of the language of the resolutions. The people were invoked to revolt, take the powers of the Government into their own hands, elect members to a national convention of all the States to terminate the war, and to restore the Union upon principles of compromise. I was sorry to hear these words fall from the lips of the Senator from Maine. Of course the Senator from Kentucky would ask the people to revolt, assume powers, establish a provisional government, for some purpose that seems good in his eyes. Has the Senator from Maine forgotten that the rebel leaders in these Chambers maintained that secession and civil war must be resorted to to preserve the liberties of their people, their home-bred rights, fireside privileges, and even the Constitution itself? Has he forgotten that the wicked demagogues in the city of New York, in shameless defiance of truth and decency, instilled into the too credulous ear of ignorance the idea that the act for filling the wasted ranks of our armies discriminated against the poor in favor of the rich, till murder clutched its weapon and arson seized its brand, reddened the pavements with blood, and illumined the streets with the light of burning asylums?

As a reason why the people should revolt, why they should take the matter into their own hands, why they should call a convention to terminate the war and to adjust the affairs of the country, it is charged

"That the present Executive Government of the United States has subverted for the time, in large portions of the loyal States, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, and free suffrage, the constitutions and laws of the States and of the United States, the civil courts, and trial by jury."

That is the accusation. "Verily," then, says the Senator, "the people ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take the matter into their own hands!" Then it is charged that the Executive Government of the United States has caused persons

"To be brought before courts created by itself, and to be tried and punished without law, in violation of the constitutional guarantee to the citizen of his right to keep and bear arms, and of his rights of property; it has forcibly deprived as well the loyal as the disloyal of both."

There is another arraignment of the Executive Government flung out to the people as a reason why they should revolt and take the matters into their own hands. Then it is charged that the Executive Government "Has usurped the power to suspend the writ of habeas corpus, and to proclaim martial law, and establish military tribunals in States and parts of States where there was no obstruction to the due administration of the laws of the United States and the States by the civil courts and authorities; and ordered many citizens, who were not connected with the Army or Navy, to be dragged before its drum-head courts, and to be tried by them, for new and strange offenses, declared by itself, and by undefined and indefinable laws, being but the arbitrary will of the court."

That is the charge against the Executive Government of the United States. "Verily," then, the people ought to revolt and take these great matters into their own hands!" Then it is charged that the Executive Government "Has ordained at pleasure a military despotism in the loyal States, by means of courts martial, provost marshals, and military forces, governed neither by law, principles, nor rules, from whose tyranny and oppressions no man can claim immunity."

Here is another accusation, and therefore "the people ought to revolt and take these matters into their own hands!"

Then the President, it is said, "ignores the constitutions of Tennessee and Arkansas, and others that have not been altered in any particular, but are the same that they were before their revolt." That is another reason why the people "ought to revolt and take these matters into their own hands!" Then "the President's project," it is said,

"Is to continue the war upon slavery by his further usurpations of power, and to get together and buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers in the rebel States, give them possession of the polls by interposing the bayonet, as in Maryland, Delaware, and portions of Missouri and Kentucky, and to keep off loyal pro-slavery voters, and thus to form bastard constitutions to abolishize those States."

"Buy up a desperate faction of mendicants and adventurers!" "Give them possession of the polls by interposing the bayonet!" There is another reason why "the people should revolt," says the Senator, "and take these matters into their own hands!" Then the Senator says:

"That at the beginning of the war, under the panic of the defeat of Bull Run, the party in power professed to carry it on for the Constitution, and to put down the rebellion, and vindicate the laws and authority of the United States in the insurgent States, and when that was effected it was to cease. But more than a year ago another and a paramount and unconstitutional one, the total subversion of slavery, was inaugurated by them; and at length to carry on the war in this augmented and perverted form, the annual expenditure on the part of the United States has swollen to one hundred thousand lives; a much larger amount of personal disability, and a thousand millions of money, and yet the wisest cannot see the end of the war. Verily, the people North and the people South ought to revolt against their war leaders, and take this great matter into their own hands, and elect members to a national convention of all the States, to terminate a war that is enriching hundreds of thousands of officers, plunderers, and spoilsmen in the loyal States, and threatens the masses of both sections with irretrievable bankruptcy and indefinite slaughter, and to restore their Union and common Government upon the great principles of liberty and compromise devised by Washington and his associates."

The Senator from Kentucky says the people of the loyal States are resolved into two great parties, the destructives and the conservatives; the first consists of Abraham Lincoln, his office-holders, contractors, and other followers.

"Their real objects are to perpetuate their party power, and to hold possession of the Government to continue the aggrandizement of their leaders, great and small, by almost countless offices and employments, by myriads of plundering contracts, and by putting up to sale the largest amount of spoils that were ever offered to market by any Government on earth. Their object is not to eradicate slavery, but only to abolish its form and the mastery; to subjugate wholly the rebel States, and utterly to revolutionize their political and social organization; to destroy or banish, and strip of their property, all the pro-slavery people, secessionists and anti-secessionists, loyal and disloyal, combatants and non-combatants, old men, women, and children, the decrepit, and the non-compos mentis, all whom they cannot abolishize, and to distribute the lands of the subjugated people among their followers, as was done by the Roman conquerors of their own countrymen; to proclaim a mock freedom to the slaves, but by military power to take possession of the freedmen, and work them for their own profit; to do all this, and also to enslave the white man, by trampling under foot the Constitution and laws of the United States and the States, by the power of a subsidized Army, and, lest it should falter, by hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries, organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General."

"To proclaim a mock freedom to the slave!" "to enslave the white man, by trampling under foot the Constitution and laws of the United States and the States, by the power of a subsidized Army, and, lest it should falter, by hundreds of thousands of negro janizaries, organized for that purpose by the Secretary of War and the Adjutant General!" "Verily," says the Senator, "the people ought to revolt and take this great matter into their own hands."

Sir, if these accusations against the President of the United States, against the Executive Government, against the war leaders, be true, there would be ample justification for revolt and for revolution, for I undertake to say you cannot find in any arraignment of any Government on earth a series of accusations that, if true, make a Government more infamous among men than these arraignments made by the Senator from Kentucky.

Sir, the Senator stands forth in this trial of the country and presents these resolutions, and why?

Why are they here? I will tell you why, and I state it in no spirit of unkindness, for I have none, toward that Senator. He undertook the other day to launch some vulgar flings, some smallish sarcasms at me, but I feel very much as did the man who said when his fractious little wife was berating him, that he did not care much about it, for it did not hurt him, and seemed to do the little thing a great deal of good. [Laughter.] I have, I repeat, no unkind feelings toward the Senator from Kentucky; but why is it that the Senator presents this long series of resolutions that cannot but give aid and comfort to the enemies of his country? If in the dark days of the Revolution, that followed the Declaration of Independence, when timid and conservative men shrank back, some member of the Continental Congress had arraigned the Congress and Washington and the armies and invoked the people of England and of the colonies to revolt against their war leaders, and take the matters into their own hands, to terminate the war, and adjust their differences upon principles of compromise, would not every American, who reads the history that records it, pronounce his act to be a blow aimed at his country, giving aid and comfort to its enemies? So, when the baleful star of the rebellion shall sink down in eternal night, when the star of peace shall ascend the heavens, when our heroes shall come back again to gladden our homes, the loyal heart of America will pronounce this act of the Senator from Kentucky a wicked, unpatriotic measure, which the instinctive patriotism of the nation will pardon, never.

Sir, Senators may rely upon it that the people of the loyal States by an uncounted majority will condemn these resolutions, and will sanction a vote of censure or expulsion. There is no loyal State that would not vote by an immense majority for the expulsion or censure of any Senator of the United States who should bring such accusations as these against the Government, and assume the powers that belong alone to those whom the Constitution has clothed with authority. The people, whose sons are toiling, suffering, bleeding, and dying for the country, are less charitable than Senators around me. The Senator from Kentucky is a bold man—he must be a bold man to pen such resolutions—but he is not bold enough to read the resolutions to any regiment in the armies of the United States. Should he make the attempt, he would have to make a race more fleet than the race he referred to the other day from Bull Run, to keep himself from gracing the highest tree in the vicinity of such regiment. The “subsidized Army” and the “negro janizaries” will not be swift to forgive the Senator from Kentucky.

But I remember that when Congress, in 1861, was struggling, when there were before us a series of proposed amendments to the Constitution to establish and guaranty slavery south of 36° 30' forever in all territory in our possession, or hereafter to be acquired, when we were asked to allow slaveholders to range with their slaves all over the free States and hold them there for temporary purposes, when we were asked to amend the Constitution so that we could not abolish slavery in the District of Columbia without the consent of the slaveholders of Virginia, when we were asked to amend the Constitution so as to take away from the colored citizens in our own States the right of suffrage that they had enjoyed from 1776 to that time, and when we resisted it there was a meeting in Kentucky, at which the Senator was present, which passed a resolution that if the separation of the country should go on, they would amend the Constitution and ask other States to join them. I remember, too, that on the 28th of April, 1861, after Kentucky had refused to respond to the call of the President for troops to defend the capital, the Senator wrote home from Baltimore that Kentucky should arm herself and occupy a position, so that when the country was worn out with this war she could dictate the terms of peace. After that, the Senator came into this body proposing, as was said yesterday by the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] a series of resolutions of the most extraordinary character, and a confiscation bill from which the Senate and the country shrank.

But why is this change? Why is it that Jefferson Davis is not arraigned now in these resolutions, but Abraham Lincoln and his supporters? I will tell you why. The reason is that the Senator from Kentucky has become on this subject of human slavery, when the world is outgrowing it and passing from it, a fanatic; he is to-day—I say it in no offensive sense—drunk with the fanaticism of slavery. That is the truth of it, and every movement made in this body, no matter what it has been, connected with slavery, that Senator has denounced. We found early in the war that traitors were permitted to go within the lines of our armies to hunt for fugitive slaves, and we brought in a simple article of war here to forbid it, and the Senator denounced that bitterly. We brought in a bill to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia and free the national capital forever from slavery and the nation from the shame and disgrace. The Senator then told us defiantly that “If you proceed upon the principle of manumitting all the slaves in that State [Kentucky] that have belonged to persons who were in the rebel army, or who sympathized with the rebel cause, you will find that it is impossible; you will have no power to enforce the law, and you never will enforce it. There is no being in that State who would not rise up in revolt, and in deadly and continuous and never-dying hostility to any such system. We would hold the party in power, we would hold the misguided men in power that would endeavor to force that state upon us as the worst enemies with which the God of heaven had ever cursed us.”

When my colleague brought in a proposition to recognize Hayti and Liberia, the Senator denounced it, and retailed here the vulgar story of John Y. Mason—the man who Colonel Benton said was always satisfied if he had his belly full of oysters and his hands full of cards—who, though one of the chivalry at the court of France, showed that he had none of the instincts of a gentleman when he pronounced the ambassador of Hayti “with his clothes to be worth a thousand dollars.”

Sir, a proposition was made to establish schools to educate five or six thousand colored children in the District of Columbia, to teach them to read God’s Holy Word. The Senator from Kentucky rose in the Senate and denounced it, and undertook to ridicule it by telling the story of an Irishman who wrote home from the island of St. Lucia that if Irishmen came there they all turned negroes, and that we were very likely here in the Senate to turn negroes.

It will thus be seen, sir, that whenever any question connected with slavery has come up, that Senator has rushed to the floor to defend slavery. Every word spoken, every line written, every act performed, that keeps the breath of life in slavery in America for an hour, is now a crime against the unity of the Republic and the life of the nation. Every real statesman in America sees it; the people see it; and slavery is going down; but the Senator from Kentucky does not see it; and that explains his bitter and unrelenting denunciation of the Chief Magistrate of the Republic, and the men who are now administering the Government.

Mr. President, I introduced this resolution, as I said at the time, on my own responsibility. I presented the resolution from what I regarded to be a high sense of duty, and I would do it again, and will do it again whenever I see in the Senate of the United States resolutions brought in here in favor of secession or disunion or civil war. I believe with Major General Banks that “when the national existence is at stake, and the liberties of the people in peril, faction is treason.” But, sir, the Senator from Kentucky, in the letter sent to the Committee on the Judiciary, and in words spoken on this floor, has put upon the enduring records of the Senate his words of renunciation, of qualification, of modification of his language, and friends with whom I am accustomed to act are willing to accept his disclaimers and to take his own construction and interpretation of his language. I am not disposed to be more censorious than others, and therefore I accept these denials, these qualifications, modifications, and reservations.

With these modifications and these denials, these resolutions become simply a farce, the broadest kind of a farce. The whole country will launch its jibes and its jeers at them. They are now nothing; they now mean nothing. “Revolt” does not now mean revolt. The appeal to the people to take the Government into their own hands does not now mean that. The election of members to a national convention to terminate the war and reconstruct the Government does not now mean anything. Nothing can now come of it but a pamphlet, or a respectable conservative gentleman to be beaten for the Presidency. A “subsidized Army” is now no longer a subsidized Army. I do not say that the Senator when he drafted his resolutions was very brave, that when he came to place them before the Senate and the country his courage oozes out of his fingers’ ends. But I certainly think, and the Senate and the country will certainly think, that he is swift in accepting the philosophy of Falstaff, that “discretion is the better part of valor.” But, sir, I accept all the Senator’s explanations, retractions, and disclaimers. The resolutions now mean nothing; they are nothing; and I drop them, and withdraw the resolution for expulsion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. LANE, of Indiana, in the chair.) The Senator from Massachusetts asks leave to withdraw the resolution. It can only be done by general consent. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the resolution is withdrawn.

ADJOURNMENT TILL MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. HALE, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet on Monday next.

COLONIZATION OF COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. WILKINSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if not in his opinion incompatible with the public interests, whether any portion of the appropriation for the colonization of persons of African descent now residing in the District of Columbia to Hayti and Liberia, &c., has been expended, and what steps have been taken to execute the provisions of the act of Congress regulating the colonization of persons of African descent.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. CARLILE] this morning moved to postpone the consideration of the bill to encourage enlistments until to-morrow, which was agreed to. I understand from him that he made the motion because the Senator from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] did not happen to be in his chair. The Senator from Missouri has no objection to proceed to the consideration of the bill to-day, I understand; I therefore move to reconsider that vote, in order to bring the bill up for consideration.

Mr. POWELL. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will not make that motion. I should like to discuss that bill, and I am very unwell to-day.

Mr. WILSON. I suppose the Senator has no objection to allow us to take it up and let some other gentlemen proceed in its discussion.

Mr. POWELL. If other gentlemen desire to proceed, I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate as in Committee of the Whole resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. CLARK in the chair.) The pending question is on the first amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] in line five of section three, after the word “he,” to strike out the words “his mother, and his wife and children,” so that the clause will read:

That when any person of African descent, whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof, shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States he shall forever thereafter be free, &c.

Mr. WILKINSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON. Before I give my vote on that amendment it is proper that I should state to the Senate, or those who may take an interest in the opinion I may have on the question embraced in the amendment, why it is that I shall vote in favor of the amendment.

I doubt very much if any member of the Senate is more anxious to have the country composed entirely of free men and free women than I am. If I had it in my power, and there were not mischiefs, as I think, necessarily to result from bringing that result about at once, I would vote for any measure that would have that effect, and I should therefore not hesitate to vote against this amendment if I believed there was any authority to pass the bill as it stands. I understand the bill to provide that upon the enlistment as a soldier of any man of African descent his wife and his children are at once to be free. No provision is made to compensate the owner of the wife and children if they happen to be slaves, and it of course only applies to such wives and children as are slaves, those who are to be set free, and not those who are now free.

But independent of that, and assuming that that of itself would not be a sufficient objection to the bill, there is another ground upon which I think the bill as it stands is objectionable. From the beginning of the Government up to the present time, as far as I am advised—I mean to the coming in of the present Administration—it has been the conceded doctrine that slavery within the States was an institution depending entirely upon the constitution and laws of the State, with which the Government of the United States had no authority at all to interfere. That was certainly the view entertained by the Convention by whom the Constitution was framed. It was certainly the view entertained in each one of the State conventions of the people by which the Constitution was adopted, and has with equal truth certainly been the course pursued by the Government up to the coming in of the present Administration.

I have not by me what has been called the Chicago platform; but, according to my recollection of it, and in that particular I do not think I can be wrong, it announced the same principle as the one to be pursued by the incoming or the probable incoming Administration. Nor have I the inaugural of the President who was elected upon that platform, or the messages which from time to time he has sent to the Congress of the United States since he became President, but according to my recollection, in no one of his official papers has he attempted to claim for the Government of the United States any authority to interfere with the institution of slavery as it exists by the laws of the State. So far from it, in his original proclamation that was followed up eventually by the proclamation emancipating the slaves, he expressly confined the operation of that proclamation to slaves within the States where there existed a rebellion as against the authority of the United States. He excepted all Maryland; he excepted Kentucky; he excepted portions of Virginia; he excepted portions of Louisiana; and, as I understood, he thought that he was bound to make those exceptions because of his want of power to declare slavery at an end except as a war measure. According to his view the authority which the exigencies of the war might give him did not extend to the States in which there existed no rebellion against the authority of the United States.

Now, Mr. President, I represent the State of Maryland in part, and the Senate are not to be told, whatever dissatisfaction there may have been among certain citizens of Maryland, however they may have sympathized to a greater or to a less extent with this rebellion, and however some of them might have been willing to have Maryland constitute part of the confederacy which has grown out of the rebellion, that Maryland has from the first of this rebellion been true to her constitutional duty. Her laws have never for a moment been silent; nor has the duty of any of her functionaries, as far as I am advised, been other than that of perfect loyalty to the Government of the United States. She therefore stands, as I think, and I submit it to the Senate, entitled precisely to the same protection with reference to this domestic institution that she was entitled to before the rebellion broke out. I suppose that to be perfectly clear. Not having been out of the Union practically; on the contrary, always avowing herself to be in the Union in heart as well as in deed, she is just as much entitled to have such of her domestic institutions as the Constitution of the United States protected, or over which the authority of the United States could not be extended, as Massachusetts or Vermont, or any other State in which this particular institution does not exist, is entitled to have their own domestic concerns unaffected by the authority of the General Government.

We cannot interfere here with any of the institutions of Massachusetts. Massachusetts now, owing to her enterprise, owing to that wonderful enterprise, coupled with the inventive ingenuity of her people and their ever untiring industry, has not only not suffered by the war—materially I mean, except that suffering in which we are all sharers, the loss of our citizens—but on the contrary she has been growing rich. The statistics show that nearly all of the manufacturing establishments of Massachusetts that were before languishing are now in a condition of the most perfect prosperity. Where stock was worthless it is now more than a hundred per cent. above par. Where no dividends were being received, the most extraordinary dividends are now being received. Suppose it was proposed by a Senator from Maryland by legislation, which, in my judgment, would be equally within the province of the Senate or of Congress, to interfere with that particular kind of industry which is now so profitable to Massachusetts. Her Senators would at once say, "That is a matter over which you have no power, with which you have no concern; the Constitution of the United States never contemplated permitting you to come within the limits of Massachusetts and direct her industry."

Now what is our condition? We have thought—we are about to change our opinion as I think—that it was very material to the industry of Maryland that she should have the right to have compulsory labor, and our laws recognized it. The Constitution of the United States recognizes and provides in a certain contingency for its protection. What right have you to interfere? There is and can be but one ground; for if the Constitution of the United States does not give the power in words, if, on the contrary, the power is negatived by express provisions of the Constitution, it can only exist on the ground of military necessity; nothing else. I can understand that that necessity may be resorted to and made the foundation of action on the part of Congress in any legislation which Congress may think advisable as against the rebellious States; and the ground upon which I think so, and a majority of the people of the United States think so, and a majority of the Senate think so, and the Executive thinks so, is that, if this labor is left undisturbed the armies of the rebels will continue to be supported; they may be kept in the field; every man capable of bearing arms may be called out without any danger at all that the State is to suffer in its material wealth, because the laboring population is a slave population.

Now, I can very readily see, and I felt the force of it at the first, and I never doubted the right from the first—and Congress must decide for itself whether the exigency arises, and perhaps the Executive is to decide for itself whether the exigency arises—Congress or the Executive, as the case may be, has the right to decide for itself whether it is advisable to declare this compulsory labor at an end, so as to take from the rebellious States the means of carrying on their warfare. That has been done; and I think it has been done with very good results to a certain extent. But as the power to interfere is to be found alone in the necessity which war has produced, and that war is a war as against the seceding States, I want to know upon what ground of reason is it, upon what ground, I was about to say, of propriety is it—I use the term in no offensive sense—supposed or can be supposed, that you have a right to interfere with this institution in a loyal State whose sons are standing shoulder to shoulder with yourselves, periling life and health and fortune to support the Government?

If I should be restrained, as I certainly would be restrained by what I should consider imperative duty, from refraining to advocate on the floor of the Senate or anywhere else any measure which would strike at the industry of Massachusetts—I select Massachusetts only for illustration—over which the Constitution of the United States gives us no authority and upon the ground that there existed no necessity for such an interference looking to the end to be achieved, the suppression of the rebellion, it seems to me necessarily to result, when I ask for Maryland, or my friend from Missouri [Mr. HENDERSON] asks for Missouri, that you shall not interfere with this particular institution of ours, that you do not put yourself upon the ground on which you have heretofore stood, and the only ground, as I think, upon which you can stand.

Mr. GRIMES. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly.

Mr. GRIMES. Do I understand the Senator to admit that in order to put down the rebellion, if it becomes necessary in order to suppress the re-billion, that we have a right to interfere with the affairs of Massachusetts?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly I do.

Mr. GRIMES. Then I suppose this is a mere question of expediency as to whether it is necessary in order to raise soldiers that we should do this thing in Maryland.

Mr. JOHNSON. I will speak of that in a moment. Mr. President, there is in every Government, and must be in every Government—in the sense in which the term has been used in the past—what may be called a higher law; and that exists, in my judgment, in every nation which finds itself unable under the restrictions of the Constitution suited to a time of peace, or if suited to a time of war found impotent to that end, to go outside of the Constitution and adopt measures that may be found to be absolutely necessary to preserve the life of the nation. I say boldly, and have always said, that if the life of the American nation depends upon transcending any of the particular powers of the Government, I would transcend them; and if I was President of the United States, and Congress was not in session, and I believed that any foreign nation was about to assail the United States and there was no constitutional remedy to save us from the pollution of their footsteps, I would assume the responsibility, and trust to the good sense and the patriotism of the country to defend me.

But I want to know, sir, when my friend from Iowa says that this is a mere plan of raising men, what he means. Does he mean to say that you cannot raise a black man and get him into the service of the United States without setting free his wife and his children, no matter where they are? Has that been found true in the past?

Mr. GRIMES. I will answer the Senator's question. I understand it has been true in the past, and especially in the Senator's own State. I understand that efforts have been made to raise troops in the State of Maryland, and that colored men object to going into the service because they say they are unwilling to leave their families—their wives and their little ones who are dear to them—still in slavery, to be thrust hither and yon, carried out of the State or transferred to some other master, while they are serving the country and helping to hold up its flag. It is for that reason, and for that reason alone, that I am disposed to vote for this proposition. I understand that to be so; and I have it from the very best military authority; and the chairman on Military Affairs will bear testimony to that fact.

Mr. JOHNSON. This is not the only instance, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me to say so, in which I have discovered that it is necessary to go out of our State to ascertain what its actual condition is. I rather think I should be just as likely to know the feelings of the State as the honorable member from Iowa, or those from whom he derives his information; and so far as the particular fact is concerned, I have yet to know that any man who was able to bear arms and whom the military authority of the United States wished to bear arms has not, whether he willed or no, been compelled to bear arms. It is not a volunteering, in the sense in which we use the term. It is, with reference to our slaves, a conscription, literally.

Mr. GRIMES. I profess to have no knowledge personally on the subject. I am not familiar with the slave population or the white population of the State of Maryland. I have stated the authority upon which I have made my statement: that of the military gentlemen to whom the duty of enlisting colored men is intrusted in the State of Maryland; and I think I can appeal to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for the truth of what I say as to their report.

Mr. JOHNSON. I certainly did not doubt that the Senator from Iowa stated what he did state upon information which he derived from others. I do not doubt that at all.

Now, as to the difficulty of raising men, no man on the floor of the Senate or out of it has a higher regard for the State of Massachusetts than I have. It is owing to causes coeval with the existence of the Government, and antecedent to the existence of the Government. There is no State in the Union which during the struggle for our independence more gloriously sustained all the principles of freedom than Massachusetts; nor is there any State in the Union since—she has swerved at times, swerved perhaps from a superfluity of love for freedom—that has done more to sustain the cause of constitutional freedom than Massachusetts. I am not one of those, therefore, who would consent, if it depended on my consent whether the event should happen or not, that any Union should be re-formed leaving Massachusetts out. I want Massachusetts in. So far as depends upon my voice she will never be permitted to go out, even if she desired it. I want to share in the glories which she has won for the Government. I feel a pride just as intense as can be felt by the Senators from Massachusetts in that noble old State.

But I was about to say that, so far as my information goes, there is a great deal more difficulty in getting men in Massachusetts just now than there is in Maryland. Why were both the honorable members from Massachusetts, I think, certainly one of them, so anxious to be permitted to go into other States, to get substitutes and to have them credited to the quota of Massachusetts? Why did they want to get our slaves and have them credited to Massachusetts? I do not blame them, but why was it? Massachusetts wanted the labor of her men at home. She could spare money much more readily than she could spare men. I think that the number of slaves recruited in Maryland within the last year numbers upward of four thousand. I doubt very much—I do not speak from knowledge—whether Massachusetts has within that time recruited so many new men.

We do not propose to go into Massachusetts for the purpose of getting men there and having them credited to our quota. We think we are able to raise our quota among ourselves, and we are raising the quota among our own slaves under the authority of the General Government; so that, as far as the necessity for raising men is concerned, upon which the honorable member from Iowa places, as he supposes, the constitutional authority to pass this legislation, he might as well go into Massachusetts and interfere with any of the domestic institutions of Massachusetts, and put it upon the ground, "Down with your factories; repeal your acts of incorporation; stop your spindles; because it is your manufactories, your corporations, and your spindles that make it your interest to stay at home and not to fight the battles of the country if you can get anybody else to fight them for you." I am sure that the honorable member from Iowa would not suppose that any legislation of that description would be constitutional upon the ground that it is necessary to raise men.

But, sir, as I think, and I speak it with all that respect which I sincerely entertain for the honorable member from Iowa, it is rather injurious to the reputation of the United States to maintain legislation of this kind upon the ground that without it we cannot raise men. I have already said that let the necessity exist, and although I could not do it under the exact terms of the constitutional authority, I would support the Government and preserve the nation. I would not suffer the heritage which is ours to be lost by insisting upon a strict and literal enforcement of constitutional restriction. That is one thing; but being satisfied, as I am, that we are abundantly able to support the Government without violating the Constitution, then in my judgment it is as much my duty to protest against this legislation now as it would have been my duty if it had been proposed before the rebellion broke out.

But there is another thing. When did the Senator from Iowa, or those upon whose information he speaks, find that the slave men of Maryland alone, or rather the wives and the children of the slave men of Maryland, are to be affected by this bill?

Mr. GRIMES. I did not say so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the necessity does not exist.

Mr. GRIMES. I did not state that the people of Maryland alone would be affected by this bill. The Senator misunderstood me if he understood me as saying that. I only referred to Maryland as an illustration of the general proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not misunderstand you. I did not mean to say that the Senator had stated that. Sir, the bill provides that a slave enlisted anywhere, no matter where he may be, whether he be within Maryland or out of Maryland, whether he be within any other of the loyal States or out of the loyal States altogether, is at once to work the emancipation of his wife and his children. He may be in South Carolina; and many a slave in South Carolina, I am sorry to say it, can well claim to have a wife, or perhaps wives and children, within the limits of Maryland. It is one of the vices and the horrible vices of the institution, one that has shocked me from infancy to the present hour, that the whole marital relation is disregarded. They are made to be practically and by education forgetful or ignorant of that relation. When I say they are educated, I mean to say they are kept in absolute ignorance, and out of that, immorality of every description arises, and among the other immoralities is that the connubial relation does not exist.

Now, pass this bill, and you will find it very difficult to prove who has a wife, or how many wives he has. I am not sure if they are not repealed in Maryland; but many of the laws originally, as they were in Maryland, certainly in some of the States, prohibit marriage. The law in Maryland does not prohibit marriage entirely, but prohibits it except with the consent of the master, either of a man or woman. Where it was prohibited altogether there was no marriage. To omit to use the term which would be applicable to such a condition of things, they lived together, but were never man and wife except in the eye of Heaven. How are you going to ascertain whether a man taken here in Virginia has a wife in Maryland? He will say so, and he will prove that the woman whom he claims to be his wife once associated with him. But that, according to our laws, is not marriage; that of course does not constitute husband and wife. I do not think I can be much mistaken in saying that unless you mean to recognize as marriage that which is not marriage, but anything else, the law will be ineffective; and if you do mean to recognize as marriage that which is not marriage, you clearly violate the Constitution; because, I suppose, if anything can be more true than anything else it is that over the concerns of marriage the States have exclusive jurisdiction. What contest there will be if you pass this law! There will be a dozen women claiming freedom: "I am the wife," and "I am the wife," and "I am the wife," and each will be able to prove it by precisely the same evidence. [Laughter.] Honorable Senators are laughing at very grave matters.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We can put in a proviso that but one shall be allowed.

Mr. JOHNSON. But which is to be the one? You do not limit it to Maryland. You pretend to legislate for the slaves of Maryland. You do away with the legislative authority of Maryland. You say to her, "Hands off; it is a matter with which you have nothing to do; we mean to emancipate whoever—be she one or be she many—is the wife or the wives that any man who goes into our Army may have at the time he goes there." Now, is it proper, I was about to say, in no offensive sense, is it decent to get up such a contest? I submit that it is not. I put it entirely upon the ground of an absolute want of authority; which, as I understand, no Senator will pretend to say is in the Constitution; I mean in any express provision to be found in the Constitution, or in any implied authority to be found in the Constitution, but exclusively upon the ground of military necessity that you are to interfere with our institution and take it out of our own hands.

Mr. President, in speaking for Maryland in connection with this topic, it is not to preserve the institution at all. It has no other existence there now than a legal one. There is not a slave there legally who would bring at this day, in the present state of things, ten dollars, except as hire. In other words, they are all now free. How made free? You who think that the institution is one which you have a right, and which you do, in the language of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] who spoke last yesterday, hate, (I am not at all surprised at that,) you think, perhaps, that you have destroyed the institution. It is a great mistake. You had nothing to do with it. Such few of you—I do not mean Senators; I mean your people—such few of your people as desired to do away with it, had as little effect upon it as the air of heaven, and not half as much; for that ought to have humanized, and does humanize, the human heart; and the heart humanized, the institution, sooner or later, must expire. It has been put an end to by that sort of retributive justice which is sure, in the providence of God, to visit crime. The men who were here preaching their treason from these desks, telegraphing from these desks—I saw it, though I was not a member, and my heart burned within me—for their minions, or the deluded masses at home, to seize upon the public property of the United States, its forts, its means, its treasure, its material of war, and who were seeking to seduce from their allegiance officers of the Army and Navy of the United States—they have done it; and they were told that such would be the result. They did not believe it. They believed that your representatives would not have the firmness to try the wager of battle. They believed—I have heard them say so—that a southern regiment could march, without resistance, successfully from Washington to Boston, and challenge for themselves independence in Faneuil Hall. Sad delusion! Gross ignorance of the character of your people! You were free, and you knew its value. You are free and you are brave, because you are free; and, as I have told them over and over again, let the day come when in their madness they should throw down the gage of battle to the free States of the Union, and the day of their domestic institution will have ended. They have done it. I have said it was, as against them, retributive justice. Hoping and believing that their effort will be fruitless, that their treason will fail in its object, that the authority of the Government will be sustained, and the Union be preserved, I thank God that as a compensation for the blood, the treasure, and the agony which have been brought into our households, and into yours, it has stricken now and forever this institution from its place among our States.

But I invoke, not as a petition—as the representative of Maryland I am never here as a petitioner, in the common acceptance of that term. Her revolutionary history speaks for her, as that of Massachusetts speaks for Massachusetts. She has ever been loyal; temporary indications to the contrary everybody among ourselves understood. Some influential gentlemen, virtuous in everything else, high-minded and honorable in everything else, able to take rank in every deliberative body with the wisest and the best that have ever adorned this place, believed that it was to the interest of Maryland to go with the South. They believed, I have no doubt conscientiously, that the time had come when the South had a right to rebel. I endeavored, to the limit of my feeble ability, to convince them of their error from the first. Many have become convinced; the progress of events from time to time has destroyed the delusion; and there exists now within the limits of the State as firm an attachment for the Union as is to be found in any one of the States which yet constitute that galaxy which I hope is to be shortly increased by the return of all the States, to the delight of every lover of freedom the world over.

But I ask you, though not as a petitioner, do not transcend the Constitution so as to wound even the sensibility of our people. Be sure that the necessity upon which you suppose that it may be done exists; and if you can believe that you cannot get our negroes, or men of African descent wherever they may be found, into the military service without declaring them, their wives, and their children to be free, at least provide that the owners of the wife and children shall be paid. You did that here when you abolished slavery in the District. Ours is a much stronger case for the application of that rule of justice. You hate the institution. I do not find fault with you for that. I honor you for it. But we have been brought up under different influences. We have been taught to revere it. With some the teachings have had no effect. With many they have had a very persuasive effect, and they still have. They believe, and honestly believe, not only that the institution is legal, and one over which you have no control, but that it is of divine origin—madness, irreligious, and unchristian, in my judgment—founded upon the fact that the Saviour of the world while He was here never interfered with any existing institution, but only preached peace and good will to man, and all the moral and religious obligations which grow out of a faithful obedience to the law of our creation, without thinking that just as well they might have maintained the rightful, legal, moral, and Christian existence of the thousand of vices with which He did not by any force interfere, or ask for the interference of force. But that is still their impression. You dislike it; and notwithstanding that dislike, your sense of justice—I mean legal justice, I mean moral justice, looking into the condition in which you were at the time—led you to provide that every slave manumitted by your legislation here should be paid for. Now you are about to take ours from us, over whom you have no constitutional control, without paying us for them. I submit whether that is right.

I have been led, Mr. President, to say a great deal more than I anticipated when I got up. My purpose was then simply to state the ground on which I should vote against this section of the bill. With these remarks I leave the question.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will pardon the Chair a moment. The Chair will state that this amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri may be regarded as one entire amendment, though it is to be executed in two different parts of the same section. The Chair, therefore, will cause the whole amendment to be read, and the yeas and nays may be considered as ordered on the whole amendment, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section three, line five, after the word "he" to strike out the words "his mother, and his wife and children," and after the word "notwithstanding," in the seventh line, to insert,

And his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862.

So that the whole section will read as follows:

That when any person of African descent whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he shall forever thereafter be free, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will consider the whole amendment as pending, if there be no objection; but if there be objection, as the yeas and nays have been ordered on the first part of the amendment, the question will be taken on the first part. Is there any objection to the whole amendment being considered as before the Senate? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to discuss the general question involved in this bill at more length than the Senate would be disposed to give to-night.

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator will give way, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will do so with pleasure, but I wish to move, in order that the subject may come up regularly, and as it is an important bill, that it be made a special order.

Mr. SUMNER. If we adjourn now it will be so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Very well.

Mr. SUMNER. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 28, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXPENSES OF ARMORIES, ETC.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the War Department, transmitting a statement of the expenditures at the national armories, &c.; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

NAVIGATION OF THE OHIO.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia, by unanimous consent, presented joint resolutions of the Legislature of West Virginia in relation to the navigation of the Ohio river, and moved that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, and printed.

Mr. MOORHEAD. I hope the resolutions will be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs. The subject is already before that committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be more proper to refer the matter to the Committee on Roads and Canals?

Mr. MOORHEAD. The subject has already been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BLAIR, of West Virginia. I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and move that the resolutions be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to submit to the House a proposition in relation to the discussion of the joint resolution reported from the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to the question of confiscation. I propose, sir, that to-morrow and the next day be set apart by unanimous consent for discussion upon that measure, with the understanding that no other business shall be done, and that no vote shall be taken. That will give gentlemen upon both sides of the House an opportunity to make such remarks as they desire, and we shall thus save the time of the House by removing this subject out of the way of reports from other committees. If there is no objection, I hope that that order will be made.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish to enter a very emphatic objection to that proposition. I hope that all those who are in favor of supporting this Government will help me to get up the bill amendatory of the enrollment law.

Mr. WILSON. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio to withdraw that objection.

Mr. SCHENCK. Under no possible circumstances will I do it.

Mr. WILSON. Then the result will be that the House will adjourn over Saturday, and that we shall lose that much time.

Mr. DAWES. I desire to state to the House that either to-day or to-morrow I wish to ask their attention to some reports from the Committee of Elections, but if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. Wilson] wants to-morrow and the next day, he can have them provided the House will give us an hour or an hour and a half to-day.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to say, with great respect, to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, that I am not prepared to vote upon his bill. He announced yesterday that copies of the substitute proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs would be distributed to members. The substitute has not been distributed, and is now for the first time before the members of the House. Now, it is a very important bill, and I wish to have an opportunity of reading it. I am not prepared to act immediately on that bill, and if it is forced upon us for immediate action, although I desire in all things to sustain the Administration, I cannot sustain it by voting blindly on this bill. I hope the gentleman will give us further time. I shall go with him as far as I can, but we may wish to propose amendments to the bill, and we must have time to prepare them.

Mr. SCHENCK. If it be in order, I desire to state exactly what I desire to do with this enrollment bill. I want to surprise no one, to take advantage of no one, to deprive no member of a full opportunity of investigating the subject so as to vote understandingly upon it.

The gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the bill has not been upon the tables of members. The bill of the Senate, with the substitute proposed by the Military Committee of this House, was printed and laid upon the desks of members the day before yesterday. It was then discovered that the substitute as printed contained many verbal errors; in some instances there were transpositions of clauses and the erroneous numbering of sections.

Yesterday the bill was returned to the Public Printer, in order to have these errors corrected and the bill printed precisely as the amendments were reported from the Committee on Military Affairs. It has been, therefore, substantially before the House for two days. It is now before the House this morning, amended in every particular, with the exception, I believe, of the omission of a single word of no importance.

Under these circumstances what I propose to do to-day in reference to this bill is this: The Committee on Military Affairs is—and I particularly as one representing that committee am—without any disposition to hurry through and carry by improvident and too hasty legislation any measure of great public importance. The very fact that in the committee of which I am a member, members found, as they discussed from time to time the various principles and matters of detail contained in this bill, that their opinions were modified; and some entirely changed, convinces me that the House, as a body, should not legislate hastily on the bill, but should take all reasonable time—considering the emergency of the occasion—for a fair consideration of all amendments that may be proposed, and for a proper discussion. It was with this view, Mr. Speaker, that when I was directed to report the bill to the House, as amended by the Committee on Military Affairs, I first put it to the House to refer it to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. This was done by unanimous consent. I then asked that it might be made the special order for Wednesday last, my motion being submitted on Monday last, the very first day that the bill could be possibly reported back in the House. On the motion to suspend the rules, the only way in which that object could be reached, two-thirds of the House did not sustain me in making it a special order for yesterday. Now, is it necessary for me to speak at any length to members of this House, representatives of various constituencies throughout the country, of the importance of having some action taken on a bill of this kind? This House, together with the other branch of the legislative body, has directed a postponement of the draft till the 1st of March. That time is now fast approaching. The Committee on Military Affairs of the House would have reported some days since a bill independent of the Senate bill, but, on conference with the committee, on comparison of notes, and on looking at the whole subject, it was found that, generally, the views of the Senate committee and of the House committee were so nearly the same that the whole matter could better be considered and understood by the House and passed upon if the committee would wait and offer their bill at the earliest possible opportunity—as they did—as an amendment to the Senate bill; and it is in that shape it comes before us.

If we take up the bill at this time, we cannot reasonably expect, short of a few days, with any discussion of it or any consideration of amendments, to pass it. That will bring us into the next week, and then there will remain little more than three weeks before the 1st of March. Is it necessary that the bill should be passed, and passed soon? All military men, I think, agree, and I think all thoughtful and observant loyal men agree, that within a short time, probably not later than early in April, will come the tug of this war, will come the last despairing mad effort of these rebels once more to break the Union lines, drive back our forces, recover the territory they have lost, and, it may be, make an invasion of the loyal States.

This must be prevented. In order to prevent it we must take every means to obtain men. We must resort to all the resources of the country in order to have men to meet any despairing struggle of that kind that may be made on the part of the rebellion. Three weeks then only being left, even if we undertake to expedite the passage of this bill, is little enough time for preparation, in order, on the one hand by the actual passage of this bill, to stimulate further reenlistments and further recruiting, and on the other hand to throw the Government on the draft in order to supply any lack of men that there may be.

Now, sir, under these circumstances, to oppose making this bill a special order seems to me to amount to nothing more, nothing less, than an attempt to prevent the Government from resorting to the only means left to procure the forces necessary to put an end to the rebellion. I am surprised, therefore, that more than one third of the House should have concurred by their votes in preventing that only action which could be resorted to in order to expedite the passage of the bill. In good faith the Committee on Military Affairs proposed to put the bill where there could be discussion; to put it where there might be a reasonable and fair opportunity to consider it in principle and in detail, and where amendments might be offered. But to put it there and leave it there to be buried under the business of the House and carried over indefinitely, in all human probability beyond the time indicated for the making of the draft, would have been to deny to the Government the benefit of the bill as a means of raising men to carry on the war. I was unwilling, therefore, to have it simply referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the Committee on Military Affairs were unwilling that that should be done unless there was an understanding on both sides of the House that it should be taken up and acted upon speedily.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Let me interrupt the gentleman for a moment. Cannot the gentleman obviate this difficulty by bringing the bill and amendments back into the House and have them considered and acted upon section by section?

Mr. STEVENS. Suppose that the House should agree that the bill be made a special order for Monday next. Would that suit the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. SCHENCK. The emergency is a great one, and I think that an earlier day ought to be fixed.

Mr. STEVENS. As I have stated, I have not yet read the bill before the House, because it has not yet been printed and laid before us. The gentleman from Ohio informed us that an entirely new bill would be presented on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs, and it is only right that we should have an opportunity carefully to examine that proposition. It is very far from my design or wish to obstruct action on the part of the House. I am willing that it shall be made the special order for Monday next.

Mr. SCHENCK. I greatly prefer that it should be made a special order for one day this week. Do not let us adjourn on Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Any such understanding must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. SCHENCK. Gentlemen seem to prefer that the bill should be made a special order for Monday next. I do not object to that, if it be the understanding of the House, namely, that it shall be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for Monday next, and from day to day until disposed of. If that be the understanding, I will withdraw my motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in order to bring the whole matter back into the House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the remarks which I have made apply to a fact which I do not want the House to lose sight of, and that is, that the bill shall be subject to the control of a majority of the House. I do not object that the bill shall remain in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, where members may have an opportunity to discuss it and to amend it, provided that neither debate nor amendment is abused, and the bill is brought back to the House in good time for action.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman's proposition is a fair one; it does not cut off debate or amendments, and I hope that it will be agreed to.

Mr. STILES. Let it be made the special order for Tuesday instead of Monday.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I object.

Mr. BROOKS. I think, Mr. Speaker, that there will be a general concurrence of opinion on the subject if we understand each other. The only doubt that exists in the minds of gentlemen is in reference to how long discussion will be allowed. What length of time does the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs feel disposed to give to the House for discussion of this measure in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Before the gentleman from Ohio answers that question, I hope that I will be permitted to say that, while I am opposed to a conscription, I am nevertheless indisposed to throw any obstacles in the way of action. I agree with the gentleman that whatever is to be done on the subject ought to be done quickly. Although I intend to oppose the bill by every proper parliamentary action, yet I shall not resort to any of its devices to unnecessarily delay action. What we desire to know is what length of time it is proposed to give for discussion?

Mr. SCHENCK. As I have already declared, I am no friend of the previous question, and to legislating under duress. But I cannot answer for what the House may determine to do. If the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and discussed on its merits, section by section, I shall expect the discussion to go on for a reasonable period, say one or two or three days, as may seem to be the disposition of the House. Unless, let me add, I find that gentlemen are only considering the bill as a hook upon which to hang speeches on all manner of subjects, and then I shall ask the House to limit the debate. I believe that five minutes will be sufficient for every gentleman to advocate or oppose the amendments to the details of the bill. If I find that the five minutes' debate is abused, then I shall ask the House to terminate it and confine members to amendments. Every amendment may then be offered until amendment is exhausted.

Mr. BROOKS. Why not fix Thursday or Friday of next week for closing the general debate on the bill?

Mr. STEVENS. If the bill be made a special order, the debate, under the rules, must be confined to the merits of the measure.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. If I understand the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] I think that it is unobjectionable. It is that he consents to a reference of the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; that there shall be full opportunity to discuss the merits of the bill; and that if he discovers we are abusing the privileges which are granted to us he will then propose the five minutes' debate. If that be the understanding, this side of the House I believe will cheerfully agree to it.

Mr. MILLER, of Pennsylvania. The answer of the gentleman from Ohio to a question which I will propose to him will determine my vote in regard to this matter. I ask him whether his idea of duress in reference to legislation is the same as that which is understood to be his idea of duress in reference to the exercise of the elective franchise? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Whenever that question comes up the gentleman shall hear my ideas on that point fully. I am now engaged upon the enrollment act.

I wish it understood, in response to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, that two or three days in such an emergency as we are now in, the bill having probably to be returned to the Senate, would be quite a reasonable length of time to allow debate, excepting the five minutes' debate.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the House will allow us to take up the bill to-morrow, we shall have more time for its discussion than if we postpone it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] is more acceptable to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] asks unanimous consent of the House that the enrollment bill be made the special order for Monday next at two o'clock p. m., and from day to day until disposed of. Is there objection?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I object to making it a special order.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, if it be not made a special order any question may be discussed, and the object of the gentleman from Ohio will be defeated.

Mr. KERNAN. I submit to both sides of the House that it is better to make the bill a special order, because then gentlemen will have to discuss the merits of the bill and nothing else.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I understand that the effect of making the bill a special order will be to keep the subject before the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until disposed of. I object to that.

Mr. SCHENCK. Very well; there is a privileged motion pending, one to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and if gentlemen upon the other side insist upon delay for the purpose of defeating the bill, and will not go into a fair discussion of the measure, I must call up the motion to reconsider.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. SCHENCK. My colleague has not the floor for that purpose.

Mr. YEAMAN. I desire to say, with the permission of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that I hope the objection from this side of the House to making this bill a special order will be withdrawn. It is very important that this bill shall be taken up and acted upon. I think there will be no disposition on any side of the House to indulge in general debate upon it. There will be ample opportunity for gentlemen upon both sides of the House to discuss every subject as fully as they desire. It is necessary, if we intend to do anything at all upon this measure, that it should be done soon. We have an opportunity now, under the proposition of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, to discuss this subject as much as we choose. I appeal, therefore, to gentlemen to allow the bill to be made a special order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. My objection is grounded principally upon the shortness of the time that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is disposed to allow for this discussion. I understand that he proposes to allow only two or three days. Now, sir, a bill of these immense proportions, involving considerations of such a grave character, and upon which so much can be said—a bill which has been discussed in the Senate from the commencement of the session up to the present time—cannot be properly discussed here in two or three days. If the gentleman from Ohio will say that we shall have ample time to discuss the merits of the bill, no extraneous matters to be introduced, I will withdraw my objection to the bill being made a special order. I will say to the gentleman that this bill has not yet been printed and put upon our desks; we know nothing about its details, and I therefore insist that we should have the fullest opportunity to examine the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The bill has been printed for two days.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. It has not been distributed here.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] to withdraw his objection to making this bill a special order.

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. Provided we are allowed ample time for discussion.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman from New York expects me to say that I will give reasonable time for debate, leaving to each gentleman the right to say what a reasonable time is. I think it better to have the matter understood now. But taking into consideration the shortness of the time left, the emergency of the occasion, that this bill must be passed, and passed immediately, when I say two or three days for general discussion I think I state enough. After that there will be an opportunity given for five minutes' discussion, and that is the most profitable sort of discussion in this House. If general consent be given to make the bill a special order I have no more to say. If not, I shall ask for a vote on my motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The proposition is that the bill shall be made the special order for Monday next, at two o'clock; is there objection?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. With no understanding as to the termination of the discussion of the bill in committee? We must have a reasonable time—time which in our estimation is sufficient for its discussion. I am very reluctant, indeed, to be compelled to say that we intend to maintain our rights in this House; that the Constitution and laws of the country give no priority to one side of the House over another; that every member here has his constituents to whom he is responsible, and who look to him to do his duty on this and every other grave question coming before the House. Rather than submit to be compelled to close our mouths in opposition to this infamous, unconstitutional conscription law, we will take advantage of the rules of the House and use them as we best can to prevent such a result.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York object?

Mr. FERNANDO WOOD. I do object.

Mr. SCHENCK. The Constitution makes Congress, of which this House is one branch, a department of the Government; and I presume that it was the intention that, in all the courses of legislation, a majority should control the action of the House. We are here, however, in a position to offer to one third of the House a fair consideration of this subject. That we offered when I moved last Monday to suspend the rules in order to have the bill made a special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There was opposition to that from one third of the House, which opposition, I think, is now plainly developed to mean nothing more nor less than a disposition not to let an enrollment bill be passed at all, and to prevent its consideration as a means of its passage, if that can be also done. If there cannot be general consent to making the bill a special order, I call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which it was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and on that I move the previous question.

Mr. PENDLETON. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask consent to put a question on this subject to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs.

There was no objection.

Mr. KERNAN. I simply desire to inquire whether in the event of the bill being taken from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and brought back to the House, the gentleman will there give such a fair opportunity as he can afford to have the merits of the bill discussed to a reasonable extent and amendments offered.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, I feel disinclined to make any condition in the House. The bill will then be in the control of the House, and the majority of the House can determine, from time to time, how it will dispose of the bill, and how soon it will dispose of it. I am willing to enter into a fair arrangement, considering the shortness of the time, in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; but I am not willing to enter into any arrangement as to what the House may do.

Mr. PENDLETON called for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 47, nays 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Herrick, William Johnson, Kalbfleisch, Knapp, Law, Lazear, Le Blond, Long, Mallory, Marcy, McDowell, McKinney, William H. Miller, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Prayn, Radford, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Voorhees, Chilton A. White, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—47.

Washburn, Webster, Whaley, Williams, Wilder, Wilson, Windom, and Yeaman—94.

So the motion to reconsider was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. WINDOM stated that his colleague, Mr. DONNELLY, had been called from the city yesterday by the death of his child.

Mr. RANDALL, of Kentucky, stated that his colleague, Mr. ANDERSON, was confined to his room by sickness.

The vote was announced as above recorded.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. CHANLER demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 100, nays 44; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, Bailly, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Ancona, Bliss, Brooks, Chanler, Coffroth, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. Morris, Morrison, Nelson, Noble, John O'Neill, Pendleton, Perry, Robinson, Rogers, James S. Rollins, Ross, William G. Steele, Stiles, Strouse, Voorhees, Joseph W. White, Winfield, and Fernando Wood—44.

So the vote referring the bill to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was reconsidered, and the question recurred on the motion to commit the bill.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to postpone the consideration of the bill until Monday next, at two o'clock.

Mr. PENDLETON. I hope no objection will be made to that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

SHELBY REBEL RAID.

Mr. KING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to lay before the House the official report of Brigadier General E. B. Brown, of the department of the Missouri, of his military operations in October last against what was known as the Shelby rebel raid into Missouri.

Mr. BOYD. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate was received, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, notifying the House that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A bill (S. No. 12) extending the time within which the States and Territories may accept the grant of lands made by the act entitled "An act donating public lands to the several States and Territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanic arts," approved July 2, 1862;

A bill (S. No. 60) amendatory of the homestead law, and for other purposes; and

A bill (S. No. 65) to provide for the payment of the claims of Peruvian citizens under the convention between the United States and Peru of the 12th of January, 1863.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

The House again resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862.

Mr. WILSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that to-morrow and the next day, Friday and Saturday, be set apart for the discussion of this joint resolution, with the understanding that no business be transacted, so that the discussion may be finished and the resolution put out of the way, giving the committees of the House an opportunity to report other business.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a resolution which I know will meet the approbation of the other side of the House.

Mr. WILSON. I object, and ask that the discussion of this joint resolution may proceed.

Mr. FINCK. Mr. Speaker, the debate on the resolution under consideration has led to the examination and discussion of questions of grave interest to the country, and demand from this House, as I have no doubt they will receive from the people, a most careful and prudent consideration.

We live, Mr. Speaker, in an eventful period of the history of this nation. Everything seems to be unsettled and thrown upon a sea of uncertainty. Plain provisions of the Constitution, which have heretofore been regarded as settled beyond controversy, are now called in question, and new and unheard-of constructions placed upon them. The provision contained in the third section of article three of the Constitution, which provides that "the Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted," is now gravely argued in this House by astute lawyers and distinguished statesmen to mean that Congress may, in declaring the punishment of treason, provide for the forfeiture of the estate not for life only but in fee. Sir, before the year 1862 there did not exist in this country any difference of opinion upon this clause of the Constitution. No one dreamed that the Constitution had vested in Congress any power of declaring a forfeiture beyond the life of the person convicted of treason; but that by express provision the forfeiture was to be limited to the life of the traitor. That such was the construction of the framers of the Constitution is evidenced by the writings of James Madison, justly entitled to be called the father of the Constitution, and by the legislation of the First Congress, of which many of the framers of the Constitution were members. The opinions of Justice Story, already cited in this debate, show how clear that distinguished jurist was on this question.

Sir, I was about to say that I was astonished that there should exist in this House any difference of opinion upon a clause of the Constitution which has for more than seventy years been regarded beyond controversy; but the sad occurrences which have unfortunately taken place in this country within the last three years admonish me that I should not be astonished at anything. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has exhibited more boldness and frankness in this discussion than any gentleman on that side of the House. He does not seek by any subterfuge to avoid the force of this provision of the Constitution, so plain in itself, but marches boldly out, the leader of his side of the House, and takes the distinct ground that the Union is already dissolved, and that this question is one outside of the Constitution. He says that—

"The United States are at war with an acknowledged belligerent, with a foreign nation, and as such war has abrogated all former compacts existing between them, neither the United States, nor the confederate States can, as against the other, claim the aid of the Constitution or the laws passed under it."

That the States in rebellion are no longer a portion of the United States, but are outside of the Union, and are to be conquered and held as subjugated territories; and argues that this Government, on becoming the conqueror, is, by the law of nations, clothed with the right, and should exercise it, to confiscate and appropriate the property of the people of the States thus to be conquered. Well, we have here a distinct recognition of the confederate States, and a concession of what Jeff. Davis and the leaders of the rebellion claim. They insist that they are "outside of the Union," and that the "former compact existing between them" and the United States has been abrogated, and the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania admits it.

The questions discussed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] are of so important a character, and embrace a range of examination somewhat more extensive than anything which has been advanced in this discussion, that I shall feel it my duty to examine the several questions which he has alluded to in his argument. To sustain his position, that the States in rebellion are out of the Union and constitute a foreign nation, the honorable gentleman quotes from Vattel, Phillimore, and Kent, to show that a war between two nations annuls and abrogates the treaties which had existed between the belligerents. Sir, I respectfully submit that the authorities cited are not in point. These States were not held by the force of treaties, but by a Constitution adopted and assented to by each of them, and by their people through their conventions. I fully admit that when a civil war breaks out between the different members of the same society the contending parties are each entitled to all the rights and usages of war as against each other. This is a rule of necessity, and is established by the plainest dictates of humanity and Christian civilization. Writing on this subject, Mr. Wheaton says in his excellent work, page 520:

"A civil war between the different members of the same society is what Grotius calls a mixed war; it is, according to him, public on the side of the established Government, and private on the part of the people resisting its authority. But the general usage of nations regards such a war as entailing both the contending parties to all the rights of war as against each other, and even as respects neutral nations."

But I claim that there is nothing in this sound and necessary principle of public law which implies in a case like ours that these States are outside of the Union and constitute a foreign nation. It is not against the States as such that the war is to be prosecuted, but against the people in the States who are in armed resistance to the authority of the United States.

A rebellion exists within a portion of the States, carried on by a portion of the people in those States. They have for the time being prevented the execution of the Federal laws within certain boundaries, but their ordinances of secession, being invalid and unconstitutional, no force which they may bring to maintain such acts can give them legality until they shall successfully establish their separation, and this would be successful revolution, and constitute them before the world a distinct nation.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, this unfortunate result of breaking up the Union may be averted by wise and prudent statesmanship; but, sir, I do not believe the policy advocated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] or that which is presented by the President can do so. Sir, I am for the Union of these States, not as subjugated and conquered States, but as equal States, such as our fathers intended them to be.

The people I have the honor to represent on this floor are for the old Union. I believe the people of the entire Northwest are for that same Union under which they grew up and prospered; but, sir, that Union has been denounced on this floor. The Constitution as it is and the Union as it was are assailed not only by traitors in arms, but by gentlemen in this House. They want an amended Union, an amended Constitution.

Sir, if the policy of this Administration and its friends shall prevail, we never shall have the Union as it was nor the Constitution as it is. Sir, was it for some other Union, some other Constitution, that a million and a half of brave and gallant men have been sent to the field and a debt of two or three thousand million dollars incurred? Sir, is all this sacrifice of blood and treasure to result in the dissolution of the old Union and the permanent change of the old Constitution? I trust not.

Mr. Speaker, we stand before the world to-day a great military Power. The development of the strength and vast resources of this country during the war, both upon the sea and upon the land, have astonished the world, and are perhaps unparalleled in history; and who doubts, if this combined strength had been used for the simple and the single purpose of vindicating the rightful authority of the United States, and restoring all the States with their rights and local institutions unimpaired to the Union, accompanied by a wise and conciliatory course of civil policy, that the struggle would now be closed, the Union restored?

If this war is to be continued for some other and different purpose, if it is to be waged against the property and local institutions of the States and for the purpose of subjugation and conquest, as advocated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] it cannot fail to excite more desperate and united opposition on the part of the South and continue the struggle much longer, and finally terminate in the permanent dissolution of the Union. Sir, there is a limit beyond which this war, and beyond which no war can be continued, without utter and complete bankruptcy and exhaustion. It must sooner or later come to an end, and it becomes us wisely and carefully to consider whether the highest considerations of patriotism and duty to the people of this country do not require that this war shall be limited to the purposes announced on the part of this Government at the commencement.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot concur in the doctrine advocated here by the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] on the subject of confiscation, either as applied to real or personal property. I understand him to maintain that by the laws of war the conqueror may seize and convert everything that belongs to the enemy, not only public property, and the territory of the enemy, but also the private property of individuals, men, women, and children, both movables and immovables.

Sir, no such instance has taken place since the conquest of England by William of Normandy, unless indeed the case quoted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] of the conduct of England with her subjects in India be authority. Sir, it seems to me this is the last authority which should be quoted before this House. The conduct of Great Britain toward her India possessions has been marked by a violation of every law, public and private, and I trust will never be adopted by this country, and no such doctrine has up to this time been recognized or assented to by the United States, as I will endeavor to show before I close.

And now, first, as to real estate. By a conquest of an enemy's territory the successful party does not obtain such absolute rights to the real estate as will warrant him in disposing of the soil. He only obtains the mere right of occupancy, and the possession does not ripen into title unless it shall be confirmed by treaty or by the total abandonment by the conquered party of an effort to regain it. But this doctrine does not include private property, and has reference only to the property of the belligerent enemy—to public property. On this question Mr. Wheaton, in his excellent Treatise on International Law, pages 596 and 597, says:

"In ancient times both the movable and immovable property of the vanquished passed to the conqueror. Such was the Roman law of war, often asserted with unrelenting severity; and such was the fate of the Roman provinces subdued by the northern barbarians on the decline and fall of the western empire. A large portion, from one third to two thirds of the lands belonging to the vanquished provincials, was confiscated and partitioned among the conquerors."

"The last example in Europe of such a conquest was that of England by William of Normandy. Since that period among the civilized nations of Christendom conquest, even when confirmed by a treaty of peace, has been followed by no general or partial transmission of landed property. The property belonging to the Government of the vanquished nation passes to the victorious State, which also takes the place of the former sovereign in respect to the eminent domain. In other respects private rights are unaffected by conquest."

This authority is direct and in point, and the same principle of law has been recognized by this Government on several occasions, to which I shall refer hereafter.

Allow me again to read from Wheaton, pages 682 and 683:

"We have seen that a firm possession, or the sentence of a competent court, is sufficient to confirm the captor's title to personal property or movables taken in war. A different rule is applied to real property or immovables. The original owner of this species of property is entitled to what is called the postliminy, and the title required in war must be confirmed by a treaty of peace before it can be considered as completely valid. This rule cannot be frequently applied to the case of mere private property, which by the general usage of modern nations is exempt from confiscation. It only becomes practically important in questions arising out of alienations of real property belonging to the Government made by the opposite belligerent while in military occupation of the country. Such a title must be expressly confirmed by the treaty of peace, or by the general operation of the cession of territory made by the enemy in such treaty."

It will be observed that this rule governs the property belonging to the "Government" of the conquered belligerent, and does not apply to "mere private property."

The doctrine that the conqueror may seize, confiscate, and partition the private property of the men, women, and children of the enemy, as claimed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] is one on which the United States has never acted, but has expressly repudiated, and is a principle which its people will be slow to adopt. But the rule could not be applied, even if it existed, as claimed by the honorable gentleman, to the war now existing between this Government and those in rebellion against it, for the plain reason that this war cannot result in such conquest as that claimed by the honorable gentleman, [Mr. STEVENS.] The usurped or de facto government has for the time being excluded the United States from the exercise of their legitimate jurisdiction within certain districts of country; but this de facto power is merely a usurpation, and has no legal title to any of the territory over which it now exercises jurisdiction, and holds by the mere naked right of possession. It has no such legal and firm rights as, on the complete success of this Government in regaining its jurisdiction, will vest any additional right in this Government which it did not possess prior to the rebellion. We merely come again into the possession and exercise of the rights and jurisdiction of which we have been deprived by the unlawful organization of the confederates; and when we so regain that jurisdiction we can only exercise it under and by virtue of the Constitution of the United States, and not in the character of conqueror.

But I ask gentlemen on the other side how they regard those who are within the jurisdiction of the de facto government, and who have aided in the rebellion? Do they concur in the views of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS? Are they to be regarded as citizens of the United States, and subject to our laws, or as citizens of a belligerent Power? If as citizens subject to our laws, then it is clear, as already stated in this debate, that they can only be punished and deprived of their property under the provisions of our laws, passed in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution provides what shall constitute treason, how it shall be proved, the place where, and how the accused shall be tried.

Congress has been limited in its power to legislate upon the subject of treason, as it has been on many other subjects. The punishment which may be inflicted by way of forfeiture has been limited by express provision.

Now, I contend that the Constitution having defined what shall constitute treason, Congress cannot by legislation make it something else, and impose penalties prohibited by the Constitution; because if Congress may by some new name provide for the punishment of levying war against the United States by imposing new and additional penalties and a different mode of trial from those provided for in the Constitution, the limitation upon Congress referred to becomes a mere idle prohibition.

Having thus briefly considered the question of the confiscation as to real estate, let us for a few moments examine the right of one belligerent to seize and confiscate the personal property belonging to private persons of the other belligerent; and in this connection it will be proper to consider the proclamation of the President in relation to emancipation, and in relation to the mode by which he proposes to bring this war to a close.

In the publication of the proclamation of December 8, 1863, I understand the President has concluded that the period had arrived when it would be proper to propose some terms of adjustment for our difficulties which might result in the restoration of peace. This proposition is founded upon the theory of the emancipation proclamation, and requires of that class of persons it is intended to embrace an oath to support the emancipation proclamations; and it thus becomes legitimate in this connection to examine the power of this Government to emancipate slaves, either as a power under the Constitution or as a war power. Under the Constitution of the United States we clearly have no power to interfere with slavery in the States. This has been repeatedly declared and announced by every department of the Government, by the Executive, by Congress, and by the Supreme Court.

Congress as early as 1790 declared by resolution—

"That Congress have no authority to interfere in the emancipation of slaves or in the treatment of them in any of the States, it remaining with the several States alone to provide rules and regulations therein which humanity and true policy may require."

And on the 11th of February, 1861, a similar resolution was adopted by the House of Representatives without one dissenting vote.

On the 4th day of March, 1861, Mr. Lincoln declared in his inaugural address:

"I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so, and I have no inclination to do so."

And after the rebellion broke out, when Fort Sumter was attacked, the President, in the proclamation which he issued for seventy-five thousand men, after reciting that combinations against the execution of the laws too powerful to be suppressed by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings existed, he calls on these men "to suppress said combinations and cause the laws to be executed." He further states:

"The utmost care will be observed, consistently with the object aforesaid, to avoid any devastations, any destruction of or any interference with property, or disturbance of peaceful citizens in any part of the country."

But these declarations do not end here. * Let me add the plain and complete statement made by the Secretary of State, Mr. Seward, in his letter of 22d April, 1861, written to Hon. William L. Dayton, our minister at Paris. This letter, it will be observed, was written after the commencement of hostilities, and after the call had been made for the seventy-five thousand men; and it seems to me to leave no doubt as to the opinions then entertained by the President of his powers in relation to the institutions of the States:

"Moral and physical causes have determined inflexibly the character of each one of the Territories over which the dispute has arisen, and both parties, after the election, harmoniously agreed on all the Federal laws required for their organization. The Territories will remain in all respects the same, whether the revolution shall succeed or shall fail. The condition of slavery in the several States will remain just the same whether it succeed or fail. There is not even a pretext for the complaint that the disaffected States are to be conquered by the United States if the revolution fail; for the rights of the States, and the condition of every human being in them, will remain subject to exactly the same laws and forms of administration, whether the revolution shall succeed or whether it shall fail. In the one case, the States would be federally connected with the new confederacy; in the other, they would, as now, be members of the United States; but their constitutions and laws, customs, habits, and institutions, in either case will remain the same.

"It is hardly necessary to add to this incontestable statement the further fact that the new President, as well as the citizens through whose suffrages he has come into the Administration, has always repudiated all designs whatever and wherever imputed to him and them of disturbing the system of slavery as it is existing under the Constitution and laws. The case, however, would not be fully presented if I were to omit to say that any such effort on his part would be unconstitutional, and all his actions in that direction would be prevented by the judicial authority, even though they were assented to by Congress and the people."

In July of the same year, Congress passed the celebrated Crittenden resolution, by which it was declared—

"That in this national emergency Congress will forget all feeling of mere passion or resentment, and will recollect only its duty to the country; that the war is not waged on our part in any spirit of oppression, nor in any spirit of conquest or subjugation, nor for the purpose of overthrowing or interfering with the rights or established institutions of those States; but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution, and preserve the Union with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired; and as soon as these objects are attained the war ought to cease."

I understand now, from the action on the other side of the House, and by the action of the President of the United States, that all these public pledges and solemn declarations are repudiated, and that this war is to be waged for "conquest and subjugation," and "for the purpose of overthrowing and interfering with the rights and established institutions of the States."

I wish to inquire where the President finds power to accomplish that which Mr. Seward, in the letter already quoted, said would "be unconstitutional." It will not, I suppose, be pretended by the other side of the House that the President has any constitutional power to interfere with slavery or private property or the local institutions of the States.

Sir, I desire to state it as my deliberate opinion that if the principles declared in the resolution of that wise and lamented statesman, Mr. Crittenden, had been in good faith adhered to and maintained, the rebellion would have been subdued before this and the Union restored. How is this power of emancipation exercised? On the theory of the President and by that of the learned gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] it is one of the legitimate powers of war, which one belligerent may exercise against another. Well, Mr. Speaker, I take issue on that question. I assert it here as a principle, recognized and enforced at least on one memorable occasion by this country, that private property on land is not subject to seizure and confiscation by an enemy.

Sir, I do not defend slavery. I am not its advocate or friend. I have no interest whatever in the institution. If it must die as a legitimate result of the organization of the rebellion, let it perish; but I beseech you let not the blow be struck by this Government in violation of the organic law and the rights of the States. I am now arguing a question of power, the exercise of which I believe unwarranted either by the Constitution of the United States or by the law of nations, and which I believe can only result in prolonging this unfortunate contest. Well, if this power to emancipate slaves cannot be found to be authorized by the Constitution, as I apprehend no man will contend who is at all acquainted with the provisions of that instrument, can it be deduced from the war power as a belligerent right under the theory of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS?] I insist that it cannot.

I respectfully submit to this House that this Government has already fully discussed this question, and, so far as it could do so, has committed itself to the doctrine "that the emancipation of enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war." I refer to the questions growing out of the treaty of Ghent, and the discussion of this precise question, which was conducted on our part mainly by John Quincy Adams.

In the war of 1812, which was waged by us in vindication of "free trade and sailors' rights," one of the means employed by Great Britain to cripple and weaken the United States was by seizing and emancipating slaves in the southern States.

Admiral Cochrane issued proclamations to induce the desertion of slaves from their masters, and British generals in the army took possession of large numbers. At least three thousand were carried away, besides which ten times that number who had been enticed from their masters died of disease in British camps, and it became a question of great interest whether an enemy under the law of nations had the right to emancipate the slaves of a belligerent. The question led to a long and able discussion, and resulted in fixing an obligation on the part of Great Britain to pay for the slaves she had thus seized and emancipated, amounting to about a million and a quarter of dollars; and this payment was made on a claim set up by this Government, and I think successfully maintained, "that the emancipation of enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war."

The question had been referred by the respective Governments to the arbitration of the Emperor of Russia; and Mr. Adams, as Secretary of State, in the instructions which he prepared for our minister at St. Petersburg, under date of July 5, 1820, asserts broadly the doctrine that slaves belonging to private individuals are private property, and could not be lawfully taken.

He writes:

"With the exception of maritime captures, private property in captured places is by the laws of nations respected; none could lawfully be taken." * * * "The British nation, as well as the United States, consider slaves as property; slaves belonging to private individuals as private property."

Again, in writing to Mr. Rush, then at London, on the 7th of July, 1820, Mr. Adams asserts the doctrine in clear and distinct terms. He says:

"The principle is that the emancipation of enemy's slaves is not among the acts of legitimate war. As relates to the owners, it is a destruction of private property nowhere warranted by the usages of war. This principle must, I think, be peculiarly familiar to the Emperor of Russia, and may be pressed upon his attention in the case of reference with effect."

But in a letter written by him to Mr. Middleton on the same subject, bearing date October 18, 1820, the Secretary of State, Mr. Adams, urges the same doctrine with still greater force and earnestness:

He says:

"In the statement of the British ground of argument upon the claim in the submission, they have broadly asserted the right of emancipating slaves—private property—as a legitimate right of war. This is utterly incomprehensible on the part of a nation whose subjects had slaves by millions, and who in this very treaty recognized them as private property. No such right is acknowledged as a law of war by writers who admit any limitation. The right of putting to death all prisoners in cold blood and without special cause might as well be pretended to be a law of war, or the right to use poisoned weapons, or to assassinate. I think the emperor will not recognize the right of emancipation a legiti-mate warfare, and am persuaded you will present the arguments against it."

Mr. Benton, speaking of the result of this controversy in his Thirty Years in the Senate, declares that

"The indemnity exacted carried along with it the condemnation of the practice as a spoliation of private property to be atoned for, and was both a compensation for the past and a warning for the future. It implied a responsibility which no power or art or time could evade, and the principle of which being established, there will be no need for arbitrations."

It seems to me that this discussion with Great Britain, maintained on our part on the principle that slaves were private property, and that by the usages of war the destruction of private property was not warranted, and after receiving pay for the "private property" thus claimed by our Government and by Mr. Adams to have been seized by Great Britain in violation of the law of nations, should now be considered by this country as settling the question so far as this Government is concerned, and we should now be estopped from calling it in question; unless, indeed, we shall first return the money which was paid us by Great Britain, and repudiate the action of this country in that controversy.

But we have repeatedly recognized the doctrine that private property is not, by the usage of nations, subject to seizure and confiscation by an enemy. Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of the United States vs. Percheman, (7 Peters,) lays down the rule that private property, by the modern usages of nations, is not subject to be seized and confiscated by an enemy, and I am surprised to hear the gentleman from Pennsylvania so earnestly controverting this doctrine.

Gentlemen will also remember the able correspondence of Mr. Secretary Marcy with the French minister, Count Sartiges, having reference to the propositions of public law laid down by the congress at Paris, in which it was claimed by that distinguished statesman that the doctrine that private property on land should be exempt from seizure by the enemy, and which was fully admitted as a principle of public law in that congress, should also be extended to private property on sea. The correspondence was ably conducted by Mr. Marcy, and reflects lasting credit upon him as a statesman of enlarged and liberal views. I beg the attention of the House while I read a few words from this able State paper. I read from page 38, Message and Documents, 1856-57:

"The wanton pillage or uncompensated appropriation of individual property by an army, even in possession of enemy's country, is against the usages of modern times."

Again:

"The undersigned is directed by the President to say that to this principle of exempting private property upon the ocean as well as upon the land, applied without restriction, he yields a most ready and willing assent."

"The reasons in favor of the doctrine that private property should be exempted from seizure in the operations of war are considered in this enlightened age so controlling as to have secured its partial adoption by all civilized nations; but it would be difficult to find any substantial reasons for the distinction now recognized in its application to such property on land and not to that which is found upon the ocean."

And on page 42, speaking of the practice of seizing private property on sea, he says:

"Justice and humanity demand that this practice should be abandoned, and that the rule in relation to such property on land should be extended to it when found upon the high seas."

Sir, I respectfully submit that the authorities which I have presented establish the doctrine that private property upon land is not, by the modern usages of nations, subject to seizure and confiscation by a belligerent.

But, sir, the paramount and all-absorbing question, which we cannot avoid if we would, and which we should not if we could, still forces itself upon us: How are we to conclude this war, and preserve the union of the States? How does the President and his friends on the other side of this House propose to do it? Not, I answer, by simply breaking down the rebellion and bringing to punishment its most guilty leaders. This will not satisfy the Administration.

Something more is required before the war shall cease. These States must be subjugated and their slaves emancipated. It is not enough that the people in these States shall give up the contest, throw down their arms, and say, "We have been deceived; we will now abandon those leaders who have deceived us, and return again to our true and faithful allegiance to the old Union and Constitution, consecrated by the blood and wisdom of men of all sections of the Republic." No, no, this will not do; but conditions and oaths are to be required, which will substantially effect what the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania claims should be done, namely, to treat the whole of these people as conquered and subjugated, who are not to be allowed to resume their relations with the Federal Government on the condition of the oath of allegiance, but on the condition that they will swear to support the emancipation proclamations of the President and the legislation of Congress on the slavery question.

Gracious Heaven! is this the statesmanship by which the wounds of this bleeding and afflicted country are to be bound up and healed? Sir, to the purpose for which this war was at the beginning declared to be waged is to be added other purposes, which cannot fail to excite renewed and more determined resistance on the part of those in insurrection.

But it is said the oath proposed is only binding on those who take it until the emancipation proclamation shall be declared to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court. But does this render it less objectionable? When the oath is taken the title by which the party held his slaves is practically abandoned, and it would be idle to tell the man, if in the future the Supreme Court should overrule this proclamation, you can have your slaves provided you can get possession of them. The proposition is practically this: that a portion of the people in the insurrectionary States may resume their relations with the Federal Government on condition that they will throw down their arms and admit the right of the President of the United States to dictate what shall be their local institutions. Does any reasonable and fair man believe that this policy will bring peace? Be not deceived, sir. In place of limiting the duration of the war, this proposition will but tend to prolong the unhappy struggle. But the proclamation of the Executive not only proposes to inflict forfeiture on the guilty, but on the innocent also, the widow and the orphan, the man who all the time has been devoted to the Union, whose heart and sympathy has been all the time with the Government, but who, on account of this Government failing to afford him protection, has been compelled to acquiesce in the usurped government. These equally with the guilty are to suffer the loss of their property under the policy of this Administration and its friends. Is it just that this large class of persons, who were thus compelled to submit to the usurped government, shall now be punished by this Government which was unable and failed to afford them protection against these usurpations in their midst? But it is said these men need not take the oath prescribed by the President if they do not desire to do so. Sir, I answer to this that this is the only plan proposed by the President on which to close this war and allow the people to organize State governments.

In my humble judgment, sir, this Government will have discharged its whole duty when it shall have succeeded in breaking down the armed force of the rebellion and brought to punishment such of the guilty leaders as sound prudence and wise statesmanship shall seem to require, and allowing the great masses of the people, on taking an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, to organize their State governments in such manner as they may see fit, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. Any other principle will break down all the well-established and admitted rights of the States, and will in effect establish the right of the Federal Executive, as a war measure, to dictate what shall be the local institutions of the States, because if the President may require obedience to the proclamations in regard to slavery, why not, as a war measure, require obedience to any and all proclamations which he may see fit to issue? Sir, we cannot, I apprehend, safely and consistently with our system of State and Federal governments, admit any such power in the President.

But I have already stated the President had proposed his pardon on conditions to many persons who had not committed treason.

Now, I submit, with great respect, to the consideration of this House the question whether, after the rebellion was organized, and had gained sufficient strength to oust the exercise of jurisdiction on the part of the United States for the time being, and until that jurisdiction was again recovered, the citizen who yielded obedience to such usurped government was guilty of treason, provided he did not voluntarily aid in organizing the rebellion?

It is a principle of the law of nations founded upon both the good sense and necessities of society that protection and allegiance are reciprocal duties, and that when the legitimate Government is by a superior force ousted of its jurisdiction and power, and thus unable to afford protection to the citizens who shall thus be temporarily placed under the power of the usurped government, or the government in possession of the jurisdiction over them, they are not, in yielding obedience to such government while thus in power over them, guilty of treason to the jurisdiction or power displaced; and the sense of the civilized world would be shocked at punishment being inflicted in such cases. The individual cannot at the same time be held to owe allegiance to two adverse and conflicting jurisdictions or governments. So soon as his Government has become unable to protect him, and he is placed under the power and control of the de facto government, his allegiance, for the time being, is suspended to the rightful Government, and he is governed and controlled by the laws and regulations of the power in possession of the jurisdiction over him, and this results from the principle that protection and allegiance are reciprocal duties. This doctrine is well settled in England, as is evidenced by the statute passed at the conclusion of the wars of the Roses, and is also clearly and distinctly laid down by Sir Michael Foster, and by Lord Coke; and "this putteth the duty of the subject upon rational and safe bottom. He knoweth that protection and allegiance are reciprocal duties." We have also an instance in our own history on this point which will illustrate what I desire to say.

During the war of 1812, the British forces obtained possession of the port of Castine, and during the period that the town was thus held by that army American merchants residing there made various importations from the British colonies in violation of the non-intercourse laws.

When the United States afterwards regained possession of Castine, an effort was made to enforce the penalties provided in the non-intercourse acts against these merchants, but the circuit court of the United States held that during the occupation of Castine by the British forces, the jurisdiction of the United States was ousted, and during such period the obligations of obedience of the people were suspended; and the same doctrine was fully recognized and affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States vs. Rice, (4 Wheaton R., 246,) to which case I call the attention of the House, and will read what Justice Story says on this point in the opinion of the court which he delivered in that case. I read from page 254:

"By the conquest and military occupation of Castine, the enemy acquired that firm possession which enabled him to exercise the fullest rights of sovereignty over that place. The sovereignty of the United States over the territory was of course suspended, and the laws of the United States could no longer be rightfully enforced there or be obligatory upon the inhabitants who remained and submitted to the conquerors. By the surrender the inhabitants passed under a temporary allegiance to the British Government, and were governed by such laws and such only as it chose to recognize and impose. From the nature of the case no other laws could be obligatory upon them, for where there is no protection or allegiance or sovereignty there can be no claim to obedience."

If the present unfortunate war is to be controlled by the principles of the laws and usages of nations, then this decision is in point, and will show how unfair and unjust it is to impose the conditions named in the President's late proclamation on that large class of citizens who have the right to claim the principle that "protection and allegiance" are reciprocal duties; and this view of the question, Mr. Speaker, is, I believe, entitled to additional weight and consideration from the fact that at the time of the organization of the so-called confederate government there was a large portion, if not an actual majority, in all these States except two, who were for the old Union and opposed to secession, and who, in the absence of the power and protection of the United States, were forced by the condition of things to acquiesce in the attempted secession. And shall these men, thus abandoned, be required to subscribe to oaths to support the emancipation proclamation, and submit to humiliating conditions?

Is it the part of wisdom and true statesmanship to attempt to enforce such terms? Sir, it seems to me that a mere statement of these facts is quite sufficient to show every fair and candid mind how unwise and unjust the President's proclamation is upon this class of persons.

But, sir, the plan of the President is also unjust and unfair to the northern States, because it not only tends to prolong the war, and thus increase the burdens of the people of these States, but it also proposes to vest the political power in one tenth of the number of citizens in the States in rebellion who voted at the presidential election of 1860. Sir, this would require the continued presence of an army in each of the States to protect this minority from the large majority, and would effectually place these States, thus organized, under the control and influence of the military power, and there is great reason to apprehend that they would be used and controlled as mere political dependencies by the party exercising the power of the administration of the Federal Government in controlling the elections and legislation of the nation. The whole scheme is incompatible with our cherished system of free government, and is fraught with grave danger.

If these States are considered still in the Union—and so I regard them—I ask by what power or principle does the President assume to organize civil governments within their limits or interfere with such organizations? Certainly, under the Constitution he has no such power, and under the war power, which seems to be so enlarged as to include everything this Administration may desire to do, the President can claim no authority to interfere in the civil organization of States, because so soon as the armed resistance in the State is overcome, the people, subject only to the Constitution of the United States and the laws passed in pursuance thereto, must be left free to regulate their own internal concerns; and any other principle would destroy the right of free government.

But on what principle is this one tenth to be represented in Congress; and how many electors for President and Vice President will they be entitled to in the next election? Who are to be deemed citizens in such States? All these questions arise and must be met and answered by the friends of the President's scheme.

One of the acknowledged friends of the President, a distinguished writer in this country, and who was the Administration candidate in New Jersey, in 1862, against the honorable member from that State who sits near the Chair, [Mr. STEELE], writing on this plan of the President uses the following strong and decided language:

"We said we objected primarily to the executive plan because it is an executive plan. Every feature of it is marked by what seems to us an extraordinary assumption of power on the part of the Executive. The President prescribes the oath, prescribes on what conditions the States in rebellion may reorganize State governments and be recognized and represented in Congress as loyal States in the Union. Any one of them, with not less than one tenth of the number of persons who voted in the presidential election of 1860, may reorganize themselves as the State, and have the full Federal representation in Congress to which the State under the census of 1860 was entitled! Why, the President could easily, by the distribution of Federal offices and patronage in any seceded State, unless there are fewer Union men than is pretended, induce at least one tenth, if assured of Federal protection, to swallow without scruple the prescribed oath, or any number of oaths he might prescribe, and elect State and Federal officers whom he may choose to prescribe. With the Federal representation of eleven States, who would be his nominees and creatures, and the number from the other States he could always command by the distribution of the patronage of the Government, the Executive could easily grasp for himself the whole power of the Union, reign as an absolute prince, perpetuate by re-elections his reign during life, and reduce the functions of Congress to that of simply registering his edicts; or, if it should now and then show a disposition to demur, he could, after the manner of Louis XIV, hold a lit de justice."

Sir, if it is proposed to maintain our free system of government, State and national, if it is intended to settle this difficulty in conformity with the Constitution of the United States and the laws of nations, then I undertake here and now, Mr. Speaker, to say that this policy of the Administration cannot be sustained.

But if it be the purpose to disregard the requirements of the Constitution, and to exercise any and all such powers as the Executive may deem necessary, without regard to our system of constitutional government, with a view not only to break down the rebellion, but finally to change if not destroy the rights of the States, then I think I can understand this policy.

Sir, we have fallen upon sad times. In the midst of the universal gloom and sorrow which pervades the whole country, the heart of the true patriot sickens at the daily announcements of the frauds and corruptions which seem to prey upon the vitals of the Republic.

While our armies in the field have during the past year in the main been successful, we have utterly failed in a policy calculated to arouse and encourage the true Union sentiment in the southern States.

What we want in this crisis of affairs is a policy by which the patriotic efforts of the brave men in the field shall be seconded by wise, prudent, and conciliatory statesmanship. This is the need of the country to-day. Let us be guided by the experience of the past. Let this policy of subjugation and conquest and these unwise proclamations of the Executive be abandoned.

Mr. Speaker, let us rise above mere sectional prejudices or party feeling, and humbly and devoutly imploring the guidance of that same Divine Providence who sustained our fathers in the dark hours of the Revolution, and enabled them to achieve our independence and establish this Government; let us act with that regard for the Constitution and interests of the whole country which is demanded in this hour from every son of the Republic; and while we sustain every legitimate and constitutional means which shall be employed to subdue the power of this rebellion, and while our gallant armies in the field shall nobly and bravely perform their duty, let us at the same time, I beseech you, by all fair and honorable means endeavor to restore peace, not a dishonorable or a disgraceful peace, but a peace founded upon just terms to all portions of the country—that true and welcome peace which shall gladden millions of hearts in every section of the land, now saddened by gloom, and which shall bring in loving embrace once more around the nation's altar all the States as equal sisters.

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to ask the attention of the House or to occupy its time on this question of confiscation at all, but some things have been said touching its military aspects which make it proper for me to trespass upon the patience of the House even at this late period of the discussion. Feeling that, in some small degree, I represent on this floor the Army of the Republic, I am the more emboldened to speak to this subject before us. I have been surprised that in so lengthy and able a discussion so little reference has been made to the merits of the resolution itself. Very much of the debate has had reference to questions which I believe, with all deference to the better judgment and mature experience of others, are not germane to the subject before the House. In the wide range of discussion the various theories of the legal and political status of the rebellious States have been examined, whether they exist any longer as States, whether they are in the Union or out of it. It is perhaps necessary that we take ground upon that question as preliminary to the discussion of the resolution itself. Two theories, differing widely from each other, have been proposed; but I cannot consider either of them as wholly correct. I cannot agree with the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. SEEVERS], who acknowledges that these States are out of the Union and now constitute a foreign people; nor can I, on the other hand, agree with those who believe that the insurgent States are not only in the Union, but have lost none of their rights under the Constitution and laws of the Union.

Our situation affords a singular parallel to that of the people of Great Britain in their great revolution of the seventeenth century. From time immemorial it was the fiction of English law that the kingship was immortal, hereditary, and inalienable; that the king was "king by the grace of God;" he could do no wrong, and his throne could never be vacant. But the logic of events brought these questions to a practical test.

James left the throne, threw the great seal of the nation into the Thames, and fleeing from his own people took refuge in France. The great statesmen of the kingdom took counsel together on some of the very questions which we are discussing to-day. One said, "The king has abdicated, and we will put another in his place." Another said, "The crown is hereditary, and we must put the heir in his place." The men of books and black-letter learning answered, "Nemo est hæres viventis;" "the king is alive, and can have no heir." Another said, "We will appoint a regent, and consider the kingship in abeyance until the king returns." The people said, "We will have a king, but not James."

Through all this struggle two facts were apparent: the throne was vacant; and their king was unworthy to fill it; and they filled it with the man of their choice. We are taught by this that whenever a great people desire to do a thing which ought to be done, they will find the means of doing it. In this Government we have thrown off the kingly fiction, but there is another which we are following as slavishly as ever England followed that. Here, corporations are more than kings. It is the doctrine of our common law (if we may be said to have a common law) that corporations have neither souls nor consciences; that they cannot commit crimes; that they cannot be punished, and that they are immortal. These propositions are being applied to the rebel States. They are corporations of a political character, bodies corporate and politic; they are immortal; and cannot be touched by the justice of law, or by the power of an outraged Government. They hover around our borders like malignant, bloody fiends, carrying death in their course; and yet we are told they cannot be punished or their ancient rights invaded. The people of the South, under the direction of those phantom States, are moving the powers of earth and hell to destroy this Government. They plead the order of their States as their shield from punishment, and the States plead the impunity of soulless corporations.

But the American people will not be deluded by these theories nor waste time in discussing them. They will strike through all shams with the sword, and find a practical solution as England did. And what is that practical solution? The Supreme Court of the United States has helped us at this point in one of the prize cases decided March 3, 1863. It is there decided in effect—

"That since July 13, 1861, the United States have full belligerent rights against all persons residing in the districts declared by the President's proclamation to be in rebellion."

"That the laws of war, whether that war be civil or inter gentes, convert every citizen of the hostile State into a public enemy, and treat him accordingly, whatever may have been his previous conduct."

"That all the rights derived from the laws of war may now, since 1861, be lawfully and constitutionally exercised against all the citizens of the districts in rebellion."

They decided there that the same laws of war which apply to hostile foreign States are to be applied to this rebellion. But in so deciding they do not decide that the rebellious States are therefore a foreign people. I do not hold it necessary to admit that they are a foreign people. I do not admit it. I claim on the contrary that the obligations of the Constitution still hang over them; but by their own act of rebellion they have cut themselves off from all their rights and privileges under the Constitution.

When the Government of the United States declared that we were in a state of war, the rebel States came under the laws of war. By their acts of rebellion and war they swept away every vestige of their civil and political rights under the Constitution of the United States. Their obligations still remained; but the reciprocal rights which usually accompany obligations, they had forfeited.

The question then lies open before us: In a state of war, under the laws of war, is this resolution legal and politic? I insist, Mr. Speaker, that the question involved in the resolution before this House is whether this Government, in its exercise of its rights of a belligerent under the laws of war, cannot punish these rebels and confiscate their estates, both personal and real, for life and forever. That is the only question before us.

Gentlemen have learnedly discussed the constitutional powers of Congress to punish the crime of treason. It matters not how that question is decided; it has no bearing whatever on the resolution before the House. I will only say in passing that the Supreme Court has never decided that the clause of the Constitution relating to treason prohibits forfeiture beyond the lifetime of persons attainted. No man in this House has brought a decision of the Supreme Court giving the rendering to the Constitution which these gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber have given to it. They can claim no more than that the question is res non adjudicata. The arguments we have heard are sufficient evidence to me, at least, that the framers of our Constitution intended that Congress should define treason, and provide for its punishment, but the rule of the English common law which permitted attainer, corruption of blood, and forfeiture, after the death of the attainted, should not prevail in this country. To me the clause carries an absurdity on its face, if it be interpreted to mean that treason, the highest crime known to law, shall be punished with less severity, so far as it regards the estate of the criminal, than any other crime or misdemeanor whatsoever. But, as I before said, the present law of confiscation is based on the rights of belligerents under the laws of war. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] a few days since, in his address to the House, gave us a history of the rebellions which had occurred in this country. I wish to call his attention to another rebellion in this country which he did not notice, and in which the question of confiscation was very fully and very practically discussed. This fact has not, I believe, been brought to the attention of the House. Do gentlemen forget that this Union had its origin in revolution, and that confiscation played a very important part in the war of that Revolution? It was a civil war; and the colonies were far more equally divided in reference to the question of loyalty and independence than the States of the South now are on the question of to-day. Many of the thirteen colonies had almost equal parties for and against England in that struggle. In New York the parties were of nearly equal strength. In South Carolina it is claimed that there were more Royalists than Whigs. Twenty thousand American Tories appeared in the armies against us in the revolutionary struggle. Thirty regiments of them held their places in the British line.

Our fathers had to deal with these men, and with their estates. How did they solve the problem? I have looked into the history, and find it full of instruction. Every one of the thirteen colonies, with a single exception, confiscated the real and personal property of every Tory in arms. They did it, too, by the recommendation of Congress. Not only so, but they drove Tory sympathizers from the country; they would not permit them to remain upon American soil. Examine the statutes of every colony, except of New Hampshire, which the tide of battle never reached, and you will find confiscation laws of the most thorough and sweeping character. When our commissioners were negotiating the treaty of peace, the last matter of difference and discussion was that of confiscated property.

The British commissioners urged the restoration of confiscated estates, but Jay and Franklin and their colleagues defended the right of confiscation with great ability, and refused to sign the treaty at all if that was to be a condition. While these negotiations were pending the colonies memorialized Congress to guard against any concessions on the point in dispute. On the 17th day of December, 1782, the Legislature passed the following resolution:

"That the laws of this State confiscating property held under the laws of the former Government (which had been dissolved and made void) by those who have never been admitted into the present social compact, being founded on legal principles, were strongly dictated by that principle of common justice, demand that, if virtuous citizens, in defense of their natural and constitutional rights, risk their life, liberty, and property on their success, the vicious citizens who side with tyranny and oppression, or who cloak themselves under the mask of neutrality, should at least hazard their property, and not enjoy the benefits procured by the labors and dangers of those whose destructions they wished."

"That all demands or requests of the British Court for the restitution of property confiscated by this State, being neither supported by law, equity, or policy, are wholly inadmissible, and that our Delegates in Congress be instructed to move Congress that they may direct their deputies, who shall represent these States in the General Congress for adjusting a peace or truce, neither to agree to any such restitution or submit that the laws made by any independent State of this Union be subjected to the adjudication of any power or powers on earth."

This resolution was passed unanimously by the Legislature of Virginia. Similar resolutions were passed by other States, and our commissioners were instructed by Congress to admit no conditions which would compel the restoration of confiscated estates. The commissioners compromised at last on the fifth article of the treaty of peace as it now stands recorded, which provides that Congress shall recommend to the several colonies to restore confiscated property; but it was well understood by both parties that it would not be done. Congress passed the resolution of recommendation as a matter of form; but no State complied, nor was it expected. It was, however, provided that no further confiscations should be made, and that Tories should be permitted to remain in America twelve months after the treaty.

Mr. Jefferson, when Secretary of State, in 1792, and writing upon that subject, held the following language to the British Government through its minister; and I wish my colleague [Mr. FINCK] who last occupied the floor to notice this extract so far as it relates to the rights of belligerents:

"Sec. 3. It cannot be denied that the state of war strictly permits a nation to seize the property of its enemies found within its own limits, or taken in war, and in whatever form it exists, whether in action or possession. This is so perspicuously laid down by one of the most respectable writers on subjects of this kind, that I shall use his words: 'Since it is a condition of war that enemies may be deprived of all their rights, it is reasonable that everything of an enemy's, found among his enemies, should change its owner, and go to the treasury. It is, moreover, usually directed, in all declarations of war, that the goods of enemies, as well those found among us as those taken in war, shall be confiscated. If we follow the mere right of war, even immovable property may be sold, and its price carried into the treasury, as is the custom with movable property. But in almost all Europe it is only notified that their profits, during the war, shall be received by the treasury; and the war being ended, the immovable property itself is restored by agreement, to the former owner.'"

"1. Exile and confiscations. After premising that these are lawful acts of war, I have shown that the fifth article was recommendatory only, its stipulations being, not to restore the confiscations and exiles, but to recommend to the State Legislatures to restore them;

"That this word, having but one meaning, establishes the intent of the parties; and, moreover, that it was particularly explained by the American negotiators, that the Legislatures would be free to comply with the recommendation or not, and probably would not comply;

"That the British negotiators so understood it;

"That the British ministry so understood it;

"And the members of both Houses of Parliament, as well those who approved as who disapproved the article.

"I have shown that Congress did recommend earnestly and bona fide;

"That the States refused or complied, in a greater or less degree, according to circumstances, but more of them and in a greater degree than was expected."—Jefferson's Works, vol. 3.

And Jefferson concludes the passage by saying that the right to confiscate is undoubted as a war right. He moreover goes on to say the British Government knew they had no right to demand that we should restore confiscated property. The members of Parliament admitted in their speeches that the treaty was based upon the knowledge that they had no right to demand the restitution of confiscated estates.

The Tories that fled to England called upon the Crown to support them. A commission was appointed to examine their claims and provide for their wants. I say it is a significant fact that of the vast number of Tories, perhaps not a thousand remained in this country after the war. The people would not endure their presence. They were driven out, and took refuge in all quarters of the globe. They colonized New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and were scattered along the borders of Canada. The States would not tolerate the presence of the few who came back under the provisions of the treaty, and refused them the right of voting, or of holding office or property. It was well known that there could be no peace between our loyal people and them. Their history is a sad record of infamy, obscurity, and misery. Some exhibited their vengeful hate long after the war was over. Gitty and his associates who murdered Crawford in the Indian wars of 1791 were Tories of the Revolution. Bowles and Panton, leaders among the Creek Indians, and who started the Florida troubles, which resulted in a long and bloody conflict in the swamps of that State, were Tories. As a class, they went out with the brand of Cain upon them, and were not permitted to return.

One State alone relented. South Carolina passed an act of oblivion, restored a large part of the confiscated estates, and permitted the Tories to vote and hold office. Her policy has borne its bitter fruit. Her government has hardly been entitled to be called republican. The spirit of monarchy has ruled her councils, and at last plunged our Republic into the most gigantic and bloody of revolutions.

Let us take counsel from the wisdom of our fathers. Is it probable that those men who confiscated all the property of armed Tories would, a few years later, establish it as a fundamental doctrine of the Constitution that no confiscation can be made beyond the lifetime of the individual attained? It is not probable that men who had just done what they stubbornly held to be right should enact as a part of the supreme law of the land that it should never be done again.

I come now to the question more directly before us. This question of land, Mr. Speaker, is inseparably connected with the peculiar institution of the South. It is well known that the power of slavery rests in large plantations; that the planter's capital drives the poor whites to the mountains, where liberty always loves to dwell, and to the swamps and by-places of the South; but the bulk of all the landed estates is in the hands of the slave-owners who have plotted this great conspiracy. Let me give you an instance of this, one of a thousand that might be given. In the town of Murfreesboro', Rutherford county, Tennessee, a place made sacred and glorious forever by the valor of our Army, there are fourteen thousand four hundred and ninety-three acres of land owned by sixteen persons, and three of the sixteen men own more than ten thousand of the acres. One of the three owns half of the whole township of Murfreesboro'. And that is only a specimen of what these men of the South are to the lands of the South. Only a few hundred men own the bulk of the land in any southern State, and these men hold the lands and own the slaves. These men plotted the rebellion and thrust it upon us. They have had the political power in their hands, and if you permit them to go back to their lands they will have it again. The laws of nature, the laws of society cannot be overcome by the resolutions of Congress. Grant a general amnesty, let these men go back to their lands, and the land-owners will again control the South. They have so long believed themselves born to rule that they will rule the poor man as with a rod of iron. The landless man of the South has learned the lesson of submission so well that when he is confronted by a landed proprietor he begins to be painfully deferential, he is facile and dependent, and less a man than if he stood on God's acre covered by his own title-deed.

Gentlemen, if we want a lasting peace, if we want to put down this rebellion so that it shall stay forever put down, we must put down its guilty cause; we must put down slavery; we must take away the platform on which slavery stands—the great landed estates of the armed rebels of the South. Strike that platform from beneath their feet, take that land away, and divide it into homes for the men who have saved our country. I put that to this House as a necessity which stares us in the face. What, let me ask you, will you do with the battle-fields of the South? Who owns them? Who owns the red field of Stone River? Two or three men own it all. And who are these two or three men? Rebels every one—one of them a man who once sat in this Chamber, but who is now a leader in the ranks of the rebel army. Will you let him come back and repossess his land? Will you ask his permission when you go to visit the grave of your dead son who sleeps in the bosom of that sacred field? If the principles of the gentlemen on the other side be carried out, there is not one of the great battle-fields of the war (save Gettysburg, which lies yonder on this side of the line) that will not descend to the sons of rebels for all time to come—to men whose fathers found a bad eminence by fighting against their country, and who will love their fathers for affection's sake, and love rebellion for their fathers' sake. God forbid that we should ever visit those spots made sacred by the blood of so many thousand brave men and see our enemies holding the fields and plowing the graves of our brethren, while the sweat of slaves falls on the sod which ought to be forever sacred to every American citizen.

The history of opinion and its changes in the Army is a very interesting one. When the war broke out men sprang to arms from all parties by a common impulse of generous patriotism, which I am glad to acknowledge in the presence of those in whose hearts that impulse seems now to have died.

I remember to have said to a friend when I entered the Army, "You hate slavery; so do I; but I hate disunion more. Let us drop the slavery question and fight to sustain the Union. When the supremacy of the Government has been re-established we will attend to the other question." I said it in good faith.

I said to another, "You love slavery. Do you love the Union more? If you do, go with me; we will let slavery alone and fight for the Union. When that is saved we will take up our old quarrel, if there is anything left to quarrel about."

I started out with that position taken in good faith, as did thousands of others of all parties, but the Army soon found, do what it would, the black phantom met it everywhere, in the camp, in the bivouac, on the battle-field, and at all times. It was a ghost that would not be laid—slavery was both the strength and the weakness of the enemy. His strength, for it tilled the fields and fed the legions; its weakness, for in the hearts of slaves dwelt dim prophecies that their deliverance from bondage would be the outcome of the war.

Mr. Seward says in an official dispatch to our minister at St. James, Mr. Adams: "Everywhere the American general receives his most useful and reliable information from the negro, who hails his coming as the harbinger of freedom." These ill-used men came from the cotton-fields, they swam rivers, they climbed mountains, they came through jungles, in the darkness and storms of the night, to tell us that the enemy was coming here or coming there. They were our true friends in every case. There has hardly been a battle, a march, or any important event of the war, where the friend of our cause, the black man, has not been found truthful and helpful, and always devotedly loyal. The practical truth forced itself upon the mind of every soldier that behind the rebel army of soldiers the black army of laborers was feeding and sustaining the rebellion, and there could be no victory till its main support were taken away.

"You take my house when you do take the prop That doth sustain my house."

The rebellion falls when you take away its chief prop, slavery and landed estates.

Gentlemen on the other side, you tell me that this is an abolition war. If you please to say so I grant it. The rapid war-current of events has made the Army of the Republic an abolition Army. I can find you in the ranks a thousand men who are in favor of sweeping away slavery to every dozen that are in favor of sustaining it. They have been where they have seen its malevolence, its baleful effects upon the country and the Union, and they demand that it shall be swept away. I never expected to discuss the demerits of slavery again, for I deem it unnecessary. The fiat has gone forth, and it is dead unless the body-snatchers on the other side of this House shall resurrect it and give it galvanic life.

Mr. CHANLER. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. GARFIELD. I must decline to yield.

Mr. CHANLER. You asked a question of this side of the House, and I merely desired to answer you.

Mr. GARFIELD. You may say to me that slavery is a divine institution; you may prove to your own satisfaction from the word of God, perhaps, that slavery is a beneficent institution; I will say to you that all this may be entirely satisfactory to your mind, but your beloved friend, slavery, is no more. This is a world of bereavements and changes, and I announce to you that your friend has departed. Hang the drapery of mourning on its bier! Go in long and solemn procession after its hearse, if you please, and shed your tears of sorrow over its grave, but I have no time to waste in listening to your tearful eulogy over the deceased.

I come now to consider another point in this question. I hold it as a settled truth that the leaders of this rebellion can never live in peace in this Republic. I do not say it in any spirit of vindictiveness, but as a matter of conviction. Ask the men who have seen them and met them in the darkness of battle and all the rigors of warfare; they will tell you it can never be. I make, of course, an exception in favor of that sad array of men who have been forced or cajoled by their leaders into the ranks and subordinate officers of the rebel army. I believe a truce could be struck to-day between the rank and file of the hostile armies. I believe they could meet and shake hands together joyfully over returning peace, respecting their mutual courage and manhood. But for the wicked men who brought on this rebellion, for the wicked men who led them into the darkness, such a day can never come. Ask the representatives of Kentucky upon this floor who know what the rebellion has been in their State, who know the violence and devastation that has swept over it, and they will tell you that all over that State neighbor has been slaughtered by neighbor, feuds fierce as human hate can make them have sprung up, and so long as revenge has an arm to strike they will never cease to strike if such men come back to dwell in their midst. This is true of every State over which the desolating tide of war has swept. If you would not inaugurate an exterminating warfare, to continue while you and I and our children and children's children live, set it down at once that the leaders of this rebellion must be executed or banished from the Republic. They must follow the fate of the Tories of the Revolution.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the Army is a unit on these great questions; and I must here be permitted to quote from one of nature's noblemen, a man from Virginia with the pride of the Old Dominion in his blood, but who could not be seduced from his patriotism—one who, amid the storm of war that surged against him at Chickamauga, stood firm as a rock in the sea—George H. Thomas. That man wrote a communication to the Secretary of War nearly a year ago, saying, in substance, for I quote from memory, "I send you the inclosed paper from a subordinate officer; I indorse its sentiments; and I will add, that we can never make solid progress against the rebellion until we take more sweeping and severe measures; we must make these people feel the rigors of war, subside our Army upon them, and leave their country so that there will be little in it for them to desire." Thus spoke a man who is very far from being what gentlemen upon the other side of the House are pleased to call an abolitionist, or a northern fanatic; and in saying this he spoke the voice of the Army.

Mr. Speaker, I am surprised and amazed beyond measure at what I have seen in this House. Having been so long with men who had but one thought upon these great themes, it is passing strange to me to hear men talking of the old issues and discussions of a few years ago. They forget that we live in actions and not in years. They forget that sometimes a nation may live a generation in a single year; and the experience of the last three years has been greater than that of centuries of quiet and peace. There are men who do not seem to realize that we are at war. They do not seem to realize that this is a struggle for existence; a terrible fight of flint with flint, bayonet with bayonet, blood for blood. They still retain some hope that they can smile rebellion into peace. They use terms strangely. In these modern days words have lost their significance. If a man steals his thousands from the Treasury, he is not a thief; oh, no; he is a "defaulter." If a man hangs shackles on the limbs of a human being and drives him through life as a slave, it is not man-stealing, it is not even slavery, it is only "another form of civilization." We are using words in that strange way. There are public journals in New York city, I am told, that never call this a rebellion—it is only a "civil commotion," a "fraternal strife." I had thought the days of "southern brethren" and "wayward sisters" had gone by, but I find it here in the high noon of its glory. One would suppose from all we hear that war is gentle and graceful exercise, to be indulged in a quiet and pleasant manner. I have lately seen a stanza from the nursery rhymes of England, which I commend to these gentle-hearted patriots who propose to put down the rebellion with soft words and paper resolutions:

"There was an old man who said, How Shall I flee from this horrible cow?
I will sit on the stile
And continue to smile,
Which may soften the heart of this cow."

I tell you, gentlemen, the heart of this great rebellion cannot be softened by smiles. You cannot send commissioners down to Richmond, as the gentleman from New York [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD] proposes, to smile away the horrible facts of this war. Not by smiles but by thundering volleys must this rebellion be met, and by that means alone. I am reminded of what Macaulay said in regard to the revolution in England. He said:

"It is because we had a preserving revolution in the seventeenth century that we have not had a destroying revolution in the nineteenth. It is because we had freedom in the midst of servitude that we have order in the midst of anarchy. For the authority of law, for the security of property, for the peace of our streets, for the happiness of our homes, our gratitude is due, under Him who raises and pulls down nations at His pleasure, to the Long Parliament, to the Convention, and to William of Orange."

Mr. Speaker, if we want a peace that is not a hollow peace we must follow that example and make thorough work of this war. We must establish freedom in the midst of servitude, and the authority of law in the midst of rebellion. We must fill the thinned ranks of our armies, assure them that a grateful and loving people are behind them, and they will go down against the enemy bearing with them the majesty and might of a great nation. We must follow the march of the Army with a law that will sweep away the cause of the whole terrible revolution. The war began by proclamation, and it must end by proclamation. We can hold the insurgent States in military subjection half a century if need be, or until they are purged of their dross and poison, and leave them to stand up clean before the country, to come back with clean hands if they come at all. I want to see in all those States the men who have fought and suffered for the truth tilling those fields on which they pitched their tents. I want to see them, like old Kaspar of Blenheim, on the summer evenings, with their children upon their knees, and pointing out the spot where brave men fell and marble commemorates it. Let no breath of treason be whispered there. I want no man there, like one from my own State, who came before the great struggle in Georgia and gave us his views of peace. He came as the friend of Vallandigham, the man for whom the gentlemen on the other side of the House from my State worked and voted. We were on the eve of the great battle. I said to him, "You wish to make Mr. Vallandigham Governor of Ohio. Why?" "Because, in the first place," using the language of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] "you cannot subjugate the South, and we propose to withdraw without trying it any further. In the next place, we do not want anything to do with an abolition war, and will not give one dollar for that purpose." Remember, gentlemen, what occurred on the conscription bill this morning. "To-morrow," I continued, "we may be engaged in a death-struggle with the rebel army that confronts us, and is daily increasing. Where is the sympathy of your party? Do you want us beaten, or Bragg beaten?" He answered they had no interest in fighting, that they did not believe in fighting.

Mr. NOBLE. A question right here.

Mr. GARFIELD. I cannot yield; I have no time. He was the agent sent by the copperhead secretary of state to distribute election blanks to the army of the Cumberland.

Mr. NOBLE. A single question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I have no time to spare.

Mr. NOBLE. I want to ask the gentleman if he knows that Mr. Griffiths has made a question of veracity with him by a positive denial of the alleged conversation published in the Cincinnati Enquirer.

Mr. GARFIELD. No virtuous denials in the Cincinnati Enquirer can alter the facts of this conversation, which was heard by a dozen officers.

I asked him further, "How would it affect your party if we should crush the rebels in this battle, and utterly destroy them?" "We would probably lose votes by it." "How would it affect your party if we should be beaten?" "It would probably help us in votes."

That, gentlemen, is the kind of support the Army is receiving in what should be the house of its friends. This, gentlemen, is the kind of support these men—some of them—are inclined to give this country and its Army in this terrible struggle. I hasten to make honorable exceptions. I know there are honorable gentlemen on the other side who do not belong to that category, and I am proud to acknowledge them as my friends. But I say that the effect of what the majority of them is doing will tend to pull down the fabric of our Government by aiding their friends over the border to do it. Their friends, I say, for when the Ohio election was about coming off in the army at Chattanooga there was more anxiety in the rebel camp than in our own. The pickets had talked face to face and made daily inquiry how the election in Ohio was going. And at midnight of the 13th of October, when the telegraphic news was flashed down to us, and announced to the army that the Union had sixty thousand majority in Ohio, there arose a shout all along the line on that rainy midnight from every tent which rent the skies with jubilees, and sent despair to the heart of those men beyond our lines who were "waiting and watching across the border." It told them their colleagues, their sympathizers, their friends, I had almost said their emissaries, had failed to sustain themselves in turning the tide against our friends in the contest. And from that hour, but not till that hour, the army had felt safe from the enemy behind it.

I deprecate these apparently partisan remarks; it hurts me to make them; but it hurts me more to know they are true. I would not make them, but that I wish to unmask the pretext that we are working along all in a body for the vigorous prosecution of the war and the maintenance of the Government. I cannot easily forget the treatment the conscription bill met this morning. Even the few men in the Army who voted for Vallandigham wrote on the back of their tickets "Draft, draft." That was the voice of the Army.

I conclude by returning once more to the resolution before us. Let no weak sentiments of misplaced sympathy deter us from inaugurating a measure which will cleanse our nation and make it the fit home of freedom and glorious manhood. Let us not despise the severe wisdom of our revolutionary fathers, when they served their generation in a similar way. Let the Republic drive from its soil the traitors that have conspired against its life, as God and His angels drove Satan and his host from heaven. He was not too merciful to be just, and to hurl down in chains and everlasting darkness the "traitor angel" who rebelled against Him.

Mr. EDGERTON obtained the floor.

WASHINGTON RAILROAD.

Mr. STILES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to incorporate the Baltimore and Washington Depot and Potomac Ferry Railroad Company; which was read a first and second time by its title, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

DISMISSION OF OFFICERS.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to regulate the dismissal of officers in the military and naval service; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., 1. That the President shall dismiss no officer in the military or naval service of the United States unless upon the finding of a court-martial convened according to law.

2. Any officer who shall be reported by his commanding officer absent without leave for twenty days, in time of war or active hostilities, may be dropped from the military or naval service by the President for that cause assigned by proclamation; but on the application of the officer so reported and dropped, stating a sufficient defense under oath against such charge during the whole absence till the day of application, the President shall convene a court-martial to try him on that charge; and if it acquit him, on approval of the sentence he shall stand ipso facto reinstated; and if the sentence be disapproved for legal cause, another court shall be ordered for his trial by the order disapproving the former finding.

3. The President may suspend any officer in the military or naval service, without pay or emolument, in time of war or active hostilities, who shall be reported by his commanding officer or the Secretary of War for any flagrant offense for which under the articles of war dismissal or death is a legal punishment, and in the opinion of the President ought to be so punished; but the order of suspension shall specify the charges and convene a court-martial for the trial of the officer thereon within ten days from the date of the suspension; and if the court shall not assign dismissal or death as the punishment, the officer shall stand restored to his rank, pay, and emoluments from the date of the suspension.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. A. W. CLARK, from the Committee on Printing, reported back, with a recommendation that it do pass, joint resolution of the Senate No. 18, in relation to the public printing.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

RAILROAD LAND GRANTS.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following preamble and resolutions; which were read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas certain land grants were made by Congress in the year 1856 to aid in the construction of railroads in the States of Alabama, Florida, Iowa, Louisiana, Minnesota, Mississippi, and Wisconsin; and whereas it was provided in the acts making said grants, that in case the roads enumerated therein should not be completed in ten years that the lands should revert to the United States; and whereas several of the grants were made to States now in rebellion against the Government; and whereas application has been made and will continue to be made to the present Congress for an extension of the time of said grants: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be requested to make a thorough investigation of the subject, to ascertain the number of miles of roads that have been built by the companies claiming lands under said grants, the number of sections and acres of land that have been given or transferred to the roads respectively for the miles already completed, the prospect of their completion, and whether it will be just and expedient or not to extend the time of said grants.

Resolved, That the committee be further requested to report to this House, by bill or otherwise, such action in the premises (after a full investigation) as to it shall seem just and for the public interest.

WESTERN COMMERCE.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, asked the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed by the Speaker of the House, to consist of five members, with authority to inquire into and report upon the practical operation and results of the act of Congress regulating commercial intercourse with the States declared to be in insurrection against the authority of the Government, and whether the regulations of the Treasury Department which purport to have been made in pursuance of said act, as carried out by the Department, comply with its design. To examine particularly and report upon the manner in which said act has been executed, and whether any frauds have been practiced on the Government by the officers or agents employed under said act, and whether any favoritism to individuals or localities has been shown in its execution; and to inquire further whether the effect of said act and of the said regulations of the Treasury Department has been to prevent supplies from reaching the rebels or to facilitate the object. That said committee have power to send for persons and papers, and to employ a clerk, with the usual amount of compensation, for the purpose of reducing to writing all testimony taken by said committee.

Mr. SLOAN objected.

Mr. BOYD. I hope no objection will be made to that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Objection has been made, and the resolution is not before the House.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I hope the gentleman from Wisconsin will withdraw his objection. The resolution merely provides for an inquiry into a very important branch of the public service. Certainly no friend of the Secretary of the Treasury or of the Administration ought to object to it.

The SPEAKER. The resolution is not before the House.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not so understand.

Mr. SPALDING. If he does, I renew it.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. EDGERTON claimed the floor.

Mr. NOBLE. I ask the gentleman from Indiana to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. EDGERTON. I will do so.

Mr. NOBLE. My colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] has referred to a private conversation held with an individual from the State of Ohio.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio can only proceed by the unanimous consent of the House, the gentleman from Indiana being entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I object.

Mr. NOBLE. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I distinctly rose in my place and objected to the gentleman from Ohio proceeding.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood that objection was made to unanimous consent being given; but the gentleman from Indiana can yield part of his time to the gentleman from Ohio with the consent of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. If the gentleman from Indiana yields the floor unconditionally, I suppose he may.

Mr. EDGERTON. I cannot yield unconditionally.

The SPEAKER. Then the gentleman from Indiana will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. EDGERTON. Mr. Speaker, the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] advocating his proposed amendment to the joint resolution now before the House, removes from my mind all doubt, if any existed before, as to the character and objects of the act of Congress of July 17, 1862, entitled "An act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes."

I listened to and have read the gentleman's speech with deep and, I may say, painful interest. With the hand of a master he has drawn in clear and bold outline a sketch of the character and objects of this war as now waged by the Federal Executive. His propositions are substantially these:

1. That the existing war between the United States and the confederate States is a civil war, carrying with it the character of public war, in which the United States on the one side and the confederate States on the other are belligerent parties, and as to each other independent and foreign nations, and the character of alien enemies attaches to all, including women and children, who in fact, or by domicile, adhere to the confederate States.

2. That the war has abrogated the treaty or compact called "a Constitution" heretofore existing between the United States and the confederate States, or their people, and neither can claim as against the other the aid of the Constitution or the laws passed under it.

3. That the territory of the confederate States, covered by the confederate flag, is foreign country, and when we conquer it, it is a conquered country, whereof the lands are to be confiscated and sold, and the slaves of the people made free, and the States and their laws reorganized.

4. That he who now wishes to reestablish "the Union as it was," and to restore "the Constitution as it is," cannot escape the guilt of attempting to enslave his fellow-men. "The Union as it was and the Constitution as it is" is an atrocious idea; it is man-stealing. That all the inhabitants of the confederate States have forfeited all rights under the Constitution which they have renounced, and that they are forever estopped from claiming "the Union as it was."

Sir, it is a question of grave significance to the people of the United States, and to the Army of the United States, as a part of the people, whether or not the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] speaks by authority.

On this point he uses this language:

"To gentlemen who were members of the last Congress this is but repetition. At the extra session of 1861 I advanced the same suggestions; and I have repeated them on all occasions that I deemed proper since. They were not then quite acceptable to either side of the House. But I am glad to find that the President, after careful examination, has come to the same conclusion. In details we may not quite agree; but his plan of reconstruction assumes the same general grounds. It proposes to treat the rebel territory as a conquered one would treat it. His plan is wholly outside of and unknown to the Constitution. But it is within the legitimate province of the laws of war. His legal mind has carefully studied the law of nations and reached a just conclusion."

I do not now allude to the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania with a view to make it the chief theme of my remarks at this time, or to attempt an answer to it now; for even if I felt myself able to enter the field of argument with a gentleman of his eminent ability and great parliamentary experience, I should deem it due to my cause and to myself to devote to the speech more of time for investigation and thought than I have yet been able to give to it.

The speech is one that should be read and pondered well by every man who desires to restore "the Union as it was under the Constitution as it is"—an expression, sir, I would here say, as grossly misunderstood as it is grossly misrepresented; and to the true friends of the Union as the Constitution made it the speech will suggest the pregnant question, Is this a war for the Union? And they may further ask, To what good does the blood of our people flow like water, and taxation lay its iron hand upon our labor and our estates, if the Union and the Constitution be no longer our cause and justification? Many men, yes, tens and hundreds of thousands, who have given the war an earnest support, and would still support it for its just and constitutional purposes, will inquire, if the gentleman from Pennsylvania be the exponent of our war policy, whether it be not better to say to the States and people now composing "the foreign country" to the south of us, and once our sister States, "Wayward sisters, go in peace," than to attempt to force upon them, by the power of war, the iron bonds which the iron policy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] would forge for them.

It is common, sir, for gentlemen on the other side to denounce us, and the great Democratic party of the North, as disunionists, sympathizers with rebellion, secessionists, disloyal men; and the word "traitor" almost fell from the lips of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] the other day in his allusion to his Democratic colleague, [Mr. Cox.] Sir, if Jefferson Davis ever gave utterance to sentiments more disunion and disloyal, or ever indicated a more fatal purpose toward the Union and Constitution, than the gentleman from Pennsylvania has done in his speech, I have yet to find the record of such utterances; and I go further, sir, and say that if the President of the United States accords with the sentiments and purposes of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and is carrying on the war for such purposes, then is he as essentially infidel to his oath of office and his high duty as a magistrate and a citizen as was Jefferson Davis when he commanded Beauregard to open his batteries against the walls of Sumter. Sir, it is a solecism, a mockery, and an absurdity to call such sentiments as those of the gentleman from Pennsylvania "Union sentiments," or such a war as he would wage against the people of the South, now, as he claims, an alien and foreign people, "a war for the Union." It is the creed of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, urged from year to year with all the energy of his powerful intellect and iron will, that has poisoned the minds of the people of this nation, North and South, toward each other and their common Constitution, and brought disunion and civil war upon us with all their woes. Sir, the men disloyal to the Union and the Constitution are not all adherents of the southern confederacy, nor in the ranks of that "odious" Democratic party whom the gentleman from Pennsylvania seems so much to loathe and despise; the names of many may be found in the rolls of the "Loyal Leagues," and not a few even in high places of Federal power.

Sir, if the President and his party in power desire to deplete and demoralize the Army of the Union, and take from it and give to the rebellion all the moral power of a just cause; if they desire to remove all inducement for the free enlistment of men to recruit our Army; if they desire to make the conscription law a dead letter on the statute-book; if they desire to sap the unsteady foundation, and tumble into ruin hopeless and irretrievable the already inflated and unsubstantial structure of our public credit; if they desire to prolong the war, to aggravate its horrors and intensify its hate, and enlist against us the sympathies of the civilized world, and finally to secure to the confederate States their independence as a nation, leaving the name and glory of the United States as but the shadow of a once mighty name and power in the earth, let the President and his party adopt and persist in and attempt to carry out the policy of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

In the view I have of the character and purposes of the party in power, as a revolutionary party, it seems to me of little importance, except as to form, whether the joint resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee, or the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] or that suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] be adopted by Congress. Either would remove the restriction virtually imposed by the President himself upon the act of July 17, 1862. That act as drawn was intended to work a complete forfeiture of the real and personal estate of the classes of offenders designated by it. Congress, under duress per minas from the President, as we are told, limited, by their joint resolution of July 17, 1862, the forfeiture of real estate under the act to the life of the offender. The object of all the propositions now before the House on the subject is to remove that limitation.

The real issue, then, raised by this debate, as is manifest from the tenor of the arguments on both sides, is the issue of absolute, sweeping confiscation, either by legislation and judicial process, assumed to be within and according to the Constitution, or by the laws and process of war outside of the Constitution.

Upon that issue, were there no constitutional limitations or limitations of belligerent rights under the law of nations to affect it, I would oppose the joint resolution now before the House and the amendments proposed to it, on the broad grounds of Christian humanity and public policy. Assuming for the Federal Government all the rights and power of war claimed for it by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [MR. STEVENS,] the spirit that would prompt their use to the extent he contemplates is the tyrant's spirit, not the patriot's nor the philanthropist's. It is never wise nor well, sir, for any Government to do all in the way of punishment or revenge toward its own people or an alien people that it has power to do. On the contrary, we are told by a wise master of human nature that "Earthly power doth then show likest God's,

When mercy seasons justice."

I have therefore felt it to be my duty to say something, more by way of general discussion than of legal argument, for that has fallen to abler hands, upon the questions involved in this debate. And first, my sense of what is due to my position as one of the minority here leads me to allude briefly to some offensive remarks addressed to us by gentlemen on the other side of the House.

We have been told, sir, by one gentleman [MR. LOVEJOY] that we were here without a constituency; by another [MR. DAVIS] that we were sent here to embarrass the Administration, and that our support was not needed and would be looked upon with suspicion; and the word traitors was almost used by another gentleman [MR. SPALDING] in alluding to the Democracy of Ohio; while the gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. STEVENS] spoke of the Democratic party generally as an "odious party, inspired by the love of slavery alone," and destined to "sink into utter contempt and be despised of all men."

Sir, I shall not comment upon the spirit that evidently animated these remarks, further than to say that it is one not friendly to the wise and patriotic legislation which the peril of this nation now demands, and to further say that if the gentlemen on the other side will look to the returns of the fall elections of 1863, I think they will find that the minority represent upon this floor the opinions, the patriotism, and the determined purpose of not less than one million and a half of free intelligent electors in the States from whence we come; and, sir, that purpose is firm that neither the Federal Executive, of whose revolutionary policy and unconstitutional edicts the majority of this House seem to be the willing echoes and instruments, nor the revolutionary confederation governed by Jefferson Davis, shall ever destroy the Federal Union, or the Constitution of the United States, which is its life and its bond.

Our constituency, Mr. Speaker, are interested in the Union and the Constitution. They have in them an estate of inheritance which they highly value. The history and glory of the Union belong to them as well as to the constituents of the majority. Our hearthstones and roof-trees, our wives and children, our lands and goods, our persons and our rights of every name and degree, are as much entitled to be, and claim as much to be, under the ægis of the Constitution, as are, or can claim to be, those of the majority. Sir, if the gentlemen on the other side of this House claim to be friends of the Union, we know we are its friends; if they claim to respect the Constitution, we know that we honor it in thought, in word, and in deed, in the true sense in which Washington honored it, as the palladium of American liberty.

The people of the United States, irrespective of party name, are in the broad and just sense of the term the constituents of every Representative on this floor, and he is illy fitted for a place here whose mind and heart cannot do justice and deal in equity with the rights and interests of the people of every State and section of the United States. There are rights of States, as sovereignties and bodies politic, and rights of persons under the Constitution, for which we are here to speak, to deliberate, and to vote; and as one, if but an humble one, of the minority, I believe I but utter their united voice when I say they will manfully do their duty in that regard, heedless of the taunts or threats of the majority.

I have no ambition, Mr. Speaker, to distinguish myself in this House as one among the number of the destroyers of the constitutional sovereignty of Federal States. It is no part of my creed, as I understand it to be the creed of the gentleman from Maryland, [MR. DAVIS,] that "State rights are national wrongs." On the contrary, I believe that State rights, in the true constitutional sense of the term, are rights, not wrongs; and when I took my oath of office to support the Constitution of the United States I felt that it bound me as much and as sacredly to respect here by my voice and votes, and elsewhere by word and deed, the constitutional rights and sovereignty of insulted Maryland and down-trodden Delaware, within their constitutional sphere and jurisdiction, as it bound me to respect and support the rights and sovereignty of the United States in their sphere. For one, sir, I have no respect for nor sympathy with the assassins of the constitutional rights of any Federal State of this Union, much less when the assassin's partricial hand is turned against the State which gave him birth and to which he owes allegiance. I have no sympathy with that spirit of Jacobin ferocity displayed by some of the leaders of the Administration, who, in their thirst for blood and confiscation, are already rivaling the worst days of the French Revolution, when Heaven-defying crime waded knee-deep in blood, under the banner of "liberty, equality, and fraternity."

Sir, as I look upon the troubled scene of our national affairs I see three powerful parties or combinations struggling for mastery, and shaping our destiny as a people for weal or woe. They are: 1. The party of secession, led by Jefferson Davis and his coadjutors in treason, rebellion, insurrection, or revolution—I care not what name you give it—who are endeavoring by war to destroy the constitutional Union and Government of the United States. 2. The party of the Federal Administration, a political party of many incongruous elements and conflicting principles, assuming to itself the name of Union party, intolerant even to fanaticism in its opinions, bold and violent in its declared purpose of crushing out rebellion, but at the same time daily asserting and exercising despotic power in the Federal Government, and, by Executive edicts, by congressional legislation, and by military power combined, working a radical revolution destructive of the basis and principles of the Federal system of constitutional Government. 3. The conservative or true Union party, better known by the historic name that has distinguished it almost from the adoption of the Constitution as the Democratic party, which, retaining its cardinal principles and distinctive organization as the party of the people, is resisting all efforts to destroy the Federal Government from whatever source they come, as well as all efforts to subvert or destroy States, and is aiming always, whether it uses the power of war or the spirit and arguments of peace, to restore the disturbed balance of the Constitution, by recognizing and maintaining both national and State rights and bringing all into the healthy and beneficent action of peace and reunion under the Constitution.

The gentleman from Maryland and his coadjutors here or elsewhere may affect to despise as much as they please the support of the minority in this House, or of the constituents we represent; but I say to the gentleman, that which he should know, or will know, perchance, before many moons have waxed and waned, that our constituents, already numbering, as I have said, a million and a half of freeborn electors, are yet a power in this Union of States; a power whether for peace or for war; a political power at the ballot-box, and a material power for war. Without their aid this Union cannot be restored, and without their aid it cannot be destroyed. Reviled and despised as they are by party opponents of more zeal than knowledge, or of more malice than patriotism, the conservative Democratic party of the United States, as it will be organized and represented and led in the grand contest of 1864, will hold in its hands the issue of these days of peril—Union or no Union, Constitution or no Constitution; and they mean that that issue shall be settled according to the Constitution and laws of the land; not otherwise. I warn the gentlemen who taunt us with having no constituency, and scoff at our and their support, that they do not too much ignore nor despise the constituency we represent; for, sir, it is often as true of parties as of men, grown proud by ill-deserved success, that "pride goeth before destruction, and a haughty spirit before a fall." These, sir, are my answers to those gentlemen in this House who, arrogant with the power of their majority, daily insult us and the constituents we represent with taunts, which, to say the best of them, are not the arguments of statesmen.

In the joint resolution now under consideration and in the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [MR. STEVENS] I see the evidence of two distinct ideas as to the mode of proceeding to reach the common object of the majority in regard to the subject-matter of the resolution, namely, the confiscation absolute and complete of the lands or real estate of the southern insurgents. The policy, now no longer concealed, but openly declared, not only in the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but declared in this very Hall a few evenings ago, and loudly applauded, in presence of the President himself, who was then, with like applause, renominated for a second term of office, as the exponent and representative of that policy, demands that the territory, the actual soil of the southern States in insurrection, shall come under the control of the Federal Government, so that it can vest absolute titles in fee in the persons, white or black, to whom that Government may grant it by sale or gift. Absolute title is wanted and must be had, or the party in power, now thoroughly educated into the most radical abolition policy, will fail in the purpose which has become its grand controlling purpose in this war. This purpose is no other than the absolute subjugation of the southern or slave States, to the northern or anti-slavery States, and a complete revolution in the whole political and social system of the slave States, reorganizing them, on the northern or New England basis—a basis clearly declared in well-seeming words by the present head of the Department of State, in a speech made at Chicago in October, 1860, when he said that the creed of the Republican party was that "Freedom was to be maintained and carried on this continent by Federal States, based upon the principles of free soil, free labor, free speech, equal rights, and universal suffrage."

The Chief Magistrate, to whose proclamations sworn assent is now demanded as a test or criterion of loyalty, and to which it is expected that Congress and the courts of law are alike to give the character of law, paramount even to that organic law by which the presidential office is created and its powers defined, years ago declared that the Union could not permanently endure half slave and half free; and now, to the demonstration of the truth of what when spoken was but the pretentiously oracular utterance of an obscure politician, the whole power of the United States is to be made subsidiary and subordinate even to the removal of the landmarks of property and the upturning of social systems and the virtual annihilation of the Constitution. Without the approval of historic precedent, or the sanction of sound political philosophy or of true Christian philanthropy, a grand utopian experiment to "wash the Ethiop white" is to be made at once at every cost and hazard. And here, sir, I would remark that men have not been wanting, and they were many, who, while the irrepressible conflict between free and slave States was proclaimed by those now wielding the powers of the Federal Government, clearly foresaw and gave warning that civil war and disunion in the United States were the inevitable results of that conflict if rashly continued to be urged upon the people. The last three years have but proved the truth of history, that wisdom and warning are alike lost on men inflamed with the wild zeal of fanaticism, when it be religious, philanthropic, or political. The zealots of slavery and the zealots of anti-slavery have had their way, and the attestants of their zeal are a broken Union, a dishonored Constitution, a land drenched with blood, filled with demoralization, sadness, and death, and already burdened with a public debt whose giant form even now projects into the swift-coming future the gloom of national bankruptcy. The same policy that was the chief exciting cause and forerunner of civil war is now its concomitant, and the guide of the Federal Administration in its conduct.

It has been determined by the Administration that the lands of the southern States shall become free soil, in their sense of free soil, that is, soil whereof white men and negroes shall share in common ownership, coequals in all rights political and social.

The constitutional rights of States and persons, the canons of property, State laws, the principles of public law, the spirit of Christianity, and that unconquerable instinct of nature which binds men of the same race to each other as brother to brother, may and do stand in the way of that negro Utopia which philanthropy run mad sees rising up on the sunny plains of the South. But what of that? An oracle has said, "This Union cannot permanently endure half slave and half free;" and the rights of States, guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, to make their own constitutions of local government, and their own laws to form and control their domestic institutions, are no other than national wrongs before the higher law of negro emancipation and elevation. The law of nations, Christianity, the natural instincts of kindred and race must yield to it; and it leaps over or breaks down with impunity constitutional limitations, plainly written and made sacred by time and the expositions of the most eminent jurists. How much of the partisan or fanatical spirit of revenge, or of mean cupidity and greed of personal gain, or of low political ambition meaner than avarice, may mingle in the motives of some of the "loyal" men who are urging forward this giant scheme to subjugate, impoverish, expatriate, or exterminate millions of a kindred race of white men, inheritors of the names and homes of patriots and sages, whose names and deeds illuminate our history, for the assumed benefit of a race of black men and their white coequals, I am not now prepared to say; but the history of this war thus far, in the details of its oppressions and devastations, in its reckless expenditures and official frauds, its Army and Navy contracts, its cotton and sugar speculations, and kindred schemes of "loyal" enterprise, afford heart-sickening revelations to men who love their country, and watch with care the progress of events.

As I have already remarked, there are two leading ideas in the minds of Administration men as to the ways and means of accomplishing the schemes of the party in power. The one is the idea of men who from temperament or conservative political education, or other causes, are timid men, and by strategy and indirection would achieve destructive and revolutionary objects through the use of constitutional forms. To this class, which may be styled the conservative party in the Administration, the President himself naturally belongs. The other idea is that of the radicals of the Administration party; men who originate and lead and shape revolution; men of more robust intellect, clearer mental vision, more energy of will and directness of purpose than the President and his conservative adherents, men of the stamp—if I may so say—of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] whose amendment would sweep away at once all the cobwebs of constitutional technicalities by which more timid and less clear-sighted men of his party would stop the onward progress of the juggernaut of confiscation, whereon the negro idol sits enthroned. The timid men want absolute confiscation. It opens before them a wide field where revenge, philanthropy, and "loyalty" can all get profit and substantial reward. The Constitution is a lion in their path; a wall in their way; a fortress and a rock of defense to rights of States and rights of person and property. A bold man, a revolutionist, like the gentleman from Pennsylvania, would, if need be, at once strike down the ramparts of the Constitution, or push it aside as an unwritten parchment if it lay in his pathway. The gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] with the elasticity of youth but the discretion of age, would not rush deliriously against the Constitution, but would overlap it at a bound. Other conservative legislators here, less bold than the gentleman from Pennsylvania and less elastic than the gentleman from Ohio, while professing a desire to do nothing contrary to it, would crawl over, under, or around the Constitution, into the elysium of national salvation and universal freedom which they see beyond it. Herein is the cardinal difference between the two wings or divisions of the Administration party, and the President seems neither by nature nor in fact to be the leader of either, but to take his color and his cue from one side or the other, as the pressure or need of support from either may from time to time be greatest. Barring my utter abhorrence of the revolutionary purposes of the party, what little of respect I have for their methods is with the radicals. With them, we, whose duty it is to stand in defense of the Constitution, know we will have an open field and a fair battle. From a man who openly curses the Constitution we know what to expect. Not so as to him who would betray it with a kiss.

The war power, the mail-clad, slaughter-breathing, remorseless Mars, is the divinity the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] calls to his aid. This war power, which, in the form it now assumes, was unseen and unsuspected in the placid, beautiful features of the Federal Constitution, has suddenly sprung from it, full-armed, like Pallas from the brain of Jove; or I might better say that like the little cloud, no larger than a man's hand, which Elisha saw from the top of Carmel coming up from the far horizon of the sea, the war power has grown and spread, from a misty, dimly seen nebula, until its deep, dark shadow covers the land like a pall, and men gaze on it.

"As men who watch the thunder-cloud in fear, Lest it should break above them."

This war power as it is now sought to be applied in our jurisprudence is not a constitutional instrument, but a revolutionary invention of radical minds. It is no legitimate child of the Constitution; it does not bear its lineaments. Nor is it the child of the President; it has in it nothing of his intellectual or physical conformation. It has been brought to him as an ally and helper; something whereon he might lean, and to some extent he has used it. He has used it to effect the radical end of the emancipation of the slaves. He used it first for this purpose with hesitation, with reluctance and great misgiving. He thought a proclamation of emancipation under the war power would be thunder without the bolt or the electric stroke, or like the Pope's bull against the comet. But the President's mind is changeable. What he thinks or declares to-day he may not think or declare or abide by to-morrow. What the President used doubtfully and timidly at first, but now with use is growing enamored, as boys grow in love with their first firearm, be it gun or pistol, and as men grow pleased with power by using it, the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no fear nor doubt in using. He marches boldly up to the issue of confiscation, and claims it, not as a punishment for treason under the Constitution, but as a belligerent right of the conqueror over the conquered, outside of the Constitution. Against the theory of the inviolability of the constitutional Federal Union, State rights, rights of property and person under Federal and State constitutions, placed in one scale, he boldly throws into the opposing scale what William Pinkney once aptly termed "the ponderous claim of war." By secession and revolution, in the view of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, the southern people have become alien enemies. We have invaded and conquered their territories, and by power of war emancipated their slaves within our reach. Their lands are our property, and they and their slaves our subjects. The Federal Government is sovereign over both by the laws of war, and all that remains is to legislate as to the division of the conquered lands, and to organize and protect the new order of freemen and freedmen's society to be established there. This is the theory and plan of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and in it the confiscation law pure and unlimited is to play its part. It is a bold plan, claiming the extreme principles of the law of nations for its base, and not the Federal Constitution; and at the proper time I hope it will be fairly and fully met in all its bearings in the manner in which it has been met to-day in the able argument of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. FINCK,] when the various bills (that of the gentleman from Pennsylvania included) for reconstructing States or organizing conquered provinces shall come before this House.

Now, Mr. Speaker, let us look more directly at the intent and character of the joint resolution before the House. Under various pretenses, among which I may name indemnity for the past and security for the future, zeal for the soldiers of the Union, their widows and orphans, wives and children, zeal for the oppressed bondmen, zeal for the onward march of freedom and the extension of our power and glory as a nation, zeal for arts, manufactures, and commerce, zeal for school-houses and churches, but in pursuance of what I believe to be in fact an unchristian, unwise, revolutionary, and, in many of its elements and motives, fanatical and corrupt policy of the party in power, their majority in the Thirty-Seventh Congress passed the confiscation act of July 17, 1862.

The first object expressed in the title of this act was "to suppress insurrection." As to that object no man questions that the act has signally failed, as the experience of history proves that all attempts to deal with a great revolution, a general uprising of a people educated in principles of free constitutional government, by hurling at them the thunders of vindictive legislation, have also signally failed. Revolutions are never conquered by vindictive laws. They but add fuel to the flame, and make what might otherwise be weakness strength by the very inspiration of despair, but they never conquer nor suppress a revolution. Armies may do it, but vindictive legislation never did and never will. They are "bloody inventions, which, being taught, return to plague the inventor." Liberty may be crushed out by the strong arm of material power, but laws cannot crush it, for liberty and law affiliate. They are twin sisters, coequal in origin and duration, and when society is normal, they ever cling with loving kindness to each other. Law was not born to be the tyrant of Liberty, but her sister and her ally.

As an act to punish treason and rebellion, and to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, the purposes and terms of the act of July 17, 1862, are clear enough. The first four sections relate to the punishment of treason and rebellion below the grade of constitutional treason. The fifth section makes it the duty of the President to cause the seizure of the property, real and personal, of all the higher or official grade of persons who should thereafter participate in the rebellion, such property to be applied and used for the support of the Army of the United States. Section six went further, and extended the President's power of seizure and application to the support of the Army, of all the estate and property of all other persons engaged in or aiding the rebellion who should not, within sixty days after public warning and proclamation of the President, cease to rebel or abet rebellion; and the act of seizure was made operative to defeat all sales or transfer of such property and estate after the expiration of said sixty days. Sections seven and eight prescribed the judicial proceedings in rem by which the property thus seized should be "condemned as enemy's property," and become the property of the United States, to be disposed of as the court should decree, and the proceeds thereof paid into the Treasury of the United States for the purpose stated, namely, the support of the Army.

I do not know who was the author of this act of July 17, 1862, but it is apparent that there is in it a strange mixing up of and attempt to enforce belligerent and municipal rights against the same persons. The first four sections are evidently intended to be constitutional or municipal legislation, based upon the constitutional power of Congress to declare the punishment of treason and its implied power of declaring and punishing crimes against the United States, and clearly contemplated indictment and conviction under the Constitution. Sections five, six, seven, and eight, inasmuch as they do not conform to any constitutional provision in regard to treason and its punishment, although aimed at persons guilty of treason, seem to be based upon an assumed belligerent or war right of seizure and confiscation. Thus, while Congress in one breath were declaring that traitors and their abettors should be hung, or imprisoned and fined, and their slaves made free, in another breath they were providing that their estate and property should be seized, condemned, and sold as enemy's property.

The President, either because less clear-headed or more timid or more scrupulous about overriding the Constitution, did not view the law in the light of a law based on the rights of war alone. He either did not see or would not admit the propriety in one and the same law of dealing with rebels as traitors to be indicted, convicted, and hung, or fined and imprisoned, and as alien enemies, citizens of a "foreign country" owing allegiance to a foreign Power, who, if patriotically fighting for it, were subject only to the laws and entitled to the rights of war. He could not divest his mind of the very natural idea that the rebels were, in law, citizens of the United States "levying war against them," and therefore traitors, not alien enemies. He had not at that time, as his subsequent conversation with the two Chicago clergymen on the 9th September, 1862, proves, been educated up to that clear apprehension and wise appreciation of the war power and military necessity which the gentleman from Pennsylvania now vouches for and the President has since shown in his proclamations of September 22, 1862, January 1, 1863, and December 8, 1863, saying nothing of sundry intermediate exercises of the war power in dealings with the habeas corpus and personal liberty. The President, under the instructions of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, is evidently improving in military exercises.

When the President, who had read Blackstone and Kent and Story and Mr. Madison in the Federalist—whose pregnant and authoritative opinion has been aptly quoted by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. Bliss]—applied his knowledge derived from those great worthies in jurisprudence to the sweeping confiscation declared in sections five and six of the act, he was staggered, he doubted and hesitated, and finally concluded to change the law or kill it by the veto. The result was his message to Congress of July 17, 1862, followed immediately by the passage by Congress of the explanatory joint resolution of the same date. If the President, by similar duress per minas, had exercised similar conservative influence over the same Congress, he would have done wisely. The language of the President's message is in itself so strong an argument against the act as it was proposed that I quote briefly from it. He said:

"That to which I chiefly object pervades most part of the act, but more distinctly appears in the first, second, seventh, and eighth sections. It is the sum of those provisions which results in the divesting of title forever.

"For the causes of treason and ingredients of treason, not amounting to the full crime, it declares forfeiture extending beyond the lives of the guilty parties; whereas the Constitution of the United States declares that 'no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained.' True, there is to be no formal attainder in this case; still, I think the greater punishment cannot be constitutionally inflicted, in a different form, for the same offense.

"With great respect I am constrained to say I think this feature of the act is unconstitutional. It would not be difficult to modify it."

The point of the joint resolution of July 17 is in these words:

"Nor shall any punishment or proceedings under said act be so construed as to work a forfeiture of the real estate of the offender beyond his natural life."

Now, whatever may have been the original design of the author of sections five and six, &c., of the confiscation act as to the rights of war, and however much the President may have misconceived the real point of the law, it is plain that the joint resolution put the construction and effect of the law beyond question, (except with Judge Underwood,) and forbade the confiscation of real estate of offenders beyond their life estates, thus carrying out the plain meaning of the Constitution and the ideas of Madison and Story upon the subject.

It is to be borne in mind that at this time the slaves were not emancipated. The war power in its loftiest flights had not attained to that bad eminence. The necessity of free soil for freed men did not then exist. The President had not been educated by the Boston Gamaliels and Pauls of abolition, or by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, up to the standard of the "proclamation of emancipation." So soon as that policy was adopted, the embarrassment of the restriction on confiscation under the act of July 17 was at once felt. It was expressed by the Solicitor of the War Department on page 120 of his pamphlet, entitled "The War Powers of the President," where he says:

"It is much to be regretted that the joint resolution of Congress should have been so worded as to throw a doubt upon the construction of that part of the statute, if not to paralyze its effect upon the only class of rebel property which they cannot put out of the reach of Government, namely, their real estate."

But in course of time a legal luminary arose in Eastern Virginia, who was wiser than Madison or Story, and he threw a ray of light upon the Constitution which was at once hailed as a glad omen by the men whose designs upon the estates of the South had been balked by the explanatory resolution of July, 1862.

The brilliant decision of Judge Underwood in the face of the positive language of the joint resolution was considered a very timely and good thing, but it was clear that after the argument of the President himself in his veto message, and after the doubt expressed by the Solicitor of the War Department, it would not do at once to say, even upon the high authority of Judge Underwood, that the joint resolution meant nothing and could be discarded, nor to say that the Constitution did not mean what the President, sustained by the highest constitutional authorities, said it did mean. But if that resolution were out of the way, or its effect neutralized by legislative amendment or explanation, there was room for hope that other judges, in the Supreme Court of the United States, might be found as wise and patriotic and loyal as Judge Underwood, who like him would hold that except in constitutional law meant unless. I say there was some ground for this hope, and why? The vast learning and integrity of the accomplished Story, honored in both hemispheres, were no longer in the Supreme Court. The massive intellect and unsullied honor of Marshall were no longer presiding there. The wise and pure McLean had also ceased to live, and the lamp of life of the venerable Chief Justice, whose mind had shone like a sun in that great tribunal for more than thirty years, is feebly flickering and might in a moment go out in the night of death. True, Grier and Nelson, Wayne, Clifford, and Catron were still there; but might not this Congress, devoted to the Administration, pledged to its policy and ready to do its work, easily provide, as has already been proposed by bills in this House, for additional judges, equal in judicial integrity and wisdom to the loyal and illustrious Underwood, who would judicially declare that except meant unless, and that therefore the Constitution did not prohibit as a punishment of treason the forfeiture of the fee simple of a traitor's estate? Where there is a will there is a way. The joint resolution could by Congress be amended and explained, and the Supreme Court could be so organized as, not only in this case but on other great questions, to declare the law of the Constitution to be in accordance with the policy and desires of the radical and revolutionary men who are determined to control, and do control, this Administration.

I do not hesitate, Mr. Speaker, upon my responsibility as a Representative, to say that the Chief Magistrate who made the declarations of the President's inaugural address of March 4, 1861, under the solemn sanction of official oath, in the presence of a people whose hearts were quivering with intensest interest and fear for the nation's fate, fear of disunion and civil war, and who was afterwards capable of making and declaring as the law of this land the proclamations of January 1 and December 8, 1863, is capable of so organizing and influencing the Supreme Court of the United States that it or a majority of it will declare that the Constitution of the United States means just what this Administration wants it to mean, regardless of the history, the wisdom, and the judicial precedents of the past. We live, sir, in the midst of a great revolution, and of the ways and means to ends, which revolutionists will use if need be. Ambition and suddenly acquired power may and do corrupt and drag from their moral moorings the souls even of men who have had greatness thrust upon them, because their neighbors and the world applied to them the epithet or title "honest."

I have thus, I think, truly traced out the motive or inducement to the introduction of the joint amendatory resolution now before the House.

1. This resolution proposes to substitute, in place of the language of the joint resolution of July 17, 1862, which, whether that was the effect of the second clause of section three, article three, of the Constitution or not, absolutely prevented the forfeiture of more than a life estate, the words "except during," as used in the Constitution itself, instead of "beyond," as used in the original joint resolution; the word "except" being the little loop whereon the astute Underwood had hung his doubt. The word "real," before estate, in the original resolution, is also proposed to be stricken out by the amendment.

2. For fear that this amended phraseology might still be construed as a restriction upon the power of forfeiture beyond life, the intent and meaning of the proposed amendment are declared to be, that the operation and effect of the confiscation act is only limited so far as to make it conform to the Constitution, section three, article three. In other words, it means that the act of confiscation may be treated as empowering absolute confiscation of all rebel property, subject to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States upon the question whether more than a life estate can be forfeited under the act.

3. The amendment provides that the President's proclamation of July 25, 1862, based on section six of the act of July 17, shall be held sufficient warning and proclamation to bring all offending persons within the operation of confiscation; that is, that such proclamation should establish the right and fact of forfeiture, as dating sixty days after July 25, 1862. This provision leaves no door of escape, except the mercy of the President, to offenders who, though then rebels, may since have ceased to be such, and is another evidence of the vindictive and unjust spirit that pervades the confiscation policy. The President's warning of July 25, 1862, established the period of sixty days after that date as the time when a life estate only should become forfeit, the confiscation act prohibiting any greater forfeiture than that. Now, by virtue of this joint resolution, if the Supreme Court decides under it that the fee may be forfeited or confiscated, the forfeiture is to be held to relate back to sixty days after July 25, 1862, and divest the fee simple from that time; when at that time there was no law by which more than the life estate could be forfeited. This is to all intents ex post facto and retroactive legislation; imposing a greater punishment upon a crime than the law warranted when the crime was committed.

It is therefore apparent to my mind, Mr. Speaker, from the terms of the joint resolution itself and from the tenor of the arguments of gentlemen who favor it, that it is a foregone conclusion and well understood that the judicial interpretation of the act of July 17, 1862, after this joint resolution is passed, is to be such that the party in power will be able to consummate their unholy purpose of sweeping away from their present owners, and from their perhaps innocent and certainly now defenseless heirs, the lands of the southern States, and substituting in their places as owners of the soil the freed negroes of the South, and the more ignoble white men who are watching with vulturous eyes to plunge upon the confiscated spoil of the conquered rebels of the South. Against such a scheme, sir, I would be untrue to the best instincts of my own nature, untrue to that divine religion which I profess to honor, untrue to the principles of humanity, untrue to the cardinal principles of the law of nations and the constitutional jurisprudence of my own country, untrue to the Union and Constitution, for whose salvation I would willingly give my life, if I did not enter my earnest and solemn protest.

It is not by such means, sir, nor by any of your schemes of subjugation and overthrow of States and extermination or expatriation of their people, that you are to conquer rebellion and restore the Union and Constitution to their pristine peace and integrity. The work of true restoration must begin in the hearts of the people, in driving out hatred and malice and mean cupidity, in restoring reverence for the Constitution and its sacred obligations, in a disposition to temper justice with mercy, in a disposition to bury in oblivion the follies and sins of the past.

It may be, sir, and my political action hitherto has been based upon the idea, that the war may be a necessity of longer, indefinite duration. It is certainly a fact of present existence, and its responsibilities are upon us and not to be ignored nor escaped. So long as armies are in the field, watching and waiting to destroy or conquer each other, the armies that belong to us must be fed and clothed and supplied with the comforts and rewards which their valor, their patriotism, their labors, and privations demand, and with all the material power to give to war its due operation and effect, and to our arms victory. The soldiers of the Union are our soldiers, our Army; our brothers, kindred, and friends. They have been called and gone forth—some freely, as patriots should ever go forth; some by force; some tempted by gain—to fight in our cause. They have fought bravely and well on many a bloody field, and myriads of nameless graves and mourning households, and tens of thousands of maimed and shattered wrecks of youthful manhood all over the land, tell too truly how well and bravely our soldiers have fought. Let us stand by them and do our duty to them, and all who are dependent upon them, as we expect our soldiers to do their duty to us. If it be necessary, as it may be, to break the military power of the States in arms against us, let it be broken speedily and effectually, not by paper proclamations and paper confiscations and bureaus of freedmen's affairs, but by battles, sieges, strategy, and all the highest skill and power of war on land and sea.

But, sir, there is a power which, in the experience of history, ever has and ever will prove more potent than armies and navies to quiet discontent, to restore order, to establish law, and to give to a Government its strongest and best foundation in the love of its people—that is, the power of right; and by right I mean not alone justice, but equity, charity, mercy, kindness—all those noble attributes of humanity which unite men in the bonds of mutual respect and affection.

Sir, have we no faith in God, no faith in the divine religion of Christianity, no faith in the kind charities whose golden threads interlace, like nervous fibers, even the most rugged human natures, if you will but feel for them with a tender hand, that we, as legislators, should declare, as a majority of this House have declared, upon the resolution of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. SMITH,] that "The only hope of saving this country is by the power of the sword, and that we oppose any armistice or intervention or mediation or proposition for peace from any quarter, so long as there shall be found a rebel in arms against the Government?"

Is that, sir, the spirit in which this Union was formed and waxed great in power and glory under the benign influence of peace? Is that the spirit by which the Union is to be restored and preserved? Far from it. In sober reason I ask, sir, shall the foolhardiness or wickedness of one rebel in arms be enough to silence the myriad voices pleading for peace, and continue upon this nation the curse of disunion and civil war? I trust it is not so. Will the world scorn us, will history reproach us, will wise and good men doubt our wisdom or our manhood, if, while we maintain our armies, as we should, to defend our States and our supreme law from the power of the armies of rebellion, we also use, all the while, in every way, by arguments, by appeals, by forbearance, by honorable concessions, if need be, the power and influence of peace to bring back, as willing freemen, not as reluctant slaves, to the common shelter and fold, the wanderers from our father's house of Federal Union?

Sir, while I love the Union and the Constitution, and repudiate secession and denounce it as a suicidal folly, and its acts as an enormous public crime, and while I long for the overthrow of rebellion and infidelity to the Constitution of my country, I will also say, regardless of the motives that may be imputed to me, that I indulge no malice nor hate to any man, woman, or child in the States in rebellion, and far rather would I win them to our cause by words of peace than to destroy or subdue them by the power of war.

Sir, let this Administration give some heed and deference to the opinions and arguments of the multitudes of faithful Union men in all the Union States, and even in rebellious States, who differ with its policy, and rise above and abandon the extreme dogmas and policy of party, and repudiate emancipation and confiscation and expatriation or extermination by Federal power, and try with earnestness and in good faith, in any form or in any way—I care not what, so long as it neither degrades nor dishonors us, nor those we would win back to us—the power of a tender of the Union under the Constitution as it is, with full amnesty and pardon for the past, to the rulers and people in rebellion; and if we do not gain our cause by the offer, we at least do not weaken it nor strengthen that of the enemy by such effort to deal with them in the spirit and by the methods of the Constitution.

Sir, if the President needs arguments and precedents for such an effort of magnanimity and true statesmanship, let him consult the history of his own country. Let him turn to the records and precedents referred to in the able and eloquent speech of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FERNANDO WOOD,] Let him go beyond those records to those of the British Parliament in the days when the elder and the younger Pitt and Burke and Fox and Camden and their compeers appealed for justice, for the principles of the British constitution, for liberty, for law, for peace in behalf of the "rebels" in the American colonies, instead of urging against them the vengeance and havoc of war. Let him, and let other men too, learn from such great exemplars in true statesmanship and lofty patriotism, that to plead for a just and honorable peace, even with rebels in arms, is not treason to the Union and Constitution, nor sympathy with rebellion, any more than were the pleadings of Pitt and Burke treason to the crown and realm of England.

Mr. SMITH obtained the floor, but yielded to Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland, who moved that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The House divided; and the Speaker announced that there were 45 voting in the affirmative and 45 in the negative, and that the Speaker voted in the negative.

Mr. HOLMAN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOLMAN and GRINNELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 45, noes 45.

The Speaker voted in the negative.

So the motion was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. DAVIS's motion; and it was agreed to.

And thereupon (at a quarter to five o'clock p.m.) the House adjourned.

The concurrent resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

LOUISIANA ELECTION.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the report of the Committee of Elections in the case of the claim of A. P. Field to a seat in this House as a Representative from the State of Louisiana.

The resolution reported by the Committee of Elections was read, as follows:

Resolved, That A. P. Field is not entitled to a seat in this House as a Representative from the State of Louisiana in the Thirty-Eighth Congress.

Mr. DAWES. I do not desire to detain the House but a few moments upon this report. I take it for granted that every gentleman in the House has read the report of the committee, and that renders it unnecessary for me to detain the House very long.

The facts in the case are briefly these: the claimant came here at the commencement of the session with what purported to be credentials from a Mr. Riddell claiming to act as Governor of the State of Louisiana, in company with one other gentleman, and presented a certificate containing the names of three gentlemen, declaring them to have been elected from the State of Louisiana according to the laws of that State.

These credentials were referred to the Committee of Elections, and that committee having examined the case find the facts to be as follows:

The State of Louisiana under the apportionment of 1850 was entitled to four members to this House. Under the apportionment of 1860 that State is entitled to five members. Subsequent to the last apportionment, during the last Congress, a law was passed requiring that each State entitled to more than one Representative in Congress should be divided into congressional districts equal in number to the number of Representatives to which it was entitled. The State of Louisiana has never been so divided, and therefore no person in that State could be elected in accordance with that law of Congress.

It will be recollected that Congress, or rather this House, in the last Congress passed a bill dividing the State of Louisiana into five congressional districts, which failed to pass the other branch of Congress and to become a law.

This election, or endeavor to hold an election, was held in what was the first congressional district under the old law, and is composed of the larger part of the city of New Orleans and two parishes outside, those of Plaquemines and St. Bernard. The military governor of the State of Louisiana, previous to the day fixed by law, the 2d day of November, for the election of Representatives to Congress, issued a military order forbidding the election to be held, and no attempt was made to hold an election in the city of New Orleans. There was an attempt to hold it outside of the city in the two parishes belonging to this district; and there were votes cast under the auspices of a committee of citizens appointed for that purpose to whom returns were made. And the claimant presented evidence before the committee of votes in one of these parishes—St. Bernard—to the number of 156; and it was said that about the same number of votes were cast, though he had no personal knowledge of the fact, in the other parish of Plaquemines; of that we have no evidence before the committee. The only evidence before the committee was that Mr. Field had received 156 votes in the parish of St. Bernard. The parishes of St. Bernard and Plaquemines contained, according to the census of 1860, 12,566 inhabitants, of whom 2,563 were male whites; and a large portion of the city of New Orleans contained in 1862, when this district was formed, the balance of the then apportionment of 93,000. How many they have at this time it is impossible to tell.

Mr. Speaker, the question is whether a gentleman coming here with a constituency as presented by this report, of 156 votes in one of these parishes and about the same number in the other parish, the others by the order of a military governor being compelled to refrain from expressing their will at the polls, could in any way be considered as having been elected. If there were no difficulty on any other point, the State had never been divided into districts. This seemed to the committee to be sufficient reason to conclude and to recommend the adoption of a resolution that Mr. Field was not entitled to a seat upon this floor.

The credentials presented were from a gentleman supposed to have been elected Governor at the same time that this election was held. The time for which it is alleged he was elected Governor did not, according to the laws of the State, commence till the 1st of January. It is impossible to understand by what process of reasoning this man came to the conclusion that he was Governor of the State of Louisiana on the 20th of November, 1863, the day this certificate bears date. He received votes in two parishes outside of the city of New Orleans and connected with that city. How many votes he received he was unable to say. He appeared personally before the committee and testified that he was competent to act as Governor before a justice of the peace at New Orleans. But he was not inaugurated when he assumed to act as Governor in making out this certificate. Why, sir, the certificate is made out in the city of Washington upon information received by him, but of which he had no personal knowledge.

These are the facts of the case, and without going further into the discussion of matters which might have been raised, the committee were unanimous that the resolution reported should be adopted for the reason that there was a failure to conform to the law, and to afford an opportunity to the loyal voters of the district, except in the smallest fraction of it, to have a voice in this election. We hold that this can, in no proper sense, be considered as an election entitling the applicant to a seat in this House.

Mr. SMITHERS. Mr. Speaker, I propose to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments only in giving my assent to the conclusion to which the Committee of Elections has come; and I only desire to express a qualified assent to a portion of the report. I do it merely for the purpose of putting myself upon the record that I may not be embarrassed hereafter when other questions of moment come to be discussed before the House, upon which this possibly may have a bearing. I find in the report of the committee this clause:

"The committee know of no other reason why another election could not have been held on the second day of November, the day provided by law for regular elections, except the failure of Congress to district the State in conformity with the law already quoted. And had the claimant been able to have removed that difficulty, the interference of the military governor in suppressing an election on the day provided by law for holding it would have been without justification, and would, in the opinion of the committee, have deserved the condemnation of the House."

Now, Mr. Speaker, with the statement that the great majority of the people of Louisiana were in rebellion against the Government of the United States, and there having been no regularly organized government in that State, either directly or otherwise, and the whole State having been under the military government of the United States, I submit that it is a very dangerous thing, so far as we are concerned, to permit four or five hundred men to gather together, without any government whatever, at the places fixed by the law for holding an election, and there hold an election the result of which is to send a Representative to a seat upon this floor to determine grave questions. I, for one, as I stand impressed now, would not be willing to vote that any gentleman should have a seat, to vote on these questions, until a government has been established in his State which has been recognized by the Government of the United States. Otherwise we might find ourselves complicated and embarrassed by people in the rebel States coming together at their voting places in their respective States, and sending gentlemen here to vote down our measures of enrollment, and other measures necessary for the protection of the Government.

Mr. KERNAN. This report of the committee which has been laid before us is an answer to the remarks of the gentleman from Delaware, [Mr. SMITHERS.] If gentlemen will look at the report of the committee they will see that the committee unanimously agreed that there was notice of an election given. In reference to Mr. Field and the city of New Orleans, the committee say:

"It is due to him, however, that the committee should add that the testimony before them disclosed abundant evidence of his loyalty to the Government, and of his temperate and judicious efforts to restore the State to the discharge of its functions as a member of the Union. The evidence was equally gratifying that the city of New Orleans had in no degree fallen back from that quiet, orderly, and loyal condition in which, under the auspices and with the coöperation of this same military governor, the city one year ago elected two Representatives to the last Congress, by a very large vote, who served out here what remained of that Congress, on an equal footing with all others."

I ask the House to bear in mind that more than a year ago, with the laws of the State of Louisiana and the acts of Congress exactly what they were last November, two members were elected in that State, and were allowed to represent that people upon this floor. I call attention to this matter only to allude to the suppression of the election in New Orleans last November by a brigadier general, when, as the report shows, and the evidence proves, the city of New Orleans was in the same good condition as it was two years ago. The same good order and proper state of things prevailed there, and yet the committee tell us that the election was, so far as New Orleans is concerned, suppressed by an order emanating directly from the military authority of the State, Brigadier General Shepley. It is due to the committee to say that they have discharged their duty; and if we pass over in silence what they bring before us now, we shall fail to discharge our duty. The report does on to say:

"The committee know of no other reason why another election could not have been held on the 2d day of November, the day provided by law for regular elections, except the failure of Congress to district the State, in conformity with the law already quoted."

That Congress had failed to do a year ago. The law of July, 1862, declared that there should be five districts of contiguous territory. Suppose Congress and the State had failed to district the State, does a military general have the right to suppress an election, when, if men are elected by the people and are sent here, this House is the judge whether they are elected or not? Was he to suppress an election because he thought there was some irregularity? It is for the House alone to determine whether there is anything wrong, and we must place our condemnation upon it, unless we are ready to surrender up the rights of the people to the dictation of a brigadier general.

But mark what the committee say further:

"And had the claimant been able to have removed that difficulty, the interference of the military governor in suppressing an election on the day provided by law for holding it would have been without justification, and would, in the opinion of the committee, have deserved the condemnation of the House."

Does not it deserve it now?

"It is to be regretted that any opposition which the military governor felt called upon to make to the peaceful exercise of the elective franchise by legal voters, on the day fixed by law for the election of Representatives in Congress—the highest and most sacred privilege guaranteed to the citizen—should not have been based upon the legal and defensible ground above alluded to."

The committee say to us that the only objection—if there was any—was technical, merely as to a matter of law; that the State did not district the State and Congress had not. But they say to us that the general who suppressed the election did not base his action upon any such ground. We are asked, it seems to me, with this report before us, to say whether we condemn such action or not. And unless this House, which I think is the proper authority, shall express its condemnation of the suppression of elections by persons in military authority, we shall have a war of factions, which the committee say is growing up in Louisiana. They say:

"It did not appear before the committee whether the military governor acted in this matter in obedience to orders from his superiors or not."

It did appear that an election was held a year ago, in which members were elected, who came here and aided in legislation, under entirely the same state of the law and of facts as to the prevalence of good order; and whether the election appointed in November last was legal or not, is not a question for the military commander. He had no right to suppress it because he thought it illegal. The committee say:

"But sufficient was disclosed to show that the loyal men of that State are much divided, and their strength wasted in pursuing and combating abstract theories, and in nursing factions constantly aiming for the ascendancy."

Factions were growing up. What was the general doing there? Aiding in enforcing the laws? No, sir; he was suppressing an election which was orderly; and the committee say:

"And there was too much evidence that Government officials have been lending the influence of their official position to the advancement of these schemes."

Factions were growing up; an election was sought to be held by law there, and it was suppressed; and the committee say there was too much evidence before them that Government officials were lending their aid to schemes of factionists who were distracting a people who desired to submit to the Constitution and the laws, to be within the Union, and to aid it in its struggle to restore itself to what it should be under a state of peace.

I call attention to this from the one desire—which I trust will commend itself to every gentleman upon this floor—that Congress shall express its condemnation of military commanders suppressing elections where the people, as the committee say, are perfectly orderly, and where everything is proper for holding an election; where the state of things is precisely as it was, both in law and the condition of the people, a year ago, when two gentlemen were elected and sent here and allowed to represent them here. If we allow this thing, and if no voice of condemnation comes from this Congress now, it seems to me that we are delivering up these people, who are endeavoring to be loyal, who are desirous of submitting to the Constitution and laws, who are willing to conduct elections as good citizens should do and to be represented here—we are delivering them over to these factions and to the tyrannical rule of military commanders who take upon themselves to say whether they will allow elections to be held or not.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask the gentleman if the two gentlemen who were admitted upon this floor at the last Congress were not elected under the apportionment and districting of the State under the census of 1850, and whether there has been any apportionment and districting of the State under the census of 1860?

Mr. KERNAN. I suppose, although I am not a member of the Committee of Elections, that they must have been elected under the former apportionment; and I understand that there has been no redistricting of the State under the census of 1860. I have read from the report of the committee to show that but for the want of a districting of the State under the census of 1860 there would have been no objection to this election which was suppressed. Now, I suppose that there was just as much irregularity in the election of the two gentlemen who were admitted to the last Congress as in this case.

But, sir, I did not get up to argue. I concur in the report of the Committee of Elections. I got up merely to ask the House whether, when the Constitution confers upon each branch of Congress the right to judge of the qualifications and elections of its members, they will approve or pass over in silence the act of a military officer who takes it upon himself to suppress an election because he thinks it not according to law. That is the question which we ought to meet if we mean to preserve the principles upon which the Government is based.

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman let me say a word?

Mr. KERNAN. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. We are blamed for having admitted members from Louisiana into the last House of Representatives. There are but very few here now who did that. I think that most of those now here who were in the last Congress disapproved of it very much. They were admitted by force of the power of the House, without, as I then supposed, any law or right.

Mr. KERNAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will understand that I am not making any point as to whether those gentlemen were admitted rightfully or not. I am not here to say whether the election of those gentlemen was regular or not, or whether they were rightfully admitted here or not. I am here simply to say that we shall be recreant to our duty if we allow an election to be suppressed by a military commander because he thinks it is not according to law. He was not to be the judge of that; and we owe it to ourselves, in this stormy period of our history, to see to it that military commanders are kept within their appropriate spheres, and that the people are protected from any usurpation of power.

Sir, I make these remarks in no censorious spirit. This question is brought before us by the report of the Committee of Elections, which lies upon our desks, and which shows that this general did suppress the election, so that, in the language of the committee, not a vote was cast when there were thousands of voters. I do not claim that there were votes enough cast at this election to make a Representative. I am not in favor of admitting gentlemen here having no constituencies. But I am in favor of condemning this exercise of military power for the sake of our country, for we must either condemn the principle involved in this case or sanction it.

With a view of having the House express itself upon this question, I have drawn up an amendment which I will now offer.

The amendment which I propose is to add to the resolution reported by the committee the following:

And that this House disapproves and condemns the orders made by Brigadier General Shepley suppressing the election appointed to be held in Louisiana on the 2d day of November, 1863.

We do not say by this whether that election would have been valid or not. I do not desire to discuss that point. But when the report of the committee shows that there was entire good order there, when the military authority had suppressed all resistance, when the Constitution and laws could be enforced, I think we ought to say that in such a case no military general has a right to suppress an election, whether it be right or whether it be wrong.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York is hardly in order. The usage has been that only amendments which relate explicitly to the question of whether a member is or is not entitled to his seat are in order.

Mr. SMITHERS. Mr. Speaker, I merely rose, as I stated, for the purpose of expressing, not absolute dissent with the report of the committee, but such a qualification as may enable me to keep the true position which, in my judgment, I ought to hold. So far as the case that has been alluded to by the gentleman from New York is concerned, where members were allowed to take seats on this floor by the action of the last House of Representatives, that in no way affects my position. I was not here. Had I been here I should have voted against their admission. I stand, therefore, entirely free and untrammelled by the operations of the precedent. My objection is that there is no civil government in the State of Louisiana; not that the State of Louisiana is out of the Union, but that there is no government there carried on under the laws of the land. A military governor holds possession of the State.

Mr. KERNAN. Is it for the general commanding there to decide that there is no such government as that an election may be held; or should he not rather let the election go on, and let the persons elected go to the courts or come here to see what their condition is?

Mr. SMITHERS. I was coming to that, and I may as well come to it now. The gentleman from New York does not understand me, I hope, as condemning here the action of the military governor of Louisiana in that particular. I have nothing to do with that action.

I am not guilty of any breach of confidence in saying that there was no evidence to my mind, except the ex parte statements of the candidate in regard to what took place in the State of Louisiana as the action of the governor; and I have been too long in the habit of sifting testimony not to know that such ex parte statements, however honest, are unreliable as the basis of judgment. As to the actions of the military governor of Louisiana, I neither approve nor condemn them. I place my action on different grounds altogether. That is, that no four hundred or no five thousand men can ex mero motu take advantage of laws primarily existing in the State to assemble together, whether in Virginia or South Carolina, and elect Representatives where there is no State government recognized by the Government of the United States, and where there is no act of Congress operative to sift loyal or disloyal voters. I am not willing to admit to a seat on this floor a Representative sent here to vote on great questions of policy, without there having been some rule established by which it can be determined at the polls whether a voter is loyal or disloyal. I am not willing to place this country and Government in the predicament of being subjected to have Representatives sent here by rebel votes; and I meant to assume only the position that until there shall be some government in a State recognized by the Government of the United States, or until Congress shall pass some law under which these elections may be held, I, for one, cannot consent to recognize any man as a Representative on this floor from such State. That is the sole position that I take. It is the extent to which I go; and to that extent I hold that the principle is a sound and safe one. Any other rule might possibly fill vacant seats here with men whose main object is to embarrass the Government and destroy the Republic.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, the claimant to this seat in Congress from the State of Louisiana is on the floor, and desires to be heard. I suggest that he have that privilege.

The SPEAKER. The claimant is entitled to the floor by order of the House.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Before the gentleman goes on I desire, if in order, to submit an amendment to the resolution of the committee.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there is no legal authority to hold any election in the State of Louisiana; and that any attempt to hold an election by any body of persons is a usurpation of sovereign authority against the authority of the United States, and was properly forbidden by the military authority.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman, as he did to the gentleman from New York some minutes ago, that in accordance with the usual custom of the House amendments of this character are not entertained. It has been the custom only to entertain propositions stating that the claimant is or is not entitled to a seat. As the House will perceive, various complications would arise out of amendments of this character. The claimant for the seat is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. FIELD, (claimant.) I have not, Mr. Speaker, the vanity to suppose that anything I can say would at all change the opinions of any member of the committee before which my claim has passed, nor that it could alter the determination of this House in regard to the right I have to a seat here; but I feel it due to myself, and I feel it due to those men who, I believe, properly and legally sent me here, to vindicate them upon this floor before I leave Washington, and before I forfeit all right to a presence in this House.

This question in regard to elections in Louisiana, as well as in all the States situated as she is, is a grave and important question. It is one not free from difficulty, I must confess. The loyal men of Louisiana, from the time of the passage of the ordinance of secession, have held that they were in the Union. We have maintained our position as citizens of the United States, loyal to the Government of the United States, and we never dreamed that we had forfeited any right to the protection of this Government, or to our representation in this House, in consequence of the acts of the men who had forced Louisiana out of the Union.

It is said by some gentlemen here that we have no government in Louisiana; that we had no right to hold an election. Sir, if we are a State, how do you propose to get us back? If those who were in authority have become traitors to the Government of the United States, and have forfeited their right to claim their offices there, let me ask the gentleman how he proposes to get the State of Louisiana back into the Union?

Suppose the loyal people of Louisiana, after the ordinance of secession, and after the Governor and members of the Legislature had given their allegiance to the government of the confederate States, had obtained the power in that State—and we would have had that power if it had not been for the fault of the United States Government in failing to protect us in that great emergency—suppose these men had fled from the State, leaving the offices vacant, would not we have had the power to hold an election, and to organize under our laws and elect men who were loyal?

But it is said that we have no organization in our State. I hold in my hand an official document which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

Mr. FIELD. It appears from this official announcement, made more than a year ago, that we have some sort of a government that claims to be a civil government. Judges of the courts throughout that country within the Federal lines have been appointed, and are now administering the laws and constitution of the State of Louisiana.

It will be remarked further that this patronage in the State of Louisiana amounts to near half a million dollars. The city of New Orleans pays, and has paid annually, since its occupation by Federal troops, near two million five hundred thousand dollars in taxes collected by collectors appointed by the military governor. Nearly two million five hundred thousand dollars are drawn from the people of that city annually, and they have no voice either in their own government at home or in the Congress of the United States by which the evils they complain of can be corrected.

Independent of all that, we are paying in that city a large amount of internal revenue collected by the Government. The citizens have large claims upon the Government, and although they are loyal, they are denied any voice here because we cannot produce any order from some higher authority than we have done in this case.

The gentleman from Delaware has expressed some fears, if these elections are recognized, lest some disloyal man should come here and oppose measures for carrying on the war. Let me tell the gentleman from Delaware that I can point him to a thousand men in office who I fear are much more disloyal than those in Louisiana; and he would have no fear if he knew as well as I do the loyalty of the people of that State to this Government.

Mr. SMITHERS. Permit me to say that I had no allusion to him in the remark which I made. I desire only to say that it was not personal.

Mr. FIELD. Neither do I wish to be personal, but I do not think that the gentleman from Delaware ought to be scrupulous about this particular point. I have always been a loyal man. I fought against secession to the utmost of my power. I endangered my life for months and months. I was never anything else, than a loyal man; and I hope that I never will be. I will stand by that flag where ever it floats, and when I die I hope that it will be in the country over which it waves. But it appears that men who have been traitors to the Government, who have been disloyal to the Government, are now in great favor with some gentlemen. They never were with me. I know, so far as my experience and observation in Louisiana are concerned, that the man who comes fresh from the battle-field, his hands reeking with the blood of our loyal men, pretending to make atonement for his sins, is taken into favor, and that there is more rejoicing over him than over ninety-nine loyal and good men. You cannot go very far from Washington to find out—. But I will not say what I was going to say. It would be traveling out of the record.

One word to the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.] The State of Louisiana is in the Union, or out of it. If she is out of the Union she has no right to hold an election. If she is a conquered province Congress should pass laws to govern her, and when it is necessary to let her into the Union again Congress should pass a law to admit her in accordance with the constitutional provision. You have only the two alternatives: she is either in or out of the Union. If she is out of the Union she has no right to elect a member of Congress.

Mr. STEVENS. Allow me to say a word.

Mr. FIELD. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. Has the gentleman any information by what authority this military governor was appointed?

Mr. FIELD. I leave that to the gentleman to answer.

Mr. STEVENS. I meant no disrespect to the gentleman. I thought it right to put the question in order to indicate my position.

Mr. FIELD. I am not prepared to go into the discussion of the question of the right or power of this Government to appoint a military governor. He was appointed and has exercised the functions of that office in the most extensive manner. The honorable members of this House will be startled when I tell them that for the officers appointed by that military governor $600,000 of the people's money is collected in the city of New Orleans. Each of the judges appointed by him gets $5,000 a year—as much almost as the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States receive. The office of sheriff in the city of New Orleans is worth $25,000 a year. Each of the clerkships is worth $6,000, and each of the judges $6,000. There is the exercise of this power of the military governor.

I have brought with me, Mr. Speaker, the revised laws of the State of Louisiana and the constitution of that State adopted in 1852. One section of the latter provides that—

"Every white male who has attained the age of twenty-one years, and who has been a resident of the State twelve months next preceding the election, shall be a qualified voter."

The military governor undertook to repeal that part of the constitution. He changed it by a military order. I did not know that the military governor, assuming that he exercises the functions of a governor out of office, had the power to change any law. I thought that his duty was to execute the laws. I did not know that he had the authority entirely to abrogate any portion of the constitution or laws. But he did so. He issued his order declaring that any person residing in the State six months preceding the election should be a qualified voter. Here is the order:

STATE OF LOUISIANA, CITY OF NEW ORLEANS,
OFFICE OF COMMISSIONER OF REGISTRATION. }

The following rules and regulations are prescribed for the guidance of registers of voters, appointed to make a registration under order from the executive department of the State, dated June 12, 1863, and October 9, 1863:

1. The office of commissioner of registration for the State will be held at No. 18 Carondelet street, Room No. 1, New Orleans. It will be open during business hours of the day. All communications will be addressed to the commissioner at that place. Persons having information to impart on the subject of the registration of voters are invited to visit the office at all times.

2. Each register of voters before entering upon the discharge of his duties as such shall take and subscribe before any judge, justice of the peace, or other officer authorized to administer oaths, the following oath or affirmation:

FORM OF OATH OR AFFIRMATION.

I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am a citizen of the United States of America; that I have resided six months in the State of Louisiana, and one month in this parish; that I am of the age of twenty-one years and upwards; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and will support the Constitution thereof; and that I now register myself as a voter, freely and voluntarily, for the purpose of organizing a State government in Louisiana, loyal to the Government of the United States; and that I will to the best of my ability faithfully perform the functions of register of voters for the parish (or district) of ———.

A copy of this oath, duly sworn, subscribed, and attested, shall be forwarded to Thomas J. Durant, attorney general and commissioner of registration, New Orleans.

3. The book for the registration of voters shall be ruled on each page, in as many columns as will be necessary to show the name and residence of each voter; and on the first page of the book shall be inscribed the oath required by section two to be taken by the register, which he shall take and subscribe, and procure the first to be affixed to by the officer administering the same.

4. Each register, as soon as he shall have been qualified, shall enter upon the discharge of his duties. He shall open his office at convenient points in the parish, to be selected by himself, unless otherwise designated by superior authority, and give such public notice of the fact and locality as may be practicable.

5. The offices shall be kept open for the registration of voters during business hours every day except holidays.

6. It shall be the duty of each register of voters to inscribe upon his book every citizen of the United States, a resident six months in the State, and one month in the parish, and who shall take the following oath or affirmation:

FORM OF OATH OR AFFIRMATION.

I, ———, do solemnly swear (or affirm) that I am a citizen of the United States of America; that I have resided six months in the State of Louisiana, and one month in this parish; that I am of the age of twenty-one years and upwards; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and will support the Constitution thereof; and that I now register myself as a voter, freely and voluntarily, for the purpose of organizing a State government in Louisiana, loyal to the Government of the United States.

7. Any person taking the affidavits prescribed either in the second or sixth sections, and swearing falsely in any material part thereof, shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and liable to prosecution and punishment accordingly.

8. It is enjoined upon each register to be careful in administering the prescribed oath, and in taking down accurately the name and residence of the voter; and diligently to ascertain that the applicants for registration are loyal to the Government of the United States.

9. It is further enjoined upon the registers of voters to use their whole influence and employ all honorable means to procure a full and fair registration of all loyal men entitled to be registered; and all well-wishers of the country are earnestly requested to encourage the registration.

10. The offices of the registers of voters will be kept open until closed by due notice from this office.

THOMAS J. DURANT,
Attorney General, and Commissioner of Registration.
Approved: G. F. SHEPLEY,

Military Governor of Louisiana.
NEW ORLEANS, October 28, 1863.

You see now, Mr. Speaker, the condition in which the people of Louisiana were placed by this order changing the constitutional provision in regard to the qualification of voters. On reading that order I was struck with profound surprise, and I searched in vain to find some warrant or authority to justify the military governor in thus striking from our constitution the most important clause in regard to the qualification of voters. All the power was given by the military governor to his attorney general—the power of registration of votes throughout the States, with power to appoint sub-registers. And is this not a very extraordinary power to have emanating from a military governor? Sir, there was no such power attempted to be exercised on any former occasion, or in any other State situated as Louisiana was.

As early as September 19 of last year, the people met together in the city of New Orleans from the different portions of the State then within Federal lines, and held a convention. Gentlemen ask by what authority we held this election; where was our warrant? I say to gentlemen that if we had no authority or warrant for doing it, our laws are nugatory, and we have no rights, and our State is out of the Union in consequence of the rebellion.

Upon the assembling of that convention—and I say this in vindication of myself and the loyal people of Louisiana—a communication was addressed to the military governor of Louisiana, as will appear by a document which I ask may be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, September 19, 1863.

A meeting of the citizens resident in the first and second congressional districts of the State of Louisiana assembled this 18th day of September, instant, (1863,) at the hour of six o'clock p. m., at No. 83 St. Charles street, in this city, to consult as to measures necessary for the establishment of civil government in Louisiana.

Mr. J. Q. A. Fellowes called the meeting to order, and explained its object.

When, on motion of Colonel A. P. Field, Dr. J. L. Riddell was called to the chair to preside, and, on motion, Mr. Robert J. Ker was appointed secretary.

Mr. J. Q. A. Fellowes offered the following resolution: Resolved, That a committee of five members be appointed to wait on his Excellency George F. Shepley, military governor of Louisiana, to invite his cooperation in the object contemplated.

On motion, said resolution was amended by increasing the number of the committee to nine members, and unanimously adopted.

Whereupon the chair appointed the following gentlemen to compose the committee:

Messrs. J. Q. A. Fellowes, C. Raselius, A. P. Field, Wm. J. Minor, E. E. Malliot, H. B. Foley, J. M. Lapier, H. T. Venard, and Judge E. White.

Judge E. White having declined, on motion, Dr. Riddell was appointed in his stead.

On motion, the meeting adjourned until to-morrow evening, 19th instant, at half past six o'clock p. m.

SATURDAY, September 19, 1863.

The meeting of citizens, pursuant to adjournment, assembled this evening at half past six o'clock p. m.; Dr. J. L. Riddell presiding.

The minutes of the last evening were read, and, on motion, approved.

Mr. J. Q. A. Fellowes, in behalf of the special committee to whom was assigned the duty of waiting on his Excellency George F. Shepley, military governor of Louisiana, submitted the following report:

Your committee appointed to communicate with his Excellency Governor Shepley, and request his cooperation with us in the speedy and effective reestablishment of civil government in Louisiana, respectfully report: That they waited upon him agreeably to their appointment and presented to him the wishes and views of this meeting. Mr. Raselius acting as spokesman. After a somewhat lengthy interview, the governor declined to order an election for members of Congress until after the State should be redivided under the census of 1850, and in accordance with a law of Congress requiring such apportionment. He also declined to order any election whatever until he should receive instructions to that effect from Washington, as he had asked instructions, and had not as yet received them; but expressed his willingness to at once forward to the President of the United States any communication which the committee might see fit to address him upon the subject. As it was necessary that this communication should be presented before four p. m., your committee prepared, signed, and presented to the Governor in due time the communication a copy of which is herewith appended.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

J. Q. A. FELLOWES,
For Committee.

GENERAL: At a meeting of loyal citizens of Louisiana convened at No. 83 St. Charles street, in this city, on the 18th September, instant, the undersigned were appointed a committee to communicate with your Excellency, and advise upon the subject of the reestablishment of civil government. We were specially instructed to ask your Excellency, as we now respectfully do, to issue as soon as may be to the proper officers in the several parishes of Louisiana writs of election for the first Monday of November next, for State officers and the Legislature, all in accordance with the constitution and laws of Louisiana.

We have the honor to subscribe ourselves your obedient servants, &c.
To his Excellency Brigadier General GEORGE F. SHEPLEY,
Military Governor of Louisiana.

Mr. FIELD. It will be perceived that the object of that meeting was to avoid having any difficulty with the military authorities in Louisiana, and to secure their cooperation, aid, and support, in order to enable us to come back with our Representatives in Congress, that we might then be considered as restored to the Union.

We had no complaint to make against the military authority. We were all upon the best terms—and we are yet—with both the military governor and the commanding general of that department. We not only addressed this communication to the military governor at an early period—long before the time provided by law for holding the election—but we invited the protection of the military authority; their sanction, their order, if you please, if it was necessary, that we should go on and restore the State to the Union.

Some gentlemen say we had no right to do it, because the State had not been distrusted. Suppose, for instance, that the State of Connecticut, through her Legislature, should fail at the next apportionment to district the State; suppose Congress failed to provide a time and place for holding the election for members of Congress; upon what principle of republican government would you pretend that the people should be denied all their rights to elect Representatives under that apportionment? If Connecticut had four members, and still retained four, where would be the injury in point of fact, and where would be the absolute violation of law, in pursuing such a course? Suppose the Governor of Pennsylvania, or the Governor of Maryland, should fail to issue his proclamation, according to law, setting forth the time of holding an election for members of Congress, would that invalidate the right of the people to vote, and to vote upon the day and in the mode pointed out by law?

Mr. SMITH, (interrupting.) I would suggest to the House that in consequence of the ill health of the gentleman who is now occupying the floor, and the desire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. Blow] to announce the death of a former member of this House, the gentleman from Louisiana be permitted to resume his argument on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. That may be done by a postponement of this matter.

Mr. SMITH. I move that the further consideration of this subject be postponed until Monday next, at one o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would state for the information of the House that the enrollment bill, so called, was postponed until two o'clock on Monday, and the bill in reference to conferring the rank of lieutenant general was postponed until after the morning hour of that day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest that this subject be postponed until after the morning hour.

Mr. DAWES. I do not see any objection to proceeding to-day, unless the gentleman from Louisiana requests a postponement. I do not think the case will occupy much time after the gentleman finishes his remarks.

Mr. FIELD. I will state to the gentleman, the chairman of the Committee of Elections, that he knows I have been exceedingly indisposed for several days past, and I prefer that the matter shall go over.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope that if this matter is postponed at all it will be postponed until after the other orders made for Monday next. I shall not consent that this business shall be so postponed as to interfere with the orders already made.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. I would suggest that it be postponed until one o'clock on Tuesday, if that will meet the approbation of the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. Field.)

Mr. GARFIELD. I understand that that does meet with his approbation.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the Chair if, in that case, this question would override the other measures which have been made special orders for Monday next and from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. It would; inasmuch as the resolution now before the House affects the right of a member to his seat, it would take precedence of all other matters.

Mr. DAWES. I am very anxious to have this matter disposed of, so as to get it out of the way of more important business. It is due to the Committee of Elections that early action should be had upon it, and I think we might proceed with it to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The House has already agreed to adjourn over until Monday.

Mr. ASHLEY. When did the House do that?

The SPEAKER. At the opening of to-day's session, on motion of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. J. C. ALLEN.]

Mr. DAWES. The reports from the Committee of Elections will be very numerous, and the committee must have the indulgence of the House in order to dispose of them.

Mr. SMITH. I submit the motion to postpone the further consideration until Tuesday next, at one o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

DEATH OF HON. JOHN W. NOELL.

Mr. BLOW. Mr. Speaker, a duty long deferred has devolved on me. I rise to announce the death of Hon. JOHN W. NOELL, late member of the Thirty-Seventh and member elect to the Thirty-Eighth Congress. This event, as is well known throughout the country, occurred directly after the close of the session, on the 14th of March last.

General NOELL was born in Bedford county, Virginia, February 22, 1816. In early life he commenced his education in an old field school, and, with a remarkable ambition which urged him to extraordinary efforts, he soon outstripped his youthful competitors, and became the equal of his teacher.

His family emigrating soon after to Missouri, the young NOELL had to assume at seventeen the responsibilities and position of manhood. He became overseer for his father, engaged afterward in merchandising, and at twenty years of age married the daughter of Hon. Charles Gregoire, one of the earliest and most esteemed settlers of Perry county.

In the course of the changing scenes of western life, Mr. NOELL became clerk of the circuit court of Perry county, and there and then commenced that close application to the study of his profession, the law, which enabled him to cope in after years with the most brilliant men of the Missouri bar. Among those gifted men none were more honored or more beloved than he. Of fine ability, agreeable presence, gentle and winning manners, and with a heart full of generosity, his career had ever been successful and full of happiness to himself and others.

General NOELL first entered public life as a Whig, having been elected by that party to the State Senate in 1852. The partiality of his friends went further, for he was soon afterward nominated as their candidate for the supreme court, and though the condition of political parties made his election almost an impossibility, he nevertheless received a large and flattering vote. His subsequent career is familiar to the country. On the death of Hon. Samuel Caruthers, member of Congress from southeast Missouri, he was elected to succeed him, filled the position at the next term, and was finally returned by the new district, created in 1861, to the Thirty-Eighth Congress. I need not remind the old members of this body of the brilliant record of this favorite son of Missouri, but I may be permitted to mention that, in addition to the services he rendered his own district and the country, he was at the close of the last session the warm friend and sterling advocate of every public and private interest of the first congressional or St. Louis district. We were without a member in Congress, important issues were at stake, and, compelled to draw heavily on the time and consideration of other Representatives, we appealed often to this honorable gentleman; our prayers were never unheeded, and his constant and efficient services were freely given to us.

It was my good fortune, Mr. Speaker, in this way, to know much of the man; and I should be ungrateful indeed if I did not bear my humble testimony to that close attention which he gave our every interest, and which added so much to his labors during that eventful session. But all of this, and all that he ever did before in his congressional career, fades into insignificance when compared with his services to our State, to union and liberty. Sir, this nation has been full of sympathy for the sufferings of the loyal men and women of Missouri, but no tongue has spoken, nor pen fitly described, the terrible ordeal through which they have passed, the painful sacrifices they have made, or the desolation which even now reigns among the beautiful hills and valleys of southern Missouri. It was there that treason had its warmest advocates, and there that traitors shed the blood of loyal hearts, banished the Union population from the soil they loved, and laid waste the homes made dear and sacred by long years of peace and happiness.

General NOELL was faithful to his country and the people who had honored him. When Beauregard opened his batteries on Sumter he lost all hope of averting war, and employed every power of his fine mind in soothing the passions of the border State men and to prevent the storm that threatened them with ruin. But it availed nothing; for though the secessionists were foiled in their attempt to organize openly at Camp Jackson, they had nevertheless sown the evil seeds among a deluded people. Flags were displayed in every portion of the State, and thousands, rallying around the standard of Governor Jackson and Sterling Price, arrayed themselves in open hostility to our Government. They sought out NOELL and besought him to join in a movement that was bound to be crowned with success, and yield him unfading laurels. His answer was prompt and plain. He told them of his hatred of traitors, and of his devotion to the precious Union which had been founded by our revolutionary fathers and so nobly sustained by their sons. He warned them of the fate that would flow from their treason, and implored them to be faithful to the Federal Government and to the State of Missouri; and thus prevented thousands of his periled friends from rushing headlong to destruction, and commenced the bright record which only terminated when he was called from the exciting scenes of this rebellion to a world where all is brightness, and where virtues endure through eternity. Others on whom as grave responsibilities rested were crushed beneath the weight of a degraded public opinion, but

"Faithful found
Among the faithless, faithful only he;
Among innumerable false, unmoved,
Unshaken, unseduced, unterrified,
His loyalty he kept, his love, his zeal;
Nor number, nor example, with him wrought
To swerve from truth, or change his constant mind, Though single."

His noblest triumphs, sir, were achieved in this Hall; here he battled for his country; here he raised in our darkest hour the standard of emancipation, and by ceaseless exertions induced this honorable body to vote $10,000,000 that Missouri's soil should be redeemed from the curse of slavery, and her rich lands and inexhaustible mines, the glorious future to which he looked with longing eyes, be consecrated forever to freedom and civilization. In a long correspondence with him during last winter, when the Legislature of Missouri was about to elect two United States Senators, and he had been nominated for one of these high positions by his friends, I had an excellent opportunity of understanding the patriotism which prompted his every action. An effort was made to unite a portion of the Union party, already unfortunately divided, with the opposing element, and thus elect two Senators. Against such an unholy alliance this uncompromising Unionist protested most warmly, and in his last letter he wrote to his friends:

"By all means prevent such a result; let no thought of me interfere with the election of two Senators unconditionally and wholly devoted to the Union."

Such was General NOELL, and such his imperishable record. As a statesman and patriot, as a husband and father, no feeble words of mine can do him justice. The hearts of the loved ones now beating with the recollection of his virtues attest, with touching eloquence, the value of their brightest jewel. And here I cannot forbear recording the testimony of a gentleman in this city, who had been his trusted friend for years, and who was his constant and devoted attendant during his last hours. When I alluded to the strong attachment which was universally felt for the general, he said: "I cannot speak of him even now without emotion. I knew him intimately, and no man had a kinder heart or more generous impulses. His last dollar or his last crust would have been shared with a friend in need. I have known him to give up matters of the greatest moment to himself to procure employment for the destitute; no one in distress ever appealed to him in vain. It might be truly said of him, 'he had a tear for pity, and a hand open as day to melting charity.'"

General NOELL is buried in the midst of that magnificent portion of Missouri which contains the valley of Arcadia, and rising from it a lofty peak of iron known as the Pilot Knob; I might say almost under the shadow of that wonderful formation. No one will ever visit that spot without feeling that it is a fit resting-place for a man whose life was filled with beauty, whose character was noble, and whose patriotism was of the grandest type.

I beg leave, sir, to offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the members of the House, from a sincere desire of showing every mark of respect due to the memory of Hon. JOHN W. NOELL, deceased, a member elect to the present Congress from the third congressional district of Missouri, will go into mourning by wearing crape upon the left arm for thirty days.

Resolved unanimously, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of Hon. JOHN W. NOELL, the House do now adjourn.

Ordered, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Speaker, I esteem it a privilege, at the suggestion of my friends from Missouri, to add my tribute of respect and admiration to the character of Mr. NOELL, and to express my appreciation of the great loss which this House and the country have sustained by his death.

I met him for the first time at the opening of the Thirty-Seventh Congress, near the beginning of these dark and troublous days through which we have been passing, and through the clouds of which I hopefully believe the light begins to dawn, to break, as I trust, into a brighter future, a higher civilization, a closer and more cordial union, with all disturbing causes removed.

Being associated with him on an important committee of the House, I soon recognized in him one of those natural leaders which these times produce; a noble specimen of the men of the valley of the Mississippi, stalwart and commanding in person, genial in disposition, sagacious and bold in character, with a strong, solid common sense which fearlessly grappled with the great issues of the day.

Representing the great State of Missouri, a State destined soon to occupy, under the influence of free labor, the same relation to the States west of the Mississippi that New York does to the Atlantic States, he was one among those pioneers who recognized the truth, that as slavery was the foundation, "the corner-stone," to use the language of General Grant, of the rebellion, the quickest way to end the rebellion was to knock out this corner-stone. To this end he labored with a zeal, energy, and perseverance which have contributed much toward the success now about to crown the efforts of the emancipationists of Missouri.

I believe to him belongs the distinction of being the first Representative in Congress from a slave State to introduce a bill for the abolition of slavery. In December, 1862, he asked leave to introduce "a bill to secure the abolishment of slavery in Missouri," &c.

After encountering much opposition, this bill was by his zeal and energy and personal influence carried through the House. I am sure I am correct in saying, to Mr. NOELL belongs the honor of having originated and carried through this House the first practical measure looking to the abolition of slavery in a slaveholding State.

Mr. Speaker, the soldier who wins battles for his country is ever the popular idol; liberty ever hallows his sword and consecrates the blood shed in her defense; but the statesman who eradicates from our nation the cause of this bloody rebellion, who heals the wounds made by this war, who binds together the fragments of this Union, and consolidates a homogeneous people into one grand, free republic, he will live in history even when the heroes of the battle-field are forgotten. Among such statesmen NOELL was a worthy compeer. Such were the ends for which he labored: so grand would have been the realization of his future. Our regret for his loss is lessened by the knowledge that his mantle has fallen on worthy colleagues, who will consummate what he began, the freedom of Missouri. Slavery steadily recedes, and loyalty advances and occupies its abandoned positions. Victory and freedom follow the flag.

There was another feature in the public character of NOELL which, whether fully appreciated to-day or not, will be remembered hereafter as the element of a bold, broad, national statesmanship. Living on the Mississippi, appreciating the exhaustless capacity for production of that valley, he realized the necessity to St. Louis, to Missouri, to the West, to the whole nation, of opening another channel by which the great river of the West should reach the sea—a channel by which the ocean could be reached as well through the lakes, the Hudson, and St. Lawrence, as by the Gulf of Mexico. Another Mississippi, from the mouth of the Missouri to the lakes, and from the lakes to the ocean, already so nearly consummated, was, he felt, a great necessity required for the commercial and agricultural development, military security, and political unity of our country. When this idea is realized, let NOELL be remembered as one of its earliest and most ardent friends.

He was a western man, without the graces of literary culture, but with a strong, vigorous nature; one of those diamonds in the rough, one of that race of great men of the country, somewhat rude, perhaps, who seem destined to shape the destinies of this western world and mold its national character.

Mr. ROLLINS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I rise not for the purpose of delivering a studied eulogium upon the life and character of our deceased friend, but simply to make a remark or two, adding my humble testimony of the merits of the deceased, to the remarks which have already been made by the gentlemen who have addressed the House.

It was my good fortune, sir, to have a familiar acquaintanceship with the deceased for more than twenty years, and I think I can safely say that he was in all respects a just, a true, and an honorable man.

The deceased had not the advantage of early literary culture; he had but few aids in early life, such as many men have, to press them forward; he relied mainly upon his own exertions; and to his own strong will and stout heart was he mainly indebted for that honorable distinction to which he attained in life.

A native of Virginia, he was for thirty years prior to his death a citizen of the State of Missouri. Adopting the legal profession, it was not long before he attained a high rank in that part of the State where he was a practitioner. I think I may safely say that but few men anywhere, in any State, have been more highly prized on account of their individual virtues or for their professional attainments than was JOHN W. NOELL by his constituents.

Some fifteen years ago I had the honor of serving for four years with him in the Senate of the State of Missouri. I found him there, sir, a genial companion, a cultivated gentleman, a faithful and true representative of those who had confided their interests to his hands.

He was a member, as has already been stated, of the Thirty-Sixth Congress, elected by the Democratic party of that day, and was reelected to the Thirty-Seventh Congress. All the gentlemen in this Hall to-day who served with him in the former Congress, will, I know, bear willing testimony to the truth of all that has been spoken of him here to-day. He was a candidate for reelection to the Thirty-Eighth Congress, and received his certificate of election, although his seat was contested by the honorable gentleman [Mr. SCOTT] who sits before me, and who now occupies that place.

Shortly after the adjournment of the Thirty-Seventh Congress Mr. NOELL was taken sick in this city, and after a long and painful illness he died here on the 14th day of March last. I happened to have been detained here after the adjournment of that Congress. It was my privilege to be occasionally at his bedside during his last illness, and I found him, at the verge of the grave, as I had found him in life—the same true, just, and honorable man. Although it grieved him deeply that he was to breathe his last, far from those who knew him best and who loved him most, I can say that he died with a brave heart, and, as I believe, a true patriot and a sincere Christian.

A short time since a friend of his who knew him far more intimately than I did, or than any member on this floor did, placed in my hand a short memoir of his life. I do not desire now to have it read to the House, but I will take the liberty of appending it to the few remarks that I have made in order to preserve on the public political records of the country a faithful synopsis of his life, presenting many attractive points in his private and public life that will be read hereafter by those who seek his record, who loved him while he lived, and will cherish his fame and his memory now that he has gone to "The undiscovered country from whose bourne

No traveler returns."

MEMOIR.

JOHN WILLIAM NOELL was born in Bedford county, Virginia, February 22, 1816. Until fourteen years old he was engaged partly in working his father's farm and partly in attending (particularly in winter) what was called in those days the old field school. This was all the education he received at school. He had great ambition, and outstripped all competitors. He became conversant with all that was taught there, and particularly excelled in history and geography. At fourteen he took charge of his father's farm as overseer, superintending the labor, making purchases, and selling the crops of tobacco. At seventeen he came West with the family, and stopped at Fredericktown, Missouri. Remained there six months. While there he went to school twenty days to learn book-keeping. Came with the family to Perry county and settled on a farm near Perryville. Labored there for a year. Reviewed his old school-books—none others could be had. Was employed by a merchant in Perryville as clerk, where he remained until his father's death. At nineteen his employer sent him to Pike county, Missouri, to take charge of a stock of goods and sell them. At twenty he married his employer's adopted daughter. The next year he returned to Perryville, and commenced merchandising for himself, which business he followed until, about 1842, he was elected clerk of the circuit court of Perry county to fill a vacancy occasioned by the death of the former incumbent. In 1847 he was reelected clerk. During the term of his clerkship he commenced the study of law, more, it seems, to assist him in the discharge of the duties of his office than with any ultimate view to the practice of the profession. About the year 1850, being thirty-four years of age, he resigned his clerkship and commenced to practice law. In this profession he found his true vocation. His close investigation of rudiments and principles of jurisprudence, his quickness to perceive and act on emergencies, and his clear judgment fitted him to comprehend the most intricate case, to evolve the main points and apply the correct principles of law to them. Also his complete mastery over all subjects which he had studied, his genial and enthusiastic disposition, his ready wit, made him powerful before a jury. His probity of character also helped his rising in business. His merchandising failed; he then purchased a mill, and when he seemed in a fair way to become prosperous it washed away completely; after that when he had accumulated a little property he became involved in debts as security for others. In all these instances he was left penniless and in debt; he surrendered voluntarily all his property to the payment of his creditors, and went to work at something else and paid what remained due.

In the fall of 1850 he was elected a member of the Missouri Senate and was reelected in 1852, serving four years. While there he adhered mainly to principles of policy which he seems to have adopted at an early age, namely, that a Government should not embark in schemes affecting particular individuals. He opposed the various systems of railroads which were seeking aid from the State, and contended that they were sectional in their benefits and had no sufficient foundation in the geography of the country to support them or indemnify the State. Without giving active support to any he favored a road from St. Louis to some place on the Mississippi river below freezing-point. This was projected and afterwards built as far as Pilot Knob. He also favored a road from Cairo to connect at Fulton, Arkansas, with a projected Pacific railroad from Memphis. This Cairo and Fulton road was partly built, but the rebellion stopped its further progress.

In 1856 he took an active part in the political campaign, supporting the Democratic party and mainly opposed to the American or Know-Nothing party. The tide of emigration which annually pours into this country, he contended, elevated the physical and mental condition of the nation. He cited the Anglo-Saxon race as a proof of the benefits of the amalgamation of races. But he chiefly opposed the party because he deemed it inconsistent with the spirit of our Republic to proscribe classes for the accident of birth or religion.

In 1858 he became a candidate for Congress. At that time a fever of excitement on the question of internal improvements pervaded the State. The projected railroads were incomplete, and among others the St. Louis and Iron Mountain road, projected to run through his whole district from north to south, and the Cairo and Fulton, running across the south end of the district. Besides this no surveys of the intermediate locations of said roads were determined on, so that more than half the people of his district, encouraged by local politicians, confidently expected, each one, a road through his own county. A grant of land from the General Government to the State was looked for to help the bankrupt roads on to completion. He opposed the General Government donating lands or money to States or individual corporations for sectional improvements. The mountains of solid iron ore, situated in a populous part of his district, were looming up into importance. It was said that this inexhaustible store of mineral was a mine of wealth to Missouri, which had until lately been closed by an odious "ad valorem tariff;" that it still needed protection of a higher tariff, as they still exported their mineral to England to have it wrought. He was not much in favor of a discriminating tariff at all; and he was firmly opposed to a high protective tariff which would accumulate more money than needed for revenue purposes.

On these questions the interests of the railroads and the Iron Mountain, each embracing a large moneyed class, were enlisted against him. Also, the interests of a majority of the people of his district seemed opposed to him. No newspaper in his district or in St. Louis supported him; on the contrary, many were loud in their denunciations of him. Every demonstration of eclat which the appliances of money could originate was brought to bear against him. His whole nature was roused for the contest. With an energy and endurance of which few are capable, he canvassed the whole district. Meeting the people, he discussed his principles, opposing all which they at first deemed themselves interested in sustaining. On these broad grounds of consistent policy he made a brilliant campaign. He received an overwhelming majority over his opponent, (Colonel Zeigler,) who was a man of popular manners and marked ability. Mr. NOELL received 10,404 votes, and Colonel Zeigler 5,808 votes. It was jestingly said that he was beaten on the day of the election, but that the backwoods precincts kept the polls open a week that the barefooted Democrats might gather in from the flinty hills and long hollows and vote for him. He was a great favorite among the common people, though he never flattered them. They had, as the masses often do, an instinctive appreciation of his worth.

In 1860 he was again elected to Congress. He did not take much pains for himself, but labored assiduously before and after his election for Mr. Douglas for the Presidency. He was opposed to the latter on the question of popular sovereignty, but he laid aside all personal preferences and worked for him as the only salvation of the Union. He prophesied an attempt to dissolve the Union when the southern delegates withdrew from the Baltimore convention. The aristocratic tendency of southern gentlemen, and the dictatorial bearing they assumed toward the nation, inspired him with misgivings as to their loyalty. Their contempt for republican institutions and threats of secession and resistance to Federal power disclosed to him their treasonable designs. At one time, when he met several distinguished speakers at Fredericktown, Missouri, among whom were General Watkins and Truett Polk, they were all loud in their protestations of loyalty to the Union. He remarked that the time might come within twelve months to try their devotion, and he hoped they would prove true to their professions. The time did come; but alas! all who addressed that audience but himself proved recreant.

While in Congress, he instituted a new system of post routes in southeast Missouri, making the transportation of mails direct and of more general interest. He also devoted a large portion of his time to the construction of the Pacific railroad. He introduced and carried through the House a bill appropriating $10,000,000 to compensate loyal owners emancipating their slaves in Missouri, or to aid the State in emancipating by law. This bill was amended in the Senate, which amendments were not concurred in by the House; so it failed. He foresaw at an early stage of the war that the tramp and concussion of hostile armies in the State would unsettle society, and in the commotion this species of property would unavoidably be lost. He sought to provide a just compensation for those who, guiltless of the rebellion, suffered this loss. He believed also that military policy would lead ultimately to its destruction, and a proper disposition of the institution while yet it could speak for itself would avert discord and palliate the revolution in labor. Subsequent events have proved that it would. Have been well if Missouri had taken steps earlier toward emancipation. Slaves have freed themselves without warning, and left no labor to supplant theirs, and from all over the State there comes up the cry of destitution by reason of fields unown and crops ungathered. Slaveholders of his constituency denounced this bill as an unjust abolition scheme, but they now regret that they did not give him their cordial support.

In 1862 he was elected for the third time to Congress, his seat being contested by Mr. Scott, but died before entering on his duties.

In his political career he was distinguished by an unswerving loyalty to the genius of our Government and the integrity of the Union. His ancestors had been engaged in the wars of the Revolution and of 1812. He was well versed in the history of our struggle for independence and the more dangerous and uncertain struggle for our form of government. He was familiar with the bloody wars and suffering which other nations had endured to cast off the burdens of privileged nobility. He saw that in almost every instance they met defeat or their victories were short-lived, and they had soon to bend their necks to the humiliating yoke. If this Government was destroyed he saw no hope of its reconstruction. He believed in a strict construction of the powers of government. Thus, he believed that slaves were by the laws of the land property, and there was no power in the Federal or territorial government to impair the rights of the owners. He maintained the doctrine of strict construction to prevent corruption. By restraining the Government to the impartial performance of its national duties, no sectional alienation could be occasioned. This was his theory respecting the internal administration; but on all matters wherein a great principle was involved or the existence of the Government jeopardized he held a more liberal construction; as, that Mr. Jefferson exercised a proper stretch of power in the acquisition of Louisiana Territory, on account of its commercial and political importance to the United States, and that General Jackson was justified by the seeming danger and necessity in disregarding civil process. When the present rebellion broke out, he sustained the military in the exercise of every power and act necessary for the vigorous prosecution of the war, holding that the Executive was a department of the Government coördinate with the judiciary, having his own duties to perform, and was only liable to impeachment for plain and unjustifiable usurpation, or for neglect to perform his duty. Had the President failed to use the whole strength of the nation to the preservation of the Government he would have been among the first to attempt his impeachment.

During his whole life he was never guilty of disloyalty. In his early political speeches he opposed a set of resolutions introduced into the Senate of Missouri by C. F. Jackson, in 1849. These passed the Legislature (or Senate?) as instructions to Colonel Benton, Senator from Missouri. After denouncing the free-soil attitude of the North, they called on the southern States to coöperate with each other in taking such measures as would vindicate their rights, and pointing indirectly to separation as their remedy. Mr. NOELL, though concurring in the belief of the rights and grievances of the South, could not sanction these resolutions, because they tended to widen the breach between the North and the South. After this, (in 1852 or 1853,) while he was in the Senate, a set of resolutions passed the Legislature and were communicated by the Governor of Tennessee to the Governor of Missouri, and referred by him to the Missouri Legislature. These were violent and threatening in their terms, and called upon the southern States to unite and adopt such measures as the safety of their institutions demanded. A counter-resolution was passed in the Legislature of Missouri, condemning in the strongest terms the resolutions of Tennessee, and scornfully repudiating all affiliation with her for disloyal purposes. He spoke and voted for the condemnatory resolution of Missouri. In the last part of 1860, when the tide of southern enthusiasm had spread over Missouri, before the Federal power had disturbed its downward current, the secessionists were anxious to gain his influence over to their cause. Some of the leading men of his constituency wrote to him how smoothly things were going. They represented to him that it would be political ruin for him to withstand their opinions, and asked him to lead them and ride into power. He answered them by a letter published to his constituents. He said:

"That it was well known he had always been opposed to the doctrine of peaceable secession; that the Constitution recognized no right of individuals or States to destroy it at pleasure with or without cause. It was now no longer an abstract question, but a fact. The cotton States had seceded. Revolution, with its black, tempestuous countenance and bloody hands, stands before us. The border States have to choose what part they will play in this great tragedy. That determination should not be reached by power of passion, but by cool and sober judgment. The disunion movement of the South has been one of extreme excitement. It is not the result of calm judgment, conscious of intolerable wrong for which no redress is attainable. Like all passionate movements, the means of success are left to chance. No systems of finance or regular military organization have been devised. In fact, in the fury of the moment they have been almost forgotten. What must be the inevitable result? Disaster after disaster, until the seceded States get into civil strife among themselves. The revolution as now organized is a failure in advance. Its fruits turn to ashes on our lips. We seek security and protection, but we find on the very morning of our revolutionary existence confusion and destruction. If Missouri and other border States, stimulated by like passion and excitement, rush headlong, blindly, into this revolution, they increase the magnitude of the enmity and close the door forever against the last hope of preserving the Constitution and the Union. If you have ever examined the material of which revolutions are composed, you cannot have failed to discover that they have always been in the hands of the turbulent and reckless, not the prudent and wise. Men of wisdom, men of property, men of peace, are always backward in these times. Those who have nothing to lose are ever foremost in the work of destruction. The leadership of the southern disunion movement will soon pass into the hands of reckless political and military adventurers. They will require immense sums of money for the cause and still greater for themselves. A system of exaction from the substantial men of the country will begin. They will lay their hands on money, negroes, lands, everything. Murmurs against these exactions will be followed by confiscation and—shall I say it?—death! Ay, horrid as the idea may be, I say death. Then will begin to go up to Heaven, as in the days of the Reign of Terror, the wails of the widow and the fatherless. Then, when too late, alas! too late, shall we be able to estimate the blessings of this Government of law and order under whose protecting influence none dare make us afraid. When we have reached the climax of horrors, torn to pieces by factions, involved in all the quarrels and strife between military rivals, with no country, no nationality, no peace, no safety, we will fly from the bloody scenes of an endless anarchy to an absolute despotism. Thus it will be that this most wonderful Government will die in the same century that gave it birth.

"Surely if the border States can avert such calamities, it should be done. They do hold the power, in my opinion. They should act cautiously and deliberately. Revolution well prepared for is as practicable as if rushed into without preparation. If we can get time, all our wrongs will be redressed. Desperate politicians are working against time. They are afraid of the sober second thought of the people. Mark my prediction, the disunion politicians of Missouri will not allow the people to decide whether or not they will have a convention. Oh, no, this would never do. It would give the people time to think for themselves. We must do the thinking for them; if we do not, the country will be saved and we will be lost, is the idea uppermost in the minds of disunionists.

"If Missouri is at last forced to assent to a dissolution of the Union, she should have guarantees from the southern confederacy. The Gulf States will insist on having the right to vote upon property. The yeomanry of Missouri will never yield this point. Free trade is to be a ruling element. The iron, lead, and copper manufactures of Missouri, as well as the agricultural interests dependent on them, would go down under the operation of such a system. Exorbitant direct taxation is abhorrent to our people. If we cannot live in peace under our present Government, then I am not willing to risk any new confederation without knowing how or where we are to stand in it. For these reasons let Missouri prepare well for contingencies, stand cool and firm to act as her own honor and the happiness of her people demand. Above all, let us cling to the Union as long as one ray of hope remains that it may be saved! In giving utterance to these sentiments I know that I am braving the epidemic that has seized on the public mind in my own State; but I am ready to meet the consequences. I have no political ambition that could be gratified by place and power in a miserable little sectional confederacy or military despotism. My political existence is of no consequence whatever. I can only know that my country is in imminent peril, and I shall do all in my power to save it, without regard to consequences personal to myself. I know no political distinctions now but one 'for or against my country.' Democrats, Whigs, Know-Nothings, are names that I now blot out from my memory. I shall strive to forget them until we get through this dark and stormy night."

This letter was dated Washington, District of Columbia, January 14, 1861.

He presented after this a peace memorial, and used all the powers of his mind to accomplish conciliation. But when Beauregard opened his batteries on Sumter he lost all hope of avoiding war. His next purpose was to assuage the passions of the border States, and give them time to reflect what they were about. In a resolution which he offered relative to confiscation of rebel property he refused an amendment to be added relative to freeing slaves. He carried a resolution through the House suspending the collection of direct revenue in Missouri for twelve months. In Kentucky this mild policy proved highly beneficial, but in Missouri the combinations of the Knights of the Golden Circle were so formidable that this tacit truce did not prevent their stirring the passions and laboring in support of their principles. The taking of Camp Jackson by General Lyon, (May 10, 1861,) and the firing into the mob by some German soldiers in St. Louis, were made pretexts for inflaming the people against the Government. Persons from the country who had been visiting St. Louis in great numbers about that time, drawn thither by the excitement of the times and to view the prospects of the future, fell into the hands of the enemies of the Government, and were drawn irresistibly into the whirlpool of excitement. Returning to their homes they related to eager crowds what they had seen. German regiments under control of Republicans marching citizens and sons of citizens, the proudest and wealthiest of the native-born Americans, under guard to prison. They declared it was a war between foreigners and native citizens—between Democrats and Republicans. The excitement raised to the highest pitch, and the most improbable stories were freely believed. Flags bearing ingenious southern devices were displayed almost simultaneously over the court-houses and other public buildings throughout the State. They bore delusory mottoes which appealed to the prejudices of the people, such as "Missouri always right; but, right or wrong, Missouri anyhow." Ladies were engaged in making these flags, and having never before been of any political importance they were easily flattered into adhering to the first party which publicly courted their favor. The nominal secrecy of these proceedings found a charm in their eyes. To the women of the South the rebellion indebted for a great measure of its success. In them was conceived that personal hostility to the North. In their festivities they vied with each other in the expression of aversion and contempt of northern people and northern valor. Under such auspices many, especially young men, committed themselves to disloyal associations which soon transformed them into open rebellion. Thus a member of nearly every family was borne by this pressure into the disloyal ranks. In many instances it was a favorite son or brother whose adventurous spirit led him to seek the danger for the danger's sake. The perils and hardships he endured, the ambition he cherished, held enchaind by affectionate solicitude and pride the other members of the family. They were bound in sympathy to him, and through him to his cause. It was owing to these causes that the conflict in Missouri assumed such a personal aspect and grew into a deadly hate between the parties. In neighborhoods, villages, and churches the people were divided into two parties, each refusing social intercourse with the other. Falsehoods and slanders were borne backwards and forwards from each party to the other, and neither ever took pains to investigate their truth, but believed and acted on the reports they heard.

It was while the passions of the people were at this stage that Mr. NOELL addressed different audiences in his district before the July session of Congress, 1861. The name of Republican which his enemies fastened on him to lessen his influence, excited the prejudices of the people. Large crowds came to hear him, but many of them came with the view of carping at his language and defaming him. When he began to speak he was greeted by jeers or by sullen silence. He gradually won them over, and exerting all the powers of his eloquence he lifted them above the paltry schemes of selfishness. He made them forget all but their country and its danger. He pictured the pride and glory of this country—the Government—the hope of humanity. These were the ablest efforts of his life. He was fully impressed with the terrible issues of the rebellion, and in his appeal to their nobler selves he poured out to the people the yearning of his inmost soul for the life of his imperiled country. Down deep in their hearts, under a load of prejudice and passion, he found a chord that vibrated in unison with his own. Before he was done speaking they testified their loyalty by wild and enthusiastic shouts of applause. But, alas! they soon returned to their old associations, where the poisonous tongue of slander found no antidote. They soon recovered back their old prejudices and hated loyalty with a bitter hate, and singled him out for their maledictions. Most of those who had been his personal friends through life turned against him in his old age. They to whom his name had hitherto been the synonym of every quality which friendship demanded, now believed false reports concerning him, and looked with suspicion on all his acts. Their enmity extended even to his family, so ranking was their hatred to his loyalty. It was not until they stood beside his grave that these life-cherished friends forgave his devotion to the Government. Those who abused him in life have shed tears to his memory in death; and many have been heard to say, "He was right and knew better than we!" Now, as the cloud of futurity lowers darkly over them, they wish in vain for his eye to see for them and his voice to speak for them.

In his family circle he enjoyed himself, and was the source of enjoyment. He loved his wife passionately. Having married when both were very young, they had experienced the vicissitudes of life, enjoying his prosperity and bearing his adversity together. In his last years the tender pleasantries and affectionate caresses which passed between them denoted the growth of a lifetime of love. His conduct toward his children was familiar and affectionate. They stood in no fear of him, but implicitly obeyed him. With the larger ones he conversed affably, entering into their views, discussing their plans, and giving them advice. With both large and small he interested himself in all that affected their happiness or touched their feelings. He participated in their plays, becoming excited and enjoying with the zest and abandon of childhood all their games.

His demeanor toward the people of his county was the same as toward his own family, and they in return regarded him as a father or protector. Among the old men he was the favorite child of the community. They were proud of his talents, and gave all their aid to attain what honors he aspired to. Those of his own age and younger paid him the homage of confidence and admiration which his character and social temper inspired. The people universally loved him for his virtues, and looked leniently on his faults as leaning to virtue's side. They had recourse to him on all occasions. In matters relating to his profession the first thought and act was to seek his advice and assistance. When a cause received his sanction his client was satisfied both of its justice and legal efficiency. In the practice of law as in private life his conscience went hand in hand with his judgment, and the same inflexible honesty governed both his personal conduct and professional advice. The people had recourse to his advice not only in legal matters but all the various transactions of life. Those who suffered from wrong or misfortune unfolded their grievances to him, and always found in him sympathy and assistance. The widow and the orphan and the unfriended outcast lost a protector when he died.

Until the last years of his life he was social and vivacious in his manners. His animation and colloquial powers made him the delight of every society in which he moved. Wherever he appeared a crowd gathered around him, and all, from old age to childhood, enjoyed his company. The last years of his life were imbibed by the enemies of those politically opposed to him. Until this time he had been the idol of all classes. Now to be estranged from them, and have all the ties which bound him to them rudely sundered, filled his mind with grief and anxiety, which probably shortened his days. But amid this wreck of personal attachments, there were many who had always been personal friends though politically opposed to him. The cord which bound him to these was strengthened by a common cause. The friendship of these, however, nor the rebellious proclivities of the others, did not prevent his feeling keenly this personal hostility. He became gloomy, and at times morose. He wandered about restless and alone, and suffered in silence. He never shrank from his purpose of loyalty, or regretted any act he had done. Nor did he ever seek by vindictive measures to inflict pain on those who persecuted him. As a father whose children have brought sorrow on his gray hairs, he pitied their delusion, and said they would be grateful to him years hence.

He died at Washington, District of Columbia, March 14, 1863. He received all the rites and sacraments of the Roman Catholic church. He was raised a Protestant, and only became a Catholic some years after he was married. His wife was raised a pious Catholic, and through her influence he was led to inquire into the doctrines and practices of that church, and his inquiry resulted in his embracing its faith. Thenceforth he believed firmly all its teachings, and received at the hour of death all the comforting assurances it imparts. Requiescat in pace.

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. Speaker, although my residence is far distant from the former home and the grave of the deceased, yet perhaps a somewhat intimate friendship with him may justify me in adding a few words to what has been so eloquently said by the gentlemen who have already spoken. I first became acquainted with him on this floor. I soon learned to respect him. He had but little ambition to acquire fame as a public speaker, but he was anxious so to discharge his duty as to preserve a conscience void of offense. His modesty prevented his making long orations for the mere purpose of being heard; but when he did speak, his manner was pleasing and his reasoning sound. Indeed, but very few men could make an abler argument in a more attractive form. But his chief glory must rest on his devotion to liberty, his love of justice, and his defense of the rights of every race and of every class of men. Although others more favored by education and associations may have been earlier advocates of universal liberty, yet when some future Tacitus shall write the history of this eventful period, he will record on its brightest page in golden capitals that JOHN W. NOELL, of Missouri, was the first member from a slave State who introduced in Congress a bill to abolish slavery.

So conscientious was he that in that bill he asked but $10,000,000 for the immediate liberation of all the slaves of his State. And when that bill was returned from the Senate, appropriating $20,000,000 for gradual emancipation, he declared it unjust, and, as it prolonged slavery and postponed emancipation, he refused it his support. He was not one of that dignified and conservative class that can bear the misery and oppression of others with such graceful fortitude. He was not sufficiently philosophical to understand how the best way to educate bondsmen for freedom was to prolong their slavery.

He did not live to see the consummation of the great object of his heart. Other men more eloquent than he may have been called to the bar of judgment, but no man ever appeared before that dread tribunal with more numerous and ardent advocates. His advocates were the oppressed of every nation, the crushed of the satanic institution of slavery.

Who would not rather take his chance in the great day of accounts before that Judge who is the acknowledged Father of all men than the chance of ordained hypocrites, miserable wretches who, professing to hold a commission from on high, impiously proclaim slavery a divine institution?

The resolutions were agreed to; and thereupon (at ten minutes past two o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, February 1, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of Thursday last was read and approved.

RESIGNATION OF MR. BAYARD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair desires to present a communication to the Senate. It will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 30, 1864.

SIR: I will thank you to communicate to the Senate the fact that I resigned my seat in the Senate of the United States on yesterday, and have been informed that my successor has been chosen by the Legislature.

I have the honor to be, with high respect, your obedient servant,
J. A. BAYARD.

HON. HANNIBAL HAMLIN,
Vice President of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair did not receive the communication until after the last adjournment.

CREDENTIALS PRESENTED.

Mr. SAULSBURY presented the credentials of Hon. GEORGE READ RIDDLE, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Delaware to fill the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Hon. James A. Bayard; which were read, and ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. DAVIS. I ask the permission of the Senate to make a personal explanation, which will consume but a few minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kentucky asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to make a personal explanation. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, the explanation which I desire to make, and which the Senate has courteously allowed me to make, grows out of the remarks made by the honorable Senator from Maine [Mr. MORRILL] on the resolution for my expulsion. In the progress of his remarks, that honorable Senator referred to my course on the resolution to expel Mr. Bright, a former member of the Senate from the State of Indiana, and also to my course on a resolution to expel my honorable colleague. He also referred to a series of resolutions which I offered at a former session, and to a bill which I introduced as a substitute for the confiscation bill that had been reported by a committee of the Senate. I think, with all due courtesy and kindness to the Senator from Maine, that in his manner of doing those things he forgot that justice and that magnanimity which so peculiarly belong to him, in having omitted so much of what I did say in relation to each of those matters as was necessary to understand my position and course on each, and procure for me a just judgment.

In my support of the resolution for the expulsion of Senator Bright, I assumed this general position most distinctly—I have not recurred to the remarks which I made on that occasion, but they embodied my principle in relation to that subject, and I state it with perfect confidence: I admitted that a Senator could not be expelled for his opinions; I admitted that a Senator could not be expelled for his words in debate or not in debate; I assumed the position that a Senator could only be expelled for his acts; and, in conformity to that principle, I based my remarks and vote for his expulsion expressly upon the ground that he had written a letter, as I conceived, treasonable in its character, to the president of the southern confederacy, recommending to him a man who claimed to have invented a most valuable improvement in the manufacture of arms, and also upon the fact that he had uniformly opposed and voted against all supplies to enable the Government to carry on the war against the rebels.

The honorable Senator from Maine then adverted to the project of a confiscation act. That bill was introduced by me in the form of an amendment, as a substitute for the bill that had been reported by a committee of the Senate, and it was based upon these three principles: first, it was entirely prospective in its character; second, it was to be adjudged and executed only by the civil courts of the country, according to the forms and modes of trial prescribed by the Constitution; third, the forfeiture which it declared was of all the property of traitors, their aiders and abettors, for the exclusive benefit of the loyal citizens whose property had been destroyed by the rebellion, and it proceeded to no other extent. I did not introduce in it the feature that the forfeiture should be limited to the lifetime of the delinquent, because I thought it unnecessary. I adhere to the principle as laid down by Judge Story, and I hold to it now, that the courts of the country would decide that any bill forfeiting property would in its effect be limited by the Constitution, whether in relation to real or personal estate, to the lifetime of the delinquent. I believe so yet.

The Senator adverted to my course on the resolution for the expulsion of my colleague. I beg leave to make this remark upon that matter: my colleague and myself previous to that time only casually met, but we always met with the courtesies of gentlemen; and a truer and more unexceptionable gentleman, as I stated in effect during that debate, I had never met in all my personal associations, and that I had never heard a single individual speak unkindly or disparagingly of him. When the subjects connected with this insurrection and war had been before Congress at previous sessions, as I stated the other day, I was at home entirely absorbed in the pursuit of my profession. I then read to a very limited extent the debates of the Senate and of Congress, and I had never read any of the speeches of my colleague on those subjects. Since then I have learned certainly and satisfactorily his true political position. When I came from the State of Kentucky and took a seat in this body, the general opinion in my own State and my own opinion was that my colleague, in his sentiments and principles, was a nullifier and a secessionist, and that he had strongly sympathized with the propagators of both of those heresies, and that he had sustained the action of the gentlemen who left the Senate Chamber to go to their own States for the purpose of inaugurating a rebellion against the Government. I am now, as I was not then, fully satisfied that in relation to all these points the grossest injustice was done to my colleague. I have no doubt, as he has since repeatedly declared in this Chamber, that he is not and never was a nullifier or secessionist in principle or action or sympathy, and that he perseveringly and earnestly opposed secession in his conferences with those friends, and protested and entreated with the seceding Senators against their departure from the Senate; and if his counsels, and his urgent counsels, to them could have prevailed, those gentlemen would never have left the Senate Chamber. I am satisfied now that my colleague is as much opposed to secessionism and to its success as I am, and that then, as now, we only differed as to the manner by which this great and most mischievous movement should be met and treated. I was then for coercion, as I still am. My colleague was against coercion, because he assumed that men and armies acting under the authority and command of State governments were not properly the subjects of Federal coercion, and that it would widen the breach and probably render the separation final and forever; and he thought that the true mode of treating it was not by arms, but by friendly counsel with the people and their leaders in the seceding States.

Now, Mr. President, with near three long years of bloody and terrible experience in relation to this matter, and the dark and threatening future before us, I here declare explicitly, that the wisest and best and most patriotic men in the land may well doubt whether the position of my colleague against military coercion was not right, and whether the true mode of treating this great schism and rebellion was not by refraining from the shock of arms and appealing to patriotism, fraternity, and the interests of the great sections of the United States. Upon that proposition I doubt now myself. If I had had then the same lights which I now have, I neither would have spoken nor voted for the expulsion of my colleague.

But there was another matter to which my honorable friend referred—I call him so, for I have always been proud so to denominate him, and I still entertain feelings of the most perfect kindness and respect toward him. The Senator from Maine read one portion of the concluding resolution of a series of resolutions which I offered about two years ago, the effect of which was to give those who heard what he did read an imperfect and a very unjust and injurious view of the tenor of those resolutions, the whole of them, and even the one from which he read but a part. When my honorable friend read it, the Senator from Massachusetts who sits furthest from me [Mr. SUMNER] was so gratified, transported by the seeming inconsistencies and contradictions in which it involved me, that I was really apprehensive at one time that he would expire in a paroxysm of delight. I will now read those resolutions for the purpose of showing my true position. They were offered on the 13th day of February, 1862. The honorable Senator from Massachusetts to whom I have just referred had on the 11th of the same month offered this series of resolutions, which I will first read:

Resolutions declaratory of the relations between the United States and the territory once occupied by certain States, and now usurped by pretended governments without constitutional or legal right.

Whereas certain States rightfully belonging to the Union of the United States have through their respective governments wickedly undertaken to abjure all those duties by which their connection with the Union was maintained; to renounce all allegiance to the Constitution; to levy war upon the national Government; and for the consummation of this treason have unconstitutionally and unlawfully confederated together, with the declared purpose of putting an end by force to the supremacy of the Constitution within their respective limits; and whereas this condition of insurrection, organized by pretended governments, openly exists in South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, Arkansas, Tennessee, and Virginia, except in Eastern Tennessee and Western Virginia, and has been declared by the President of the United States, in a proclamation duly made in conformity with an act of Congress, to exist throughout this territory, with the exceptions already named; and whereas the extensive territory thus usurped by these pretended governments and organized into a hostile confederation belongs to the United States, as an inseparable part thereof, under the sanctions of the Constitution, to be held in trust for the inhabitants in the present and future generations, and is so completely interlinked with the Union that it is forever dependent thereupon; and whereas the Constitution, which is the supreme law of the land, cannot be displaced in its rightful operation within this territory, but must ever continue the supreme law thereof notwithstanding the doings of any pretended governments acting singly or in confederation, in order to put an end to its supremacy: Therefore,

1. Resolved, That any vote of secession or other act by which any State may undertake to put an end to the supremacy of the Constitution within its territory is inoperative and void against the Constitution, and when sustained by force it becomes a practical abdication by the State of all rights under the Constitution, while the treason which it involves still further works an instant forfeiture of all those functions and powers essential to the continued existence of the State as a body-politic, so that from that time forward the territory falls under the exclusive jurisdiction of Congress as other territory, and the State being, according to the language of the law, felo de se, ceases to exist.

2. Resolved, That any combination of men assuming to act in the place of such State, and attempting to insure or coerce the inhabitants thereof into a confederation hostile to the Union is rebellious, treasonable, and destitute of all moral authority; and that such combination is a usurpation incapable of any constitutional existence and utterly lawless, so that everything dependent upon it is without constitutional or legal support.

3. Resolved, That the termination of a State under the Constitution necessarily causes the termination of those peculiar local institutions which, having no origin in the Constitution or in those natural rights which exist independent of the Constitution, are upheld by the sole and exclusive authority of the State.

4. Resolved, That slavery, being a peculiar local institution, derived from local laws, without any origin in the Constitution or in natural rights, is upheld by the sole and exclusive authority of the State, and must therefore cease to exist legally or constitutionally when the State on which it depends no longer exists; for the incident cannot survive the principal.

5. Resolved, That in the exercise of its exclusive jurisdiction over the territory once occupied by the States it is the duty of Congress to see that the supremacy of the Constitution is maintained in its essential principles, so that everywhere in this extensive territory slavery shall cease to exist practically, as it has already ceased to exist constitutionally or legally.

6. Resolved, That any recognition of slavery in such territory, or any surrender of slaves under the pretended laws of the extinct States by any officer of the United States, civil or military, is a recognition of the pretended governments, to the exclusion of the jurisdiction of Congress under the Constitution, and is in the nature of aid and comfort to the rebellion that has been organized.

7. Resolved, That any such recognition of slavery or surrender of pretended slaves, besides being a recognition of the pretended governments, giving them aid and comfort, is a denial of the rights of persons who, by the extinction of the States, have become free, so that, under the Constitution, they cannot again be enslaved.

8. Resolved, That allegiance from the inhabitant and protection from the Government are corresponding obligations, dependent upon each other, so that while the allegiance of every inhabitant of this territory, without distinction of color or class, is due to the United States, and cannot in any way be defeated by the action of any pretended government, or by any pretense of property or claim to service, the corresponding obligation of protection is at the same time due by the United States to every such inhabitant, without distinction of color or class; and it follows that inhabitants held as slaves, whose paramount allegiance is due to the United States, may justly look to the national Government for protection.

9. Resolved, That the duty directly cast upon Congress by the extinction of the States is reinforced by the positive prohibition of the Constitution that "no State shall enter into any confederation," or "without the consent of Congress keep troops or ships of war in time of peace, or enter into any agreement or compact with another State," or "grant letters of marque and reprisal," or "coin money," or "emit bills of credit," or "without the consent of Congress lay any duties on imports or exports," all of which have been done by these pretended governments, and also by the positive injunction of the Constitution, addressed to the nation, that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government;" and that in pursuance of this duty cast upon Congress, and further enjoined by the Constitution, Congress will assume complete jurisdiction of such vacated territory where such unconstitutional and illegal things have been attempted, and will proceed to establish therein republican forms of government under the Constitution; and in the execution of this trust will provide carefully for the protection of all the inhabitants thereof, for the security of families, the organization of labor, the encouragement of industry, and the welfare of society, and will in every way discharge the duties of a just, merciful, and paternal government.

To many of the principles of that series of resolutions I gave my hearty consent then, and I do now, but from many of them I dissented, toto cælo; and on the second day after they were offered by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, I proposed my series, in the language of King James I, as a "counterblast," and I will now read them:

1. Resolved, That the Constitution of the United States is the fundamental law of the Government, and the powers established and granted, and as parted out and vested by it, the limitations and restrictions which it imposes upon the legislative, executive, and judicial departments, and the States, and the rights, privileges, and liberties which it assures to the people of the United States, and the States respectively, are fixed, permanent, and immutable through all the phases of peace and war, until changed by the power and in the mode prescribed by the Constitution itself; and they cannot be abrogated, restricted, enlarged, or differently apportioned, or vested, by any other power, or in any other mode.

2. Resolved, That between the Government and the citizen the obligation of protection and obedience form mutual rights and obligations; and to enable every citizen to perform his obligations of obedience and loyalty to the Government it should give him reasonable protection and security in such performance; and when the Government fails in that respect, for it to hold the citizen to be criminal in not performing his duties of loyalty and obedience would be unjust, inhuman, and an outrage upon this age of Christian civilization.

3. Resolved, That if any powers of the Constitution or Government of the United States, or of the States, or any rights, privileges, immunities, and liberties of the people of the United States, or the States, are, or may hereafter be, suspended by the existence of this war, or by any promulgation of martial law, or by the suspension of the writ of habeas corpus, immediately upon the termination of the war such powers, rights, privileges, immunities, and liberties would be resumed, and would have force and effect as though they had not been suspended.

4. Resolved, That the duty of Congress to guaranty to every State a republican form of government, to protect each of them against invasion, and, on the application of the Legislature or Executive thereof, against domestic violence, and to enforce the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States in all the States, are constitutional obligations which abide all times and circumstances.

5. Resolved, That no State can, by any vote of secession, or by rebellion against the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States, or by any other act, abrogate her rights or obligations under that Constitution or those laws, or absolve her people from their obedience to them, or the United States from their obligation to guaranty to such State a republican form of government, and to protect her people by causing the due enforcement within her territories of the authority, Constitution, and laws of the United States.

6. Resolved, That there cannot be any forfeiture or confiscation of the rights of person or property of any citizen of the United States who is loyal and obedient to the authority, Constitution, and laws thereof, or of any person whatsoever, unless for acts which the law has previously declared to be criminal, and for the punishment of which it has provided such forfeiture or confiscation.

7. Resolved, That it is the duty of the United States to subdue and punish the existing rebellion by force of arms and civil trials in the shortest practicable time, and with the least cost to the people, but so decisively and thoroughly as to impress upon the present and future generations as a great truth that rebellion, except for grievous oppression of Government, will bring upon the rebels incomparably more of evil than obedience to the Constitution and the laws.

8. Resolved, That the United States Government should march their armies into all the insurgent States and promptly put down the military power which they have arrayed against it, and give protection and security to the loyal men thereof, to enable them to reconstruct their legitimate State governments, and bring them and the people back to the Union and to obedience and duty under the Constitution and the laws of the United States, bearing the sword in one hand and the olive-branch in the other, and while inflicting on the guilty leaders condign and exemplary punishment, granting amnesty and oblivion to the comparatively innocent masses; and if the people of any State cannot, or will not, reconstruct their State government and return to loyalty and duty, Congress should provide a government for such State as a Territory of the United States, securing to the people thereof their appropriate constitutional rights.

It was the latter part of the last resolution, declaring it the duty of Congress to provide a territorial government in a certain contingency, which the honorable Senator from Maine read and commented upon.

Well, Mr. President, there is not a principle, or opinion, or sentiment in these resolutions to which I do not yet adhere. They had been deliberately framed by me upon previous inquiry and reflection; and all the thought and research that I have since been able to give them have confirmed me in their truth. The position that I assumed was this, and when I have stated it I shall take my seat; I declared it partially the other day: When our armies marched into Mexico and reduced that Power, and General Scott was in the capital at the head of his conquering army, what did he do, except as a matter of necessity, and as commander of that army, but to establish a provisional military government? He was in no way restrained by the Constitution, for it had no operation or force in that foreign country. The laws of war authorized him to establish such a government, and he did that act wisely, as a humane and a great conqueror and legislator, and gave to that people the best government they have ever had.

When any States in the United States or any portion of the States revolt and expel the civil authority of the Government of the United States, and one of our armies at the head of such a chief as Scott or any general marches into the country and subdues the rebellion and takes possession of that country, all order and government is not to cease. There must be some power to maintain the rights of property and of persons and to uphold social organization. As a matter of necessity and of national law the conqueror who thus takes possession of the country has the right to institute a present provisional military government. After he has done this, if the people being protected against those who deposed the Constitution, laws, and authorities of the United States will not for themselves revive and carry on government, nor take any part in conducting it, Federal or State, what is to be done? Are they to be left to anarchy and confusion? No, sir, no. The military commander must first establish a provisional government, or some general rules and regulations to hold the society together, and to give to its members and their property some security and protection. But this military rule is a necessity, and only temporary. When there is no longer any occasion to hold the country and maintain military government in it to keep out the disturbing and lawless force it must cease; and then that people have the unquestionable right, and without interference or intermeddling by the President, or even by Congress, to reinstate their own government. If they persistently refuse to do anything for their self-government, that State being a part of the territory of the United States, Congress must "make all needful rules and regulations respecting it." The people thereof will be entitled to every other constitutional right and privilege; they will not be exercising any right of government, because of their utter refusal, but this they can resume at pleasure.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, the honorable Senator from Kentucky is right in supposing that I was actuated by no feeling of personal unkindness in the remarks I had occasion to make the other day; and I should regret exceedingly if I should become satisfied that in those remarks I did the Senator injustice by the inferences I drew from the acts to which I had occasion to refer. As the Senator has made an explanation of his position in connection with the acts to which I referred, the Senate and the country have an opportunity to determine whether I did him injustice. I do not feel called upon to make further reply.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to call up the resolution which was introduced by me at the last session of the Senate. It is important to have action on it as soon as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin moves to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the resolution indicated by him.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution:

Resolved, That in all sessions of committees to take the testimony of witnesses in relation to any matter of fact pertaining to the conduct of any Department of the Government or of any branch thereof, the head of such Department shall be requested to employ some proper and competent person to aid in the examination and cross-examination of witnesses, and to furnish any other evidence or proof pertinent to the matter inquired into.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes to modify his resolution by inserting after the word "person" the words "connected with the same." That modification will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will state to the Senator from Illinois, if there be any question about the purpose of the resolution, it is simply this: that when committees on the part of the Senate are in session investigating into the proceedings of a Department or anything connected with a Department, the head of the Department shall be requested to send some person connected with the Department to be present with the committee to aid in the investigation of the facts connected with it, and not to employ any one outside of the Department, or subject the Department to any expense to aid the committee. I can state in a single word the reason which influenced my mind in offering this resolution.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that it is for the convenience of the committees themselves, very many of these questions involving a special knowledge which the committee cannot have without spending a considerable time for the purpose of inquiry. Besides, it seems to me it is but an act always of justice to the head of a Department, the conduct of which is being inquired into, that he should be permitted to send some one connected with the Department to be present at the examination. It is but an act of justice certainly to the heads of the Departments. We are bound to presume that the head of each of the Executive Departments has as deep an interest in ferreting out any abuse practiced on the Department as any Senator or member of Congress can have. Their characters are involved in the administration of their Departments. Upon every ground, therefore, I believe the proposition contained in the resolution is but just and proper.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will inquire, does this resolution come from any committee? Has it been referred?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. No, sir, it has not been referred, and has not come from any committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It strikes me as a very singular resolution. I have known of no practical difficulty in my experience on this subject. I have always found the Departments ready to communicate any information that was required. It seems to me it would be a great deal better to leave it to the committee to request any information they may desire. So far as I am aware, there has never been the slightest difficulty, in any investigation, in obtaining assistance from the Departments, and these investigations are generally carried on in harmony with the head of the Department. I do not see any occasion for adopting a rule of the Senate that in all cases where an investigation takes place the Department is to send one of its clerks before the committee. The committee may not need him. I think it had better be left altogether to the discretion of the committee. I have never known any practical difficulty on the subject; perhaps the Senator from Wisconsin may. I have always found the Departments ready to communicate any information that the committees desired. This is a very sweeping resolution, if I recollect it. I did not listen very attentively, or my attention, rather, was not called to it till the Clerk commenced reading it. I believe it provides that in every case where a committee is engaged in an investigation the Department shall send one of its officers to be before the committee.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The Department shall be requested to send one connected with the Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, "requested." If the committee want one of the officers of the Department there is not the least difficulty in obtaining his attendance, I apprehend. If there is any difficulty, I should have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I am moved to this, I confess, in part from the fact that I have been appointed, without my knowledge, and indeed in my absence from the Senate at the time, to act on one of these committees of investigation, and my attention has been particularly drawn to the subject from that fact. I am associated upon that committee of investigation with my honorable friend from New Hampshire, who is the chairman of the committee, and who on some former occasion, and I believe he has never retracted it, declared to the Senate and the country, in substance, upon his responsibility as a Senator, that "the liberties of this country are in greater danger to-day from the corruptions and from the profligacy practiced in the various Departments of the Government than they are from the enemy in the open field." I suppose the object of these investigations is, if possible, to prevent these corruptions and these profligacies; and being appointed on a committee of investigation, associated with a Senator entertaining that avowed opinion and belief, I think it is but just to the head of the Department whose conduct is sought to be examined that he should be respectfully requested to send some competent person connected with the Department to be present at the examination by the committee of the witnesses, and to furnish any proof in his power to explain matters pertaining to the things to be inquired into. I think it is our duty to assume that the heads of these Departments of the Government have just as much interest and just as much wish on their part to prevent these corruptions and abuses as any member of the Senate can have; and it is but an act of justice to the Departments that they be requested to have some one to represent them before these investigating committees. My attention has been brought to it for this reason, and I feel that it is but an act of simple justice that the Senate, in appointing committees charged with an investigation into the conduct of a Department, should respectfully request the head of the Department to send some one to be present at that examination, because they may have evidence which the committee may not know anything about. The special matter of inquiry may require a special knowledge, like a knowledge of steam-engines; for that was one of the subjects which was spoken of in the Senate which demanded investigation.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of one o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order, the unfinished business of Thursday last, which is the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well; this resolution will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move that the bill referred to by the Chair be laid over until to-morrow. I understand that a privileged motion will be made very soon, before any action could be had upon it. I will therefore submit a motion that the bill which is the special order for this hour be postponed until to-morrow, and be made the special order at one o'clock.

Mr. WILSON. If the Senator will allow me, before the bill goes over, I wish to propose an amendment to it in order to have it printed with the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Massachusetts offers an amendment to the bill, and moves that his amendment be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on postponing the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow at one o'clock, and making it the special order for that hour.

The motion was agreed to.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Secretary, announced that the President had approved and signed, on the 28th of January, the following bill and joint resolutions:

A bill (S. No. 49) relating to the admission of patients to the hospital for the insane in the District of Columbia;

A joint resolution (S. No. 2) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Nathaniel P. Banks, and the officers and soldiers under his command at Port Hudson;

A joint resolution (S. No. 3) expressive of the thanks of Congress to Major General Joseph Hooker, Major General George G. Meade, and Major General Oliver O. Howard, and the officers and soldiers of the army of the Potomac;

A joint resolution (S. No. 5) of thanks to Major General Ambrose E. Burnside, and the officers and men who fought under his command; and

A joint resolution (S. No. 14) presenting the thanks of Congress to Cornelius Vanderbilt for a gift of the steamship Vanderbilt.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. If there is no other matter before the Senate I desire to call up again the resolution we had under consideration a few moments since, in regard to investigating committees, in order that it may be disposed of.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. GRIMES. Mr. President, I think it is eminently proper that this resolution, or something tantamount to it, should be adopted. The purpose which the Senate had in view when it instituted the inquiry to which the Senator from Wisconsin has alluded was to elicit the truth. We wish to get at the facts. We want to discover whether or not there may not be some method devised by which improvements may be made in the present method of securing Navy contracts; for the Senator from New Hampshire alluded to that subject as the one which he had specially in view when he introduced his resolution.

It is known to all the members of this body who are at all familiar with the subject, that the Navy Department is peculiarly constructed. It is differently organized from any other Department of this Government. It is almost a specialty in and of itself. It takes a man a year at least before he can understand its organization and its details. The members of this body who are appointed on a committee of investigation, and even the Committee on Naval Affairs, are not thoroughly conversant with the details of the Navy Department. I confess, myself, as one of them, that I am not, though I have endeavored as far as I could to inform myself as to what those details are, and as to its organization.

It is now proposed that when this committee proceeds to its investigation in regard to the method of executing contracts for that Department the Department itself shall have authority to detail one of its officers to meet the committee, in order to direct its attention to particular subjects of inquiry that may come before them. It strikes me that it is highly proper that this should be done. It is not to be presumed that the Senators who compose this committee are as well acquainted with the particulars to which their attention ought to be directed as those men who have been for years engaged as officials in the Department.

I have no doubt that great frauds have been perpetrated. There are Senators around me who know very well that, three years ago, even before the commencement of this war, I called the attention of the Senate to the necessity of some change in the laws of the United States so far as they related to contracts for the naval service. There is connected with that naval service an officer known as a Navy agent. So far as I am able to learn, there is no law of Congress that ever authorized the creation of that office. He was originally a mere agent of the Department, appointed by the head of the Department for a temporary purpose, but we have acts of Congress that recognize his existence; and now, at the commencement of every Administration, the President sends down to us nominations for these several Navy agencies. The Department is organized in strict conformity to the laws which Congress has passed, but under that organization there is great opportunity for frauds to be perpetrated against the Government by these Navy agents. So there is great opportunity for frauds to be perpetrated against it by the contractors under the Navy agents and under the Department proper. The Department are conscious of this. They have had their attention directed to it. They are just as anxious to ferret out those frauds as any member of the Senate or any person in the whole country can be. They are powerless to remove the evil. Having had their attention directed to it, they are prepared to inform this committee that you have instructed to investigate the subject, and to direct the attention of witnesses when they shall appear before them, to particular points of inquiry and to things within their knowledge which have not hitherto been elicited in their testimony, and which may be of vast importance to the country.

You know, Mr. President, that a witness can appear on the stand and make a statement that is abstractly true, and yet, without any interrogatories being addressed to him, that truth may give altogether a false and erroneous impression to the bystander. The facts by which it is surrounded, the time when it was uttered, the manner in which it was spoken, may convey an entirely different impression from the abstract statement itself. Let me illustrate. The chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs the other day, when the resolution to which this is a proposed amendment was introduced, prefaced it with some remarks in which he called the attention of the Senate and of the country to the naval estimates. He said:

"It will be seen by the estimates of expenses that we are called upon to appropriate this year $142,000,000 for naval purposes. This sum is large or small by comparison. I have been at some pains to look at the naval expenditures of the civilized world, as they have been furnished me by one of our assistant librarians. I find that the naval expenditures of Great Britain during the year 1862 were $59,402,940; of France for 1863, as voted by the Corps Legislatif, $30,000,000; of Spain for 1862-63, $19,421,617; of Russia for 1862, $15,442,373; of Austria, per budget of 1863, $5,314,000; of the Netherlands for 1862, $3,633,436; of Sweden for 1863, $3,503,406; of Prussia for 1862, $1,489,360; of Portugal for 1862-63, $111,000. These sums are given in dollars, and they comprise the naval expenditures of all the civilized nations of the world with the exception of Italy and Denmark. Italy and Denmark publish no naval expenses separate from the general war expenses; but the expenses of the civilized world for a year, taking sometimes 1862, and sometimes 1863 and 1863, and sometimes 1863, as they are given, amount in gross to $138,318,692; so that we are called upon to spend this year some four million dollars more than all the rest of the world with the exception of Italy and Denmark."

Mr. President, I have not had an opportunity to verify the accuracy of these statements, but I have no doubt they are substantially true. I admit that the statement of itself is true, and that the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, unquestionably did not intend to create a wrong impression. His love for his country, his regard for the naval service, and I doubt not his respect for the gentlemen who have charge of naval affairs in this country, is such that he could not have permitted himself to create such an impression, even if he had been so inclined. Nevertheless, the facts as stated do create a very erroneous impression. Had I been on a committee, or been permitted to appear before a committee representing the Naval Department, and had that Senator appeared before that committee and made the statements which he made here, I would have asked him, "Do you not know, or ought you not to have known, and might you not have known, as chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, that the estimates for the Navy Department and the estimates for all the other Departments are predicated upon a paper basis, and must necessarily be thus predicated; and that therefore the amount of $142,000,000 should be reduced by thirty-three per cent., or to $95,000,000?" He would have been compelled to answer unhesitatingly in the affirmative.

Then I would have asked him further, "Is it not a fact that these estimates were made up, under a law of Congress, to the 1st of October last, when our relations with foreign Powers were not supposed to be as amicable as they are now thought to be, and do they not include estimates for steamers to the amount of $22,500,000, which were estimated for at the special instance of the people who are peculiarly interested in commerce, and residing in the section of the country in which the Senator himself resides?" He would have been compelled to answer that question in the affirmative, and thus the amount would be reduced to $72,000,000 in place of $142,000,000.

Then I would have asked him if, during the debates of the last Congress, he did not several times assert in his place in the Senate that we were paying our naval officers and our seamen much greater compensation than was paid in any naval service in the world; and he would have answered again in the affirmative. Then would have followed the inquiry, "Is not the pay of all officers now in the naval service of the United States fixed by a law of Congress?" and I should again have received an affirmative answer.

I would have asked him still further, "Do you not, in making your charges against the Department, accuse them"—for it virtually amounts to an accusation—"of making exorbitant or improper estimates when they make estimates for salaries amounting to $18,000,000 of the $72,000,000 based wholly upon the laws of Congress which fix the compensation for the officers and men?" He would have been constrained to answer in the affirmative. Why, sir, if you had that witness before you under such circumstances, you would further have developed the fact that, in the navy-yards in France and England, and all over Europe, from which the Senator's figures are drawn, the skilled artisans to whom we pay from two and a half to three and a half dollars per day can be secured at from seventy-five cents to ninety cents and one dollar.

The Senator then goes on and says:

"It may be said, and said with truth, that these are expenditures in time of peace. I have been at some pains to look over the expenditures of England and France in the gigantic struggle of the Crimean war. That war was declared on the 27th of March, 1854, and the Crimea was evacuated by the allies July 12, 1857, lasting a little more than three years and five months. The total naval expenditures of Great Britain during the war were $262,032,210, and of France $87,577,578, making a total of $349,609,788 for the whole naval expenses of France and England during the Crimean war, which was less than $100,000,000 a year, so that we are called upon this year to appropriate for our Navy $40,000,000 more than was spent by the combined navies of France and England in any one year during the Crimean war."

Now, Mr. President, if a witness had made that statement upon the stand and there had been any one present authorized to interrogate him in regard to the facts, it could be made to appear that the expenses of England during the Crimean war ranged from ninety-five to one hundred million dollars per annum in specie. It would also have been discovered that England had a navy already built, and that she was not compelled, as the Government of the United States has been compelled during this war, to build their navy as well as to maintain it and enlarge its navy-yards. It would have been proven by the witness, if he were informed in regard to it, that about the only vessels built by the British Government during the time of the Crimean war were those celebrated gunboats with which we were threatened by a writer in the London Times during the Trentafair, and which so frightened some of my friends in the Northwest that they immediately conceived the great canal project, all of which gunboats have since been abandoned by the British Government, and no one of which could ever have got through the canals into Lake Ontario.

I submit, Mr. President, that it would have been fair to have stated that the British navy was already built, and that there were no expenses, or comparatively no expenses, incurred during the Crimean war in constructing a navy with which to carry it on. Then another fact would have been elicited on that examination, and a very important one. If I had been authorized to interrogate the Senator as a witness on the stand, I should have asked him what was the character of the ships which the British and French then had. Were they sailing vessels or were they steamers, and what is the difference in cost between supporting a steamer in keeping up a blockade and supporting a sailing vessel? Why, Mr. President, the facts were that nearly all of the vessels employed by the French and the English during the Crimean war were sailing vessels. Russia had but very little coast to blockade, and the old sailing hulks were taken into the Black and Baltic seas, and set down before their principal ports. There they remained during the whole war, and it cost very little more to support them there than it did to support them in their own dock-yards and in ordinary at home. While England and France thus blockaded Russian ports in what may almost be called inland waters with sailing ships, we have kept up the most complete blockade ever known in naval warfare with steam vessels, and along nearly four thousand miles of coast, besides keeping up an armament of nearly one hundred steam vessels on the western waters.

Mr. President, I do not know that I shall have a better opportunity to say two or three things in connection with naval matters not immediately connected with the subject in hand than the present; and if the Senate will pardon me I will proceed to do so. I wish the Senate to understand that I am not a "thick and thin" defender of the Navy Department. I claim no infallibility for that Department, or for any other. I have condemned some of its acts, as I have condemned some of the acts of every Department of this Government. They know that I often differ from them. I have frankly told them when I condemned them. I have always gone before them and told them what my opinions were in regard to any particular measure that I disapproved. Sometimes I have convinced them that they were wrong; sometimes they have convinced me that I was wrong; and sometimes we have both remained of the same opinion as before. I differed from the Navy Department in regard to their treatment of Commodore Du Pont. I told them so frankly. But I have not allowed my private grief in that connection, or on any other subject, to control my action as a Senator. I believe that that gallant admiral would be one of the first to rebuke and condemn me if he supposed that I allowed my feelings in his behalf to influence me in the slightest degree in my conduct here. He loves the country and he loves the service of which he is so distinguished an ornament too much for that. I disagreed with them in regard to the restoration of certain officers who had resigned several years ago, and had recently come back to the service. I thought that action was unjust to the younger officers who had stood by our flag and carried it in honor and in triumph over every sea and in every clime. The Navy Department thought differently, and the Senate of the United States finally confirmed its action, and there was the end of it. I did not bring my griefs down here and ventilate them in the face of the nation. I do not pretend that the right man is always selected for the right place. What man or what Department does not commit mistakes? The true question is, what is the grand total of results accomplished by the Department?

Mr. President, when this war began, as every citizen of the country knows, we had but eight vessels that could be of any real value to the Government for the purpose of prosecuting the war. We have to-day between five and six hundred. I stated the other day, in answer to the clamors which had been raised and which had found an echo here in the Senate, that I was satisfied, from a pretty thorough examination, that it would be discovered that instead of having the slowest vessels in any existing navy we really had the fastest naval ships in any service in the world. I am still convinced that such will be the verdict that will be rendered by the committee in the House of Representatives who have that special subject of inquiry in hand. Immediately after giving utterance to that opinion I was deluged with letters from engineers, ship-builders, and various amateurs in the naval profession, all of which went to confirm the statement that I had made. Yesterday I received a letter, which I will read, from a gentleman with whom I am very slightly personally acquainted, but who was introduced to me by the Senator from Massachusetts furthest from me [Mr. SUMNER] a year and a half ago. He has never been an advocate or a particular friend of the Navy Department, but is a man known all over the country as one of the most extensive shipbuilders in the United States. I desire that his statement may go to the country in this connection. The letter will speak for itself. Let me say here, however, that the greatest fear I have is, that owing to the peculiar character of the war and the great outcry for fast vessels, we shall be liable to sacrifice too much to secure speed.

DEAR SIR: My attention has been called to the controversies now before the public, in which our naval machinery has been severely criticised, and our naval steamers set forth as monstrous abortions and complete failures. I have watched with deep interest the course pursued by the Navy Department, both regarding the models of hull and the style and power of the steam machinery used. I have ideas of my own on the subject of the proper requisites for a steam vessel of war, and do know that it is a difficult problem to solve. Also, I know the fact that the present war has called for a class of steamers hitherto untried and unknown to the great naval Powers of Europe. The requirements of the blockade, and offensive operations on the southern coast, have brought forth a class of naval steamers admirably fitted for such work, but, in my opinion, hardly the proper models for fast cruising ships. But I am surprised to see that there are people unapologetic and selfish enough to use every effort, personal and through the public press, to prejudice and poison the public mind with the belief that the recently constructed naval steamers are failures and wholly unfit for the work intended for them to do.

I have also taken pains to inquire into the merits of the steam machinery used in the naval service, and my conclusions are without prejudice and entirely unbiassed by any party or parties. I have fully conversed with engineers in civil life, also with our naval engineers, and I here remark that from observation and experience with the Navy engineers I believe them as a body to be an ornament to this country, and that they combine theory with practice, and are doing and have done much to elevate the standard of mechanical engineering in our country. They are, as a body, superior to the English engineers, but I think not quite equal to the French, and do not hold so high a position in our service as the corps of engineers do in the French navy. We must educate these young men as we do our midshipmen, give them the advantages of our dock-yard shops, and send them to sea on practice ships; and after this experience then thoroughly examine them, and if they pass make them third assistant engineers. I consider the organization of the imperial corps of French naval engineers to be complete. They rank first on the list of staff officers of the navy, are educated in the Government dock-yards, and the highest in rank, inspector general of naval engineers, (corresponding with our chief of bureau, &c.) ranks with a general of division (major general); first-class engineers with captains of line-of-battle ships; and so down to the engineer cadets or apprentices. And I read with pleasure in our honorable Secretary's report that it is the intention of the Navy Department to educate this important class of officers at Government expense.

I find from reliable sources that a Mr. Edward N. Dickerson, of New York, has been the author of most of the attacks on our steam navy, and has expended much time and money in spreading his newspaper articles and pamphlets all over the country; also that he is a lawyer by profession, having ample means, and interested in an important part of a marine steam-engine known as the "valve gear." From evidence collected from naval engineers and those in civil life I do not find that he has any reputation as an engineer, and is considered as a sort of enthusiast or perhaps monomaniac on the subject of coal, expansion of steam, and his peculiar "cut-off;" also that his engineering operations so far have been complete failures.

On the other hand the representative of the Steam Bureau, Chief Engineer Isherwood, although not a practical man in the strict sense of the word, that is, a machinist by trade, (and I do not think it necessary that a man must file and hammer iron for seven years to be a good engineer, for there are so many trades used in mechanical engineering that it would be impossible to learn them all,) but a man of extensive engineering experience, understanding the working of motions, has had long practice at sea, (and while in foreign ports, as the English well know, improved his time in thoroughly inspecting the machinery of their war vessels,) also having a good education, is a mathematician, and a sound, clear-headed thinker. This is the opinion of engineers and manufacturers generally, also of the members of his own corps. I know personally that his books have been read with interest in England, and that English engineers have a very high opinion of his capacity as a marine engineer, and believe his experiments were faithfully made, (and not frauds as the public had been led to believe,) and it would have made any American engineer proud to have heard the warm approval they gave of his systematic and thorough way of experimenting and explaining causes, effects, &c. I will here add that the experiments made with engines and boilers by the Navy Department exceed anything of the kind ever tried in Europe, for they have been practical, and if any experiments can give us light on such subjects those that have been made are very valuable to the country at large as well as the Navy. I have very little personal acquaintance with Mr. Isherwood, and know him only from others and by his deeds, and truly believe that he has not had fair play. He seems to be a hard-working man, while those attacking him, so far as I know, are idlers and have not much else to do. Understanding that there was to be an investigation regarding Mr. Isherwood's machinery and his official course as an engineer, I present the following table of British war steamers with their speeds at the measured mile; and I know full well what the delusion of a measured mile trial is, and know that at sea under ordinary circumstances they do not equal the measured mile time by at least fifteen per cent., and often more. In running the measured mile (and I have seen it done, and know all the jockeying,) the sea must be perfectly smooth and no wind, the ship trimmed and made ready, boilers and fires clean, furnaces full of burning coal, and steam kept bottled up until they near the first "post," then the valves are opened wide and the mile is run. The tables of speeds of our own naval sloops are taken from the ship's logs in a seaway with sea-kind firemen, and in some cases burning bad coal. I know that there are no steamers in the English and French navies of the size of the "Sacramento class," that under the same circumstances are so efficient in point of speed, economy, and destructive powers. I think they admit this. We have no ships to compare with the Mersey and Diadem frigates, a class of vessels used in the British navy which carry powerful batteries, have great steam power, and are very fast. For instance, the Mersey frigate, tonnage 3,726, draught of water 22 feet 7 inches, horse-power 4,000, (the length of the stoke-hole or boiler-room in this steamer is over 68 feet, having 32 furnaces,) speed at measured mile, Stokes's Bay, 13.29 knots. The Minnesota class of frigates are their equals in armament, but not in speed.

Our side-wheel gunboats are far ahead of anything of the kind used in Europe, and with a light draught of about eight feet of water maintain a speed hardly, if at all, equaled by any of our fastest merchant steamers, and carry a very heavy battery. Also the screw gunboats are vastly superior to the English and French gunboats, both in speed, battery, and general efficiency; also for operations on our coast, their very light draught of water makes them a valuable arm of offense.

Regarding the sloops of the "Sacramento class," they combine high speed with powerful batteries, although their exceedingly light draught of water prevents their being good sea boats, as they will roll excessively, yet they have not their equals in the above good points in the British or any other navy. And these sloops have been presented to the public as complete failures, having very slow speeds. I will present a table of the fastest screw corvettes and sloops in the British navy, having nearly the same tonnage. This table is compiled from a list of forty seven corvettes and sloops, and is the speed made at the measured mile, and not their full speed at sea, where the conditions are changed and speed much less:

	Tons.	Speed per hour.
Raccoon.....	1,467	10 knots.
Pearl.....	1,469	11.31 "
Pylades.....	1,275	10.11 "
Satellite.....	1,462	11.4 "

As I mention above, these are the fastest of a class that correspond with the Sacramento and other of our new sloops, and have an average draught of from twenty to twenty-two feet of water. These vessels would be entirely unsuitable for operations on our coast, owing to their great draught of water; and having this great draught a large propeller can be used, will be deeply immersed, and can be made more efficient than with a lighter draught. This is the opinion of engineers, and has been confirmed by experience.

The following table gives the speed of our new steam sloops of about 1,367 tons, and with the very light average draught of about fourteen feet of water:

	Tons.	Knots per hour.
Sacramento.....	1,367	12.5
Adirondack.....	1,367	12
Shenandoah.....	1,367	12.25
Ticonderoga.....	1,367	12.5

The above speeds were made at sea, and, as their officers say, "under the usual conditions of cruising ships." We can all see that at the measured-mile trial (after the manner our English friends have of getting the maximum speeds) a much higher rate could be obtained.

Their machinery is much like the well-tried English plans, having the same valve gearing, but with "surface or fresh-water condensers," and much higher steam can be carried by using fresh water in the boilers; also many other important advantages are gained by the use of a "surface condenser." And it seems that the "Seawall condenser" now in use on our naval steamers, is all that can be desired; at least the best in use.

Mr. Isherwood advocates the use of a smaller cylinder and higher steam, and is opposed to complicated machinery, made to expand the steam to its fullest extent, believing the end does not justify the means, and that it is safer and just as economical in the end to employ simple and always reliable valve machinery. The success of the English machinery is entirely due to extreme simplicity and strength. After the painful experience with the complicated machinery of the Pensacola and Richmond, it does seem that Mr. Isherwood is right in his views. We are a fast people, and want everything we have to do with to be fast. Our naval steamers are fast, yet they must go faster, even if they break down in so doing. This is the way the public feel in this matter, and the performances of the Alabama and her consorts have made us all crazy in matters of speed. It is one thing to see them at sea, then to overtake them, afterwards to capture them. I do not think any of these privateers steam thirteen knots, and believe they will yet be captured by our new sloops.

I hope our Navy will be efficient, as it always has done its duty, and desire that the best talent in the land shall be at the helm, but do not see that others can do any better than our present chiefs of bureaus have done; that our ships and machinery are failures; or that Mr. Isherwood is incompetent because he does not agree in all points with those assailing him.

The Nypsic gunboat came to the navy-yard at Boston from Portsmouth, and her officers said "she made eleven knots under steam," and has since been very efficient on the blockade. The Pequot, a gunboat of the same class, has just returned from a trial trip, which, from all that I can learn, has not been entirely satisfactory, and did not give the speed of the Nypsic. Also, the Saco, of the same class, now fitting out at the Boston yard, has, like the Pequot, new and peculiar machinery, in both cases experiments. I mention this to show that private establishments are engineering for the Navy, and without Mr. Isherwood's success.

In writing the above, I have been influenced by patriotic motives. I never have, neither do I expect to receive any favors from Mr. Isherwood or the Navy Department, but think he has been abused by men not his equals, and who cannot show equal success under equal circumstances. I have been a close observer of motive steam machinery, both at home and abroad, and look at this matter from a practical point of view, and desire to see fair play, and am confirmed in the above opinions after hearing the views of both sides.

I did intend to make my views known through the public press, but have concluded to adopt this method, of writing to influential persons, believing it to be more effectual.

The English are most happy to catch at the word failure when used in connection with our naval vessels, and are only too glad when our officials are abused. I know this from experience with them; and I think the authors of such wholesale abuse, and untruthful assertions concerning our chiefs of bureaus and others in authority in the Navy Department, should be punished and made an example of. Admitting the Department have made some mistakes, (and what engineer, shipbuilder, or manufacturer has not,) yet on the whole they have turned out the finest naval steamers of their class in the world; and it is with feelings of intense pride that I see there is a prospect of our assuming our proper position as a first-class naval Power. I have repeatedly stated that we can only be respected abroad by having a powerful navy, and if this had been the case when the rebellion was instituted, the neutrality laws would have been better understood by England and France.

We were now building in our dock-yards a class of wooden cruising ships that in my opinion, after a careful examination, will excel in speed and sea-going qualities any steamers ever produced by any nation. I would guaranty the above statement to be correct, and believe (having built over one hundred sail of square-rigged sailing ships) I have constructed the fastest sailing vessels ever built, and am prepared to say that the large cruising ships now building in our dock-yards can hardly be bettered, and we ought at once to lay the keels of fifty such ships, from one thousand five hundred tons upwards, and the machinery known as "Isherwood's" ought to be used to propel them.

Excuse this long epistle. It is intended to do good, and if it will add any strength to the Navy Department, then my earnest wishes will be gratified.

I have always been considered as very unfriendly to the Navy Department, and in a professional point of view do not agree with all their plans, but at the same time do hope that nothing will be done to embarrass officials that have done and are doing much to make us respected abroad.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

DONALD MCKAY.

Hon. J. W. GRIMES, Member Senate Naval Committee, Washington, District of Columbia.

This, Mr. President, is only one of a number of letters of similar import that I have received from eminent shipbuilders and men of practical knowledge in naval matters upon this subject.

Mr. President, if it were not for occupying the attention of the Senate too long, I could not only demonstrate by authentic statements which I have lying before me on my desk the truth of the statement made by Mr. McKay as to the comparative speed of our vessels and the fastest vessels in the British service as enumerated by him, but I could go on and show that other vessels beside those enumerated by him have made even greater speed than those mentioned in his letter. It has been charged, Mr. President, over and over again that it is the policy of the Navy Department to confine engineering and the methods of constructing engines to the plans of Mr. Isherwood. As the Senate is already informed by the letter of Mr. McKay, while the Nypsic, which made on her trial trip upward of eleven knots, and I understand has since made over thirteen, was built under the direction of the Navy Department, and with the Isherwood machinery, the Pequot that has just returned from her trial trip was built outside of the Navy Department, and has not accomplished near as good speed as the Nypsic, which was built by the Department proper, instead of being built by a contractor. But it is not true that the Department has confined itself to the plans of Mr. Isherwood. I could enumerate several vessels that are now in process of construction, and one of them in the city of New York, a magnificent vessel, the plan of the engines of which is being prepared by the very Mr. Dickerson who is so profuse in his attacks on the Navy Department and all its friends. As to the character of naval engines I am not qualified to speak. I only look at the results attained. Those results are to my mind entirely satisfactory. So far as I know, or can understand, they receive condemnation only from those who are interested in some patent, some untried project, some undeveloped idea, some crazy conception, and from the friends of those persons.

But, Mr. President, it is asked why we do not catch the Alabama if our vessels are so fast. I might ask why do you not catch Moseby? Moseby for eighteen months, or nearly that time, has been living within the lines of the American Army, and has destroyed three times as much property as the Alabama has. Do you condemn the Army or the War Department because he is not caught? Why do you not catch Forrest? It was with a good deal of difficulty that you were even able to catch Morgan in Ohio. Morgan traversed the States of Indiana and Ohio, and would have got away scot-free at last had it not been for the much-abused Navy. The trouble is not that our vessels have not speed enough to catch the Alabama, for the Alabama, according to the best information that I can get, is not nearly so fast a vessel as she is represented to be. Captain Baldwin, who has just returned on the Vanderbilt, having been in pursuit of her about a year, and who has been in divers ports where she had been, who has seen men that had been attached to her and knew thoroughly what her capacity was, told me in an interview I had with him a few days ago that she could not exceed eleven knots an hour. We have plenty of vessels that will exceed that by two knots an hour. The difficulty is in finding where she is. The Florida was going into a port when one of our vessels was coming out of it. The officers on the Florida said that they could just distinguish the smoke of a steamer as they were bearing off to the right, and our vessel was going in at the left. The next time those two vessels were heard from they were seventeen thousand miles apart. One was in pursuit of the other, but our officers supposing that the Florida had gone in one direction went off in that direction, while the Florida instead of going in the direction supposed went in an exactly contrary direction. The intelligence came to us only two or three days ago that the Wyoming and the Alabama were within a short time, when last heard from, within twenty-five miles of each other. People do not reflect upon the difficulty of finding these corsairs. When found they will be easily caught, unless in the vicinity of a professedly neutral port into which they can dodge. It is the action of professedly neutral Powers that prevents their capture.

It was with great difficulty that the British with all their vast fleet were able to capture our sailing men-of-war and privateers in the war of 1812. Do you remember what a chase they had for that gallant old Commodore Porter, and that finally they had to run him into the harbor of Valparaiso, a neutral port, and there capture his vessel? If Senators will take the trouble to read Cooper's Naval History they will discover that there were precisely the same clamors raised by the British people, only more bitter and denunciatory, in regard to the capture of our sailing vessels in the war of 1812 that some gentlemen now attempt to raise against the Navy Department because they do not succeed in capturing the Alabama and her sister pirates.

Sir, the real difficulty we have to encounter in the capture of the Alabama is the position assumed by foreign Powers that allows her, the moment that one of our vessels gets near her, to slip into a neutral port, and we are not permitted to follow her in. We are not permitted to lay off abreast the port until she comes out; and if we do follow her in, our vessels are compelled to remain there twenty-four hours after she escapes, and during those twenty-four hours she will have had such a start of our vessels that it will have become almost impossible to capture her. The Secretary of the Navy, in his very able report to both Houses of Congress at the commencement of this session, has stated the obstacles to be encountered in this regard better than I can. In that report he says:

"The recognition of the rebels as belligerents by the principal maritime Powers at the commencement of hostilities gave strength and character to the insurrection which it could never have had but for that recognition. A declaration of neutrality between the belligerents went abroad from Governments with which we were in amity, carrying with it the semblance of fairness, but which in its operation is most unjust toward this Government and country. The United States had an extensive commerce which penetrated every sea, while the rebels were without commerce or ships. The United States had a Navy, and squadrons on almost every ocean; the rebels had not a single armed vessel at home or abroad. With a full knowledge of these facts the principal maritime Powers of Europe hastened to recognize the rebels as belligerents, and to declare that both the belligerents should be treated alike in their ports; that the public armed vessels of neither should remain more than twenty-four hours in their harbors, nor receive supplies or assistance, except such as might be absolutely necessary to carry them home, and for three months thereafter they should not again receive supplies in any of the ports of those Governments. While this proclaimed neutrality did not affect a single ship of the rebels, for they had not one to be affected, it excluded the naval vessels of the United States from the ports of the principal maritime Powers throughout the world, except under the restrictions enumerated.

"When the Sumter, a vessel stolen from our merchants, made her escape and went abroad armed, but without a recognized nationality, to seize and destroy our merchantmen upon the high seas, she found, unlike the Algerine corsairs, refuge and protection within the maritime jurisdiction of the great European Powers with whom the United States were in friendship; and finally, after being followed by our cruisers into the harbor of Gibraltar, she was permitted by the authorities to remain not only twenty-four hours, but more than twelve months, and was eventually transferred to an English purchaser, went to an English port, was refitted, and left the English shores with a contraband cargo, and has since run the blockade, carrying supplies to the rebels.

"The Alabama, the Florida, the Georgia, are armed cruisers built in England, have an English armament on board, and are manned by crews who are almost exclusively European. Sailing sometimes under the English and sometimes under the rebel flag, these rovers, without a port of their own which they can enter, or to which they can send a single prize for adjudication, have roamed the seas, capturing and destroying the commercial ships of a nation at peace with Great Britain and France; but yet, when these corsairs have needed repairs or supplies, they have experienced no difficulty in procuring them, because it had been deemed expedient to recognize the rebels as belligerents."

Mr. President, it is within the knowledge of all the members of this body that when one of our vessels went to the harbor of Nassau, where the rebel vessels had received supplies that they might prey upon our commerce, our vessel was denied the same privilege that had been granted to the rebel cruisers.

"Not one of the many vessels captured by these rovers has ever been judicially condemned as a legal capture. Wanton destruction has been the object and purpose of the captors, who have burnt and destroyed the property of their merchant victims.

"This theory of recognizing rebels as belligerents so soon as they lift their arms against the Government, and thus declaring them entitled to national privileges on the high seas and in the harbors of the world, although without a port or navy of their own, is the inauguration of a new policy in the history of nations. For a long succession of years it has been an important point in the progress of civilization, and particularly among the maritime Powers, that the police of the seas should be guarded and maintained by the subjection of captures to the adjudication of tribunals administering the law of nations, which receive from the hands of the captor his prize into the custody of that law to be disposed of by its rules; but the course pursued in fostering and giving encouragement to the rebel rovers who, without a recognized national flag or a port at their command, or any means of bringing their captures to judgment, are committing their predatory acts, is a restoration of that Algerine and Tripolitan system which long afflicted the civilized world, but which, under the lead of our Government, was exterminated in the early part of the present century.

"Thus far these rovers have escaped capture. While in the West Indies they were protected whenever they were enabled to flee into a neutral port, or get within a marine league of the shore of a neutral Government—a privilege that was never in any quarter extended to the Mediterranean corsairs. Unfortunately most of the colonial authorities and no inconsiderable portion of the population of the European dependencies, influenced by the professed neutrality which elevated insurgents and sought to degrade the national authority to an equality with them, were in sympathy with the predatory rovers, and while lending them aid and often furnishing them with information, interposed obstacles and manifested unfriendly feelings to the lawful operations of the naval forces of the Union."

Captain Baldwin would have captured the Alabama at Cape Town had not his letters been retained by the postmaster at that place—letters giving him the information he desired to insure her capture.

Mr. President, I do not desire to prolong this discussion, and will only say a word more.

During this war a great many grand and noble things have been done, a great many gallant deeds performed; but in my conviction fifty years hence it will be the verdict of mankind that the most wonderful thing which has been performed has been the keeping up of the stupendous blockade that has been kept up by this nation so successfully and so long. The blockade is recognized by all foreign nations as the most efficient that has ever been maintained. The Navy Department, commencing with only eight steamships that could be used for blockading purposes at the commencement of the war, and they scattered all over the world and beyond its reach for many months, has kept up a blockade, according to the report of Professor Bache, along the coast from Cape Henry to the line of Mexico, of 3,549 statute miles. In this line there are 189 rivers, bays, harbors, inlets, sounds, or deep openings, of which 45 are under six feet in depth at mean high water, 17 are between six and twelve feet, 42 are between twelve and eighteen feet, and 32 are over eighteen feet in depth. Not one man in a thousand has an adequate conception of the difficulties attending the building, equipping, furnishing, and manning the vessels required for such a service, nor of the hardships endured by the officers and men to whom the duty is assigned. I say without hesitation, Mr. President, that the ability of this nation to build and prepare the ships necessary to maintain as effective a blockade as it has been able to maintain during the last three years will hereafter excite the wonder and admiration of the world.

This is not all that we have done. While we have been able to do this, we have been able to keep a fleet in the western waters traversing the Red river, the Yazoo, the Cumberland, the Mississippi, the Ohio, Arkansas, Tennessee, and all the small streams that empty into the Mississippi south of the Ohio—a service for which we of the Northwest are willing always and at all times to return the Navy Department our most profound thanks. No man can overstate the services that the Navy has rendered to us in that quarter; and these services have been rendered after overcoming the greatest obstacles.

If it be the purpose of the Senate to elicit the facts in regard to Navy contracts, if it be not the design of gentlemen to overhaul anybody, but to draw out the facts in order to pass preventive legislation, then let some one representing the Department be present at that committee, that he may interrogate witnesses in order to elicit the truth. I understand that we do not now sit here as a court of impeachment; we do not send our committee into this investigation for the purpose of discovering rogues, but for the purpose of adopting such legislation as may be necessary to prevent roguery, and that the discovery of the rogues is merely incidental to the main purpose we have in view.

I am satisfied that frauds have been perpetrated. I have always been satisfied of it. I have known that they could be perpetrated under the naval organization since I have known anything about it. The Department desires a full exposition. It will not thwart but will aid the investigation. As I said before, there are three or four gentlemen around me now who have known what are my views on that subject, and it is not my fault that a bill did not pass to prevent these frauds. One did pass the Senate and went to the other branch of Congress at a former session and was there defeated. All we want now is to draw out the facts so as to instruct the minds of the Senate as to our duty, and then I have no doubt that we shall enact a law that will remedy the evils in the future.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor, but yielded to allow the reception of a message from the House of Representatives.

DEATH OF HON. J. W. NOELL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announcing the death of Hon. JOHN W. NOELL, a member elect to that House from the State of Missouri.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, I ask that the resolutions communicated from the House of Representatives, announcing the death of Hon. JOHN W. NOELL, may be read.

The resolutions were read.

Mr. BROWN. Mr. President, without intending to make any extended review of the life and service of the honorable member from my own State, I feel it due to the position which he occupied in the affections of the citizens of his district, to the bold and patriotic stand which he assumed at the outbreak of rebellion in sustaining the national Government, to his devoted labor in advocating the passage of an act at the last Congress to encourage the emancipation of slaves in Missouri, that this occasion should not go by without at least the earnest attestation of those Senators present who knew him, to his great ability, to his pure ambition, and to his unflinching loyalty. I did not have the pleasure, sir, of any very intimate personal acquaintance with the deceased, and cannot, therefore, speak as others have done of those relations which endeared him in the domestic circle, and which made him beloved by so many who differed from him in political views. But I did know in the last years of his life of the zeal with which he gave his heart to the work of freedom, and can bear witness that he had embraced the faith with all singleness of purpose, and had determined to prosecute it to a full accomplishment.

Mr. President, I submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate mourns the death of Hon. JOHN W. NOELL, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Missouri, and tenders to his widow, children, and other relatives, a sincere sympathy in this afflictive bereavement.

Resolved, That, as a mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. President, previous to the year 1850 the deceased was unknown to me except as a young lawyer of some promise in southeast Missouri. He was elected, I think, in that year to fill a vacancy in the State Senate, and in the year 1852 he was reelected to serve for four years in that body. He was elected on both occasions as a Whig, and upon nearly all questions involving the success of the principles advocated by that party he was true to those who had followed the fortunes of the illustrious Clay. In one particular, if I remember aright, he differed radically from his party friends. During this period the wholesale system of railroad improvement in Missouri was projected. The schemes then inaugurated by the General Assembly resulted in the present public debt of our State. That debt, though large, has given us a network of roads, which, on the return of peace, must furnish us the best guarantee of early recovery from the blight and desolation of existing civil war.

The Whig party in the General Assembly, with but few exceptions, advocated the loan of State credit to the system. Among these exceptions was General NOELL. He resisted with earnestness and his usual ability what was known as the "railroad mania" of that day. He presented in strong terms the injustice of taxing those far removed from the lines of road equally with those who more immediately enjoyed its benefits, and urged that such result would inevitably flow from the hot-bed system adopted, looking, as he conceived, rather to future development of the State than to supplying the wants of legitimate business.

He and those with whom he acted were overpowered. The system was adopted, giving us about eight hundred miles of railroad, but with a State debt of nearly thirty millions. In the severe afflictions visited upon our State recently, destroying the accumulations of the past, and withdrawing from useful pursuits so large a proportion of our laboring population, white and black, with the great western outlet of trade closed against our commerce, our credit is temporarily dishonored. Such, General NOELL thought, would be our condition even under more favorable circumstances. They who are interested abroad, however, may be assured that repudiation will never be laid to our charge. Peace will lift the heavy hand from all the departments of industry, and that which is now worthless will, by this alchemy, be changed into boundless wealth.

In 1856, the American party had absorbed the larger portion of the Whig party, and had gathered into its folds many who had previously been Democrats. In that section of the State in which General NOELL resided, the descendants of the old French settlers of St. Genevieve and Herculaneum constituted a very considerable element in the population, and to a large extent gave fashion and tone to society. Among these people are numbered many of the best citizens of Missouri. Possessing the usual vivacity and elegant manners of the French, they yet have a strong ancestral pride, and seem to feel as if their beneficence had contributed to the national greatness in the gift of the Mississippi and all the magnificent regions that lie on its sunset side. During the existence of the Whig party they were, almost without exception, Whigs. In religious belief they are Roman Catholics. In the fierce denunciations of the Catholic church by the American party, it aroused fears of persecution and estranged foreigners and Catholics, while it grew strong upon Protestant prejudice.

It was in the midst of this people that the deceased had lived since 1833. Among them he had been a farmer, a merchant's clerk, a merchant, a clerk of the courts, a lawyer, and a legislator. Among them he had married and reared a family. His wife, a most estimable and intelligent lady, was of French parentage, and a communicant of the Catholic church. Thus surrounded, he could not well sympathize with the new party. On the contrary, he entered warmly into the support of the Democratic candidates, State and national, and made many speeches during the canvass of marked ability and power. During the political discussions of 1856, the deceased acquired distinguished reputation as a debater, and laid the foundation for future usefulness to his country.

In 1858 he was elected to Congress from the district formerly represented by Samuel Caruthers, whose fast friend, personal and political, he had ever been. His constituents had become affected by the prevailing mania on the subject of railroads, and expected him to demand of Congress rich grants of land to aid in the construction of the Iron Mountain and the Cairo and Fulton roads. To have exerted himself in the procurement of such land grants was a sure passport at that time to popular favor; but such were his views of the Constitution and of public policy that he sternly resisted all measures of this character, declaring them unjust and corrupting in their tendencies.

In consequence of his course on this subject, and his opposition to specific duties on iron, he incurred the opposition not only of the masses, who saw riches in railroad improvements, but that of the iron-masters in his district, who knew that their interests would be best subserved by a protective policy.

Hence his canvass in 1860 was one in which prejudices had to be met and conquered. He addressed himself most fearlessly to the task, and the result was his return to Congress by a largely increased majority. In this canvass he supported Mr. Douglas for the Presidency, and denounced in fitting terms the disguised rebel organization under the lead of Mr. Breckinridge.

But the winter of 1860-61 was the period to try men's souls in Missouri, and, indeed, in all the slave States. The scenes of December, January, February, and March will never be effaced from the memory of those who witnessed the violent, the terrible political storm that then swept over the border States. Such I hope never again to witness; and yet, having witnessed it, I am now glad to have been in the midst of it, and to have known and felt its fury. I well remember with what intense anxiety we watched the course of every public man, and with what heartfelt enthusiasm we greeted every expression that came to our aid. The struggle with us was regarded as one of life or death. The parties, equally zealous and equally determined, each animated with a burning faith in the justice of its cause, rushed into the conflict, the one to maintain the Union, the other to destroy it.

During this period there was no conflict of arms, but a political conflict so earnest and so dreadful that none could err as to its ultimate end. The General Assembly, goaded on by southern emissaries and agents sent to the capital for that purpose, had become recreant to the trust reposed in them by their constituents. They daily indulged in bitter invective against the party coming into power, and spread before the people inflammatory appeals, that the pride and passion of the young might be excited. With equal cunning they addressed themselves to the fears of the more prudent, by the most exaggerated predictions of outrage to be perpetrated upon the rights of person and property. Supposing the public mind to be properly prepared for secession, they called a convention of the people to go through the formality of passing the act. Those who called it had no doubt of their success. The Union men, finding that they could not defeat the call of the convention, accepted it, and resolved to meet their opponents at the polls and vanquish them if possible. Our defeat was, even at that early day, regarded by us as tantamount to banishment and confiscation. Parties were dreadfully in earnest. At this critical moment of our affairs, the deceased addressed an able letter to his constituents, dated Washington, January 14, 1861, in which he examined and exposed the heresy of secession, and exhorted them to stand by the Union. In concluding, he said:

"If we cannot live in peace under our present Government, then I am not willing to risk any new confederation without knowing how or where we are to stand in it. For these reasons let Missouri prepare well for contingencies, stand cool and firm to act as her own honor and the happiness of her people demand. Above all, let us cling to the Union as long as one ray of hope remains that it may be saved! In giving utterance to these sentiments I know that I am braving the epidemic that has seized on the public mind in my own State; but I am ready to meet the consequences. I have no political ambition that could be gratified by place and power in a miserable little sectional confederacy or military despotism. My political existence is of no consequence whatever. I can only know that my country is in imminent peril, and I shall do all in my power to save it, without regard to consequences personal to myself. I know no political distinctions now but one 'for or against my country.' Democrats, Whigs, Know-Nothings are names that I now blot out from my memory. I shall strive to forget them until we get through this dark and stormy night."

This letter at once placed General NOELL high in the confidence of the struggling Union men of the State, and his subsequent course as a member of Congress gave new proofs of his fidelity.

A few days after I came to the Senate, in January, 1862, the President transmitted to Congress his proposition on the subject of emancipation in the border States. Several meetings of border State Representatives were held to consider it, and much discussion was had as to the probable effect of the measure on the Union sentiment of our respective States. At those meetings I had said nothing, nor had I heard General NOELL express his opinions. But when I found that my colleague in the Senate and all the members in the lower House from my State, except General BLAIR and General NOELL, would probably oppose it, I called on the deceased to urge him to the advocacy of the proposition before the people. I cannot forget the prompt manner in which he answered, "I have already made up my mind to advocate emancipation in Missouri, and we will act together." The condition of his district was such, however, that he could not visit many portions of it. His position was understood. He was again a candidate for Congress at the fall election in 1862, and on account of the votes he received the certificate of election; but his seat was contested by Colonel SCOTT, the present member from that district.

His course upon the slavery question estranged from him many of his old friends. The Union men of his district were not yet prepared to give up the institution, and those of rebellious proclivities always use it as a weapon of political warfare. Against him it was used with wonderful effect. He was charged with dividing the Union sentiment of the State by adopting the heresy that Unionism is identical with anti-slavery; that the States must be all free. He was not only politically ostracized in his new position, but he felt the chill of social banishment from genial homes where once he had been the idol of all.

On his return to Congress in December, 1862, I found him intensely anti-slavery, unwilling to compromise with the institution even for a few years. While he had been persecuted and hunted in a district where there were but few slaves, I had met with a more generous treatment among those who were the largest slaveholders of the State. I found a strong and growing sentiment in favor of emancipation, and increasing confidence in the good faith of the President and his advisers, while he was prevented by southern raiders from expressing his sentiments before a constituency he had served so well.

He felt that our only hope of peace consisted in striking down the institution, and the sooner it was destroyed the sooner peace and social reorganization would return. Owing to constitutional difficulties in the way of emancipation in our State, we did not agree as to the details of a bill. He introduced his bill into the House, and I offered one in the Senate.

He, I believe, is entitled to the credit of having offered the first measure ever proposed by a Representative from a slave State looking to practical emancipation.

Whether his memory shall be more dear in the future in consequence of the act, remains for posterity to settle. If emancipation of the black race in this country shall turn to be a curse, that curse will soon be felt. The hand of the Unseen has written the doom of slavery upon the wall of rebellious revelry, and the writing is already interpreted. The index, moved by the wheels of human thought and human action, begins to point to the hour on the dial of American civilization when the idol of slavery shall be crushed. God grant that the new period may give us the blessings of constitutional liberty, the freedom of speech, the freedom of the press, the freedom of conscience, and the freedom of men.

Mr. President, the remains of General NOELL now rest in one of the loveliest valleys of Missouri. From that valley rise up, like immense pyramids, the mountains of iron ore that are so widely known throughout the country. In their presence he spent his early manhood and his maturer age. As they stand in the rough elegance of nature, unsmoothed by the hand of art, so was the mind of NOELL—strong and vigorous in native power, but unsoftened by the charms of a classic education or the polish of early culture. As, of uncommonly exterior, they possess within unbounded wealth, so his powerful but unpolished mind was rich in nature's gifts, and his soul was full of kindness and charity. In the progress of time these huge mountains will be removed, and the plastic hand of civilization will mold them into new forms, to advance the comfort and happiness of man. Let us hope that the mystic influence that comes from the tomb of him who sleeps at their base will continue to animate the ardent and the generous in the work of man's amelioration.

Mr. SUMNER. The personal acquaintance which I had with Mr. NOELL was very slight. But I honored him much as a public servant who, at a critical moment, discovered clearly the path of duty and had the courage to tread it.

Born among slaves, and living always under the shadow of slavery, his character was not corrupted, nor was his judgment obscured. All of us, although born among freemen and living far away from that influence which has so unhappily disturbed our country, might take counsel from his intelligent alacrity. While others hesitated he was prompt. While others surrendered to procrastination, he grappled at once with the giant evil. Such a man was exceptional, and now that he is dead he deserves exceptional honors.

There are men in history who by a single effort fix the public attention. A member of Parliament in the last century was known as "Single-speech Hamilton." Others have become famous from the support of a single measure. Perhaps Mr. NOELL may find a place in this class. But no "Single-speech Hamilton" could claim the homage which belongs to him.

There have been many in Congress from the slave States, but he was the first in our history who was inspired to bring in a bill for the abolition of slavery in a State. Rejecting the palpable sophistries by which it was sought to postpone an act of unquestionable justice, and discarding the idea that wrong was to be dealt with tardily, gradually, or prospectively, he proposed immediate emancipation. Let it be spoken in his favor. Let it be carved on his tombstone. His bill passed the House. It was lost in the Senate. But it was not lost to his fame. He died without beholding the fulfillment of his desires; but the cause with which his name is associated cannot die.

Among the human benefactors of Missouri, so rich in natural resources, he must always be numbered, and his memory will be appreciated there just in proportion as men discern what contributes most to the wealth, the character, and the true nobility of a State. And hereafter, when the present conflict is ended and peace once more blesses our wide-spread land, he will be mentioned gratefully with those who saw truly how this blessing was to be secured, and bravely strove to secure it. Better in that day to have been a doorkeeper in the house of freedom than a dweller in the tents of the ungodly; and what ungodliness can compare with the ungodliness of slavery, whether in the lash of the taskmaster or in the speech of its apologist?

The resolutions were adopted nem. con., and the Senate adjourned.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the law on that subject.

The Clerk read, as follows:

"All motions to print extra copies of any bill, report, or other document, shall be referred to the members of the Committee on Printing from the House in which the same may be made."

The SPEAKER. Under the law, as soon as a resolution is offered in order for the printing of additional copies of any document it must go to the Committee on Printing. The resolution will therefore be so referred.

SHORT RATIONS.

Mr. ARNOLD introduced a joint resolution providing for the payment to soldiers in the field the value of short rations; which was read a first and second time.

The joint resolution was read in full, as follows:

Resolved, Sec., That the act of Congress of August 3, 1861, providing that when the enumerated articles composing the ration cannot be furnished in the quantity provided, and when an equivalent in value in some other food cannot be issued, then in such case the equivalent in value shall be placed to the credit of the soldier; so that when short rations are issued the value of such deficiency shall be placed to the credit of the soldier receiving the same, and be paid to him with his wages, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The resolution was adopted.

PAY OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. MORRISON submitted the following resolution, and demanded the previous question on its adoption:

Resolved, That the men who periled their lives in, as the Chief Executive in his recent message declares, "many conflicts on both land and sea with varying results," and when, he further says, "hope and fear and doubt contended in uncertain conflict," are no less meritorious than are they who voluntarily enter the military service now, when, he tells us, "the crisis which threatened to divide the friends of the Union is past;" nor are the sacrifices made and services rendered by the former in time of their country's greatest need entitled to a less compensation; that, therefore, the Committee on Military Affairs are instructed to inquire what legislation is necessary to secure to those who voluntarily entered the service under any former call for the troops the same pay, allowance, and bounty which is now offered and paid to those who enlist under the last call for voluntary enlistments; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

INTERCOURSE WITH INSURRECTIONARY STATES.

Mr. BLAIR, of Missouri, introduced the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Resolved, That a special committee be appointed by the Speaker of the House, to consist of five members, with authority to inquire into and report upon the practical operation and results of the act of Congress regulating commercial intercourse with the States declared to be in insurrection against the authority of the Government, and whether the regulations of the Treasury Department which purport to have been made in pursuance of said act, as carried out by the Department, comply with its design. To examine particularly and report upon the manner in which said act has been executed, and whether any frauds have been practiced on the Government by the officers or agents employed under said act, and whether any favoritism to individuals or localities has been shown in its execution; and to inquire further whether the effect of said act and of the said regulations of the Treasury Department has been to prevent supplies from reaching the rebels or to facilitate the object. That said committee have power to send for persons and papers and to employ a clerk, with the usual amount of compensation, for the purpose of reducing to writing all testimony taken by said committee.

Mr. ELIOT. I move the reference of that resolution to the Committee on Commerce.

The SPEAKER. That is not in order; the previous question having been called.

Mr. ASHLEY. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The call for the previous question cuts off debate.

On seconding the call for the previous question, on a division there were—ayes 44, noes 63.

Mr. HOLMAN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAIR, of Missouri, and ASHLEY, were appointed.

The previous question was not seconded; the tellers having reported—ayes 60, noes 64.

Mr. ASHLEY. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. It goes over, then, under the rules.

NATIONAL ARMORY.

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be requested to inquire into the necessity of providing for the removal of said Indians at an early day; and report by bill or otherwise.

SURVEYOR GENERAL OF IOWA, ETC.

Mr. MCINDOE also introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Whereas the surveys in the surveyor general's district comprising the States of Iowa and Wisconsin are nearly completed: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be requested to inquire into the expediency of providing for the surveys in said district with the view of discontinuing the office; and report by bill or otherwise.

CONSCRIPTION.

Mr. ELDRIDGE submitted the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas all conscription of other forced service of the citizen to the State is contrary to the genius and principles of a republican government and opposed to the principles of self-government, which is the true basis of the American Republic; and whereas the laws for conscripting or drafting citizens into the military service of the United States have thus far proved, if not an entire failure, at least ineffectual for the supplying to the Government the necessary number of men requisite for the military service in putting down the rebellion; and whereas the principles of equity and justice require in a Government like ours, founded on the will of the majority, that the burdens of maintaining and preserving it should fall alike and equally upon all and every of the citizens, the rich as well as the poor, in proportion to their ability to bear the same; and whereas the military is a profession to which men are called as well from the inducements of personal gain and family advantage as from motives of patriotism and hopes of future fame: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to examine and inquire immediately into the propriety and expediency of repealing or suspending, so far as any future or further draft is concerned, all acts and parts of acts authorizing or empowering the conscripting or drafting of, or in any way forcing the citizen into the military service of the country, either in putting down rebellion or otherwise, and in lieu thereof providing by law for and authorizing the President of the United States from time to time, and as he may deem it expedient and necessary, to offer the payment of such sum or sums of money for volunteers in bounties or monthly payments, or otherwise, as may be best to induce enlistments and secure such moneys to the soldier and his family, and as will secure just so many and just such men as may be requisite or necessary to put down the rebellion and restore the supremacy of the Constitution; and that said committee do report by bill.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the resolution be laid upon the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE demanded the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 42; as follows:

During the vote,

Mr. STEELE, of New York, stated that his colleague, Mr. STEBBINS, was detained from the House by illness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

ENLISTMENT OF COLORED PERSONS.

Mr. GRINNELL introduced the following resolution, on which he demanded the previous question:

Whereas the war policy of the Government having brought into the military service as soldiers and laborers free colored men and persons claimed to be held by rebels, who have rendered invaluable service to the Army; and whereas the more extended employment and enlistment of colored persons will be a relief to our northern soldiers, unaccustomed and unused to manual labor, and lessen the number to be taken from their homes and from the industrial pursuits in the Union States where there is now an unusual demand for labor: Therefore,

Resolved, That a more vigorous policy to enlist at an early day and in larger numbers in our Army persons of African descent would meet the approbation of this House.

Mr. STILES. I move to lay the preamble and resolution on the table.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 63.

Mr. STILES. I propose to debate the resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has demanded the previous question.

Mr. STILES. Then I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the resolution on the table.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 50, nays 75; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Ancona, Augustus C. Baldwin, Bliss, Chauley, Clay, Cravens, Henry Winter Davis, Dawson, Dennison, Eden, Edgerton, Eldridge, Finck, Ganson, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Harrington, Benjamin G. So the resolution was not laid on the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. ASHLEY stated that Mr. LOVEJOY was quite unwell, and confined to his room in consequence thereof.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. HARRINGTON called for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was put; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 80, nays 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ames, Arnold, Ashley, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boutwell, Boyd, Brandegee, Broomall, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. So the resolution was adopted.

The question recurring on the adoption of the preamble,

Mr. GRINNELL demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the preamble was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL moved to reconsider the votes by which the resolution and preamble were severally agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President, by Mr. NICOLAY, his Private Secretary, announced that he did, on the 29th ultimo, approve and sign an act (H. R. No. 33) making appropriations for the payment of invalid and other pensions of the United States for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Then I call for the regular order of business.

GRADE OF LIEUTENANT GENERAL.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 26) reviving the grade of lieutenant general in the United States Army, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, and postponed until to-day after the morning hour. The first question is on the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs.

The original resolution was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the grade of lieutenant general be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the Army, to be selected, during war, from among those officers, not below the grade of major general, of the regular Army or of volunteers most distinguished by courage, skill, and genius in their profession, and who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, may be authorized to command the armies of the United States.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lieutenant general, appointed as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff specified in the fifth section of the act approved May 28, 1798; and also to the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August 23, 1842, granting additional rations to certain officers.

The amendment in the nature of a substitute, recommended by the committee, was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the grade of lieutenant general be, and the same is hereby, revived in the Army of the United States; and the President is hereby authorized, whenever he shall deem it expedient, to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, a commander of the Army, to be selected, during war, from among those officers in the military service of the United States, not below the grade of major general, most distinguished for courage, skill, and ability; and who, being commissioned as lieutenant general, shall be authorized, under the direction of the President, to command the armies of the United States.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the lieutenant general appointed as hereinbefore provided, shall be entitled to the pay, allowances, and staff specified in the fifth section of the act approved May 28, 1793; and also the allowances described in the sixth section of the act approved August 23, 1842, granting additional rations to certain officers: Provided, That nothing in this bill contained shall be construed in any way to affect the rank, pay, or allowances of Winfield Scott, lieutenant general by brevet, now on the retired list of the Army.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I hope the House will pass this bill this morning. It has been printed, and I presume members of the House have it before them. It is very brief. The grade of lieutenant general was first provided for in 1793, but the act was repealed the following year. It was again revived in February, 1855, and the rank was conferred upon Major General Scott.

By the act of Congress of August 3, 1861, providing for the retirement of certain officers who had served a long time, it was provided that should the lieutenant general be retired by virtue of the provisions of that act, it should be with whole pay and allowance. On the 1st of November, 1861, Lieutenant General Scott, by his own request, was retired. Now, this act simply provides for reviving the grade, and authorizes the President, whenever he shall deem fit and proper so to do, to confer the rank of lieutenant general upon the most deserving officer, not below the grade of major general, either in the regular or volunteer forces, who, when commissioned, shall be entitled to command the armies of the United States.

I hope that the House, as I said before, will be willing to pass this bill this morning. I do not propose to make any extended remarks upon it. I think the propriety of the bill addresses itself to the judgment and good sense of every member. I call for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to say a word upon this subject.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I withdraw the previous question, and yield to my colleague on the Military Committee.

Mr. GARFIELD. I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, to be compelled to differ with my brother members of the Committee on Military Affairs; but in behalf of a small minority of that committee, who were opposed to this bill, I will state in a word the grounds of opposition.

In the first place, we have already a law providing for a General-in-Chief of the Army, and there is nothing that a lieutenant general can do for the service that a General-in-Chief cannot do precisely as well. The President has already full power to select any major general from the regular or volunteer service to serve as General-in-Chief. Therefore this resolution does not arm the President with any power that he does not already possess, so far as the necessities of the military service are concerned.

In the second place, if this resolution be intended to confer an honor, as a prize for great services, for distinguished merits, I argue against its propriety at this time when the great race for the prizes of the war is not yet ended. It seems to me improper at this stage of the war to determine and award the greatest prize of the war in the way of military preferment to any one of the distinguished generals of the Army. It would be far more fitting for us to wait until the war is decided, and see whose head towers above all others in the Army, and then give it as a crown to the one who rises highest.

Suppose this bill had been passed, and the appointment had been made two years ago to-day, who would have been the appointee? Six months later, perhaps, another man would have been appointed; and six months later still another would have won the honor. I venture to say that if this bill had been passed heretofore, at four different periods of the war, we should have had at each period different men for lieutenant generals. The scale on which generals stand in the estimation of the public, and of the War Department, is a sliding and shifting scale. Fortune and the accidents of war exalt a general to-day and cast him down to-morrow, and I deem it unwise and impolitic to decide the great prize at a period which may be the very middle of the war.

In the next place—and I have only one other consideration to offer—we all know, I presume, toward what distinguished general this resolution points; a man whose head towers high to-day, and no doubt justly so, before the American people; but I ask the members of this House if it be wise, in view of the great wants of our western army, to recall that man from his active duties in the field and make him a bureau officer in Washington? I ask gentlemen if it would not be an act of the highest impolicy, an act of the greatest danger to the interests of the Army and of the country in this war, to call off a man who is distinguished as a leader of armies and make him a mere bureau officer of the War Department?

I know it may be said that it is not necessary that he should be called away from the field; I know it may be said that the President is not compelled to make this appointment at once; but I ask you if it is wise for you to open the race and let a pressure be brought upon the President from this time until he shall make the appointment, friends here and friends there each pressing his own particular favorite for the place? Even if a lieutenant general should keep the field he could command but one army at a time.

I say, therefore, without saying a word against any general, but with the kindest feelings toward all who may be candidates for this high office, that this measure is uncalled for, that the interests of the service do not require it, and that justice to the man who shall prove himself to be first when the war is over requires that we do not open the question now or allow it to be decided.

I shall, therefore, vote against the resolution.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the argument of my colleague of the Committee on Military Affairs who has just taken his seat is a twofold argument. I understand his first argument to be that the war has not progressed far enough and that we have not given our generals in the field a sufficient term of trial to enable the President to select with proper judgment a man upon whom to confer the rank of lieutenant general.

His second argument is that the general toward whom this legislation is directed is so great and so successful a general that it would be dangerous to take him from the field and put him in command of the entire Army of the United States.

In answer to the first branch of the gentleman's argument I have only this to say: we are now very near to the close of the third year of this war, and while it is true that many generals in the Army may be up to-day and down to-morrow, and that their fortunes fluctuate, it is not true of the general to whom this legislation applies. His star has been steadily rising. He has been growing greater and greater day by day, rising from an obscure position, scarcely known out of the county in which he resided. By his masterly ability he now stands, without saying anything to the disparagement of other generals, head and shoulders over every other general in the Army of the United States. He has been tried, tried long enough; and if his star were to go down to-morrow he has still done enough to entitle him to this prize which the gentleman from Ohio speaks of.

In respect to the last branch of the gentleman's argument—that it is not safe to take this general from the field—I have only this to say: he is no carpet knight, and it does not follow necessarily that because an officer is placed in command of all the armies of the United States he is therefore to keep an office in the second or third story of a building in Washington, whence he is to issue his orders. I expect that the man who will be selected, in pursuance of this act, to command the armies of the United States will command them, and that in the field. Wherever his presence is most needed there I expect he will be. When General Scott was commander of the Army of the United States he did not place himself in the city of Washington and issue his orders in time of war. He took the field, and put himself at the head of the largest corps. He commanded in the field, not in the city of Washington. That I expect will be done by whoever will be selected by the President of the United States.

As to the argument of the gentleman that it would not do to withdraw a man from active command and make him a bureau officer, it would apply as well in time of peace as in time of war. In time of peace we prepare for war, and whenever war takes place, then, according to the argument of the gentleman, the law would have to be repealed, and the lieutenant general sent immediately to the front.

Mr. SPALDING. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether this bill contemplates that whoever shall be appointed lieutenant general shall take the actual command of the armies of the United States, and the present commander be displaced? If so, I will vote for it.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. It does. It provides that whenever a lieutenant general is commissioned he shall be entitled to command the Army of the United States.

Mr. ROSS. I desire to offer an amendment respectfully recommending the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant as lieutenant general.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The amendment is not in order. The Congress of the United States has not the appointing power.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Speaker, as it is my purpose to vote for this bill reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, I am constrained to say a word because of what has been said by my friend from Illinois—my colleague on the committee. I shall vote for it on the simple, abstract ground that in the organization of the Army, for the purpose of conducting and commanding the armies of the United States, I think it proper that there shall be an officer of the rank of lieutenant general. I prefer that to having an officer detailed, to be called General-in-Chief; but I say here now that in giving that vote I desire to be understood as not instructing the President, as not voting for a resolution that has been characterized as pointing to a particular man. I am not willing to take any part of the responsibility of the selection of the man. I believe that that properly belongs to the Executive, and with him I would leave it. It is because of this difficulty about the man alone that I have found it hard to come to a conclusion to support the bill at all. I am well aware that if we look back through even the short history of the war we will see that if some eighteen months ago the Executive of the country had been left to select a lieutenant general to command all the armies of the United States he would probably have taken General McClellan. At a later period, just after the battle of Gettysburg, for instance, it would probably have been General Meade. At any time during his successes in the Southwest it would probably have been General Rosecrans. Now, the probability is, and indeed gentlemen look upon it as a matter of course, that General Grant will be selected. I am unwilling to enter into these personal considerations at all. I shall vote for this bill simply on the ground that in conceding to it my support I express the opinion that it is best for the organization of the Army in its most efficient character that such an office should exist. But I do not give that vote as an instruction to any person, leaving to the President of the United States his own proper responsibility to be exercised according to his best judgment, and as he shall answer for the exercise of that judgment and responsibility to the country.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask the previous question on the bill and amendments.

The previous question was not seconded.

Mr. BOYD. I desire to say that I want to inquire into the resolution now before this House.

If it is actually necessary in the judgment of this House that a lieutenant general shall be appointed, I am ready to vote to authorize the appointment of one; but I want to know, and I want this House to understand, whether by this resolution it is intended to appoint a man who shall take the place of General Halleck as commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States, and that General Halleck shall be thrown out of his office? If General Halleck is to be superseded after having remained in office for eighteen months without performing any active service [laughter] I want to know it. If gentlemen want to try some other man, let them try him. If my friend, General GARFIELD, wants to try General Grant, let them try him. I am for General Ulysses S. Grant.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must remind the gentleman that it is not in order to call members by name.

Mr. BOYD. I have not another word to say.

Mr. ROSS. I desire now to offer my amendment.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I demand the previous question.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Does the gentleman want to speak on this bill?

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to be heard for about five minutes.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I will yield for that purpose, and then I hope the gentleman will go with me for the previous question. I desire that the House will come to a vote upon this question. I presume the House does not desire to hear discussion upon it. A special order has been set for a later hour in the day, and I trust this matter will be disposed of before that comes up. I have no desire, however, to cut off discussion, and if the gentleman from Pennsylvania desires to be heard I will yield the floor to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. Ross] is entitled to the floor. The Chair has recognized no call for the previous question.

Mr. ROSS. I submit the following amendment:

And that we respectfully recommend the appointment of Major General U. S. Grant for the position of lieutenant general.

I understand that my colleague desires that amendment to come in.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. My colleague's amendment is now in, and a vote will be taken on it.

Mr. STEVENS. I have one word to say, as I intend to vote against the bill, and desire that it shall be disposed of as expeditiously as possible.

In the first place, I can see no use in it. By the law, as it now stands, the President has the right to appoint any man he chooses as commander-in-chief of the Army—I mean any man of proper grade. If the present General-in-Chief does not discharge the duties of his office satisfactorily, the President has full power, and has had for the past two years, to appoint another in his place. There is, therefore, no necessity for this bill, unless it is proposed to censure the President by it for not doing that. Well, sir, whatever I may think of General Halleck and of the propriety of appointing another man in his place, I am not willing in this way to censure the President for his course. That is my first reason.

In the next place, I desire to know why it is, if a lieutenant general is to be appointed to manage the affairs of the Army during this war, that the choice of the President is limited to the grade of major generals of the Army? If there are other men of a lower grade who are superior in the opinion of the President to all the major generals, give him an opportunity to select from all the officers the one he may deem most meritorious. Nay, sir, if there is a man in civil life, who from his great capacity, his intellect and his power, may be more fit in the opinion of the President than any man in the Army, let the President select him.

When this question was agitated many years ago in Congress, it was supposed a man would have been selected by General Jackson from civil life if the law had been passed; and as a matter of principle I see no impropriety in giving the President the power to select from any profession the man he may deem the most fit. I do not think that it is proper. If it is intended merely as an honor, I am willing to vote any resolution of thanks to any general, successful or unsuccessful, who has fought patriotically during this war. If it is intended simply as an act of honor, as was done with General Scott, who had only a brevet rank, nothing else, as a mark of distinction, carrying with it no emoluments, I am willing to vote it. But I think that we had better wait before we decorate this hero until this war is over. It did not use to be the fashion to canonize saints until they were dead. That was the old fashion. Therefore, otherwise than as a matter of honor, I am not prepared to vote for it. I think as highly of the general pointed out by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] I think as highly of him as a military man as any other member, and I feel as grateful to him; but I know very well that the reputation of a general depends upon his success. The loss of a battle is often the loss of reputation, sometimes, perhaps, without justice. But whether justly or not, it is always so. Let us wait a little.

Now, Mr. Speaker, as the President has the right to appoint anybody else than the present General-in-Chief now at the head of that department, I confess that I am entirely satisfied when the President shall appoint somebody else. I am not quite sure from the pertinacity with which the President sticks to the General-in-Chief he would not appoint him lieutenant general. There is some danger of it.

Mr. PRUYN. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to assert that the President has the power now, without a new statute, to appoint a lieutenant general?

Mr. STEVENS. No, sir; but he has the power to designate who shall be the commander-in-chief of the Army. The gentleman will recollect that we passed a law at the last Congress granting power to the President to appoint any general of the same grade or same rank, without reference to the date of commission, to command all the others. That is the law now.

Mr. PRUYN. I understand that this bill declares that the grade of lieutenant general is hereby established.

Mr. STEVENS. Revived.

Mr. PRUYN. Yes, sir, revived. As I understand it, that grade exists in the person of General Scott.

Mr. STEVENS. As a brevet rank.

Mr. PRUYN. Brevet rank only?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. PRUYN. Perhaps the gentleman can answer another question, which I ought to ask of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. It appears that the original bill uses the word "may," and the substitute the word "shall." Is it intended that it shall be imperative upon the President to make this appointment?

Mr. SCHENCK. It makes it imperative.

Mr. STEVENS. As I read it, the President, if Congress passes this law, must consider himself as instructed to make the appointment. It is hardly proper for me to declare how this act should be construed, if it shall be passed. Any gentleman can construe it as well as I can.

Mr. GARFIELD. I will answer the gentleman from New York. The portion of the bill to which the gentleman refers does not provide for the appointment, but that when appointed he shall be authorized to act.

Mr. STEVENS. When Congress authorizes the President to do a thing, it expects him to do it. I recollect that in Pennsylvania a long time ago the law said that the Governor may remove. It was contended and always construed that that meant the Governor should remove in a certain contingency. One stubborn Governor said that may meant shall, and so construed it. And so will the President understand this law.

Mr. ALLISON. The first section provides that he shall appoint, "if he deems it expedient."

Mr. STEVENS. I do not say that we would impeach the President if he did not appoint; but his understanding would be that we want a lieutenant general, and that he ought to appoint one. That is the fair construction.

Mr. GARFIELD. The result would be that a lieutenant general would be appointed.

Mr. STEVENS. Therefore, while I say again that I have no hostility to any member of the military corps or any general of the Army, I cannot vote for this bill. The President has sufficient power already for the necessities of the country. I will not censure the President by voting for this bill. I do not suppose that he would take my opinion even if I were disposed to give it. While I might desire to have a change in the General-in-Chief, I am not disposed to legislate for it.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The point which the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes is that the President has the power under existing laws to appoint a General-in-Chief without regard to his rank.

Mr. STEVENS. There were five major generals whose commissions were differently dated, and I made the point that the President had the right, under the law, to appoint either of them as General-in-Chief.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That is true; but the passage of this act would repeal that law. I think that there can be no doubt of that; and when the lieutenant general shall be appointed he will command the armies of the United States, in subordination to the President of the United States as Commander-in-Chief under the Constitution.

I had not intended to submit any remarks on this bill. I have made no preparation whatever to speak to its merits; and if I had I should be unable to do so on account of the present state of my health. No subject of less importance than this, no bill in which I felt a less degree of interest, could have brought me to the House today. I had not looked for the opposition to the bill which has been manifested. The bill having been printed, and its provisions being very simple and easy of comprehension, I supposed we should have come to a vote without extended debate, as every member of the House had undoubtedly made up his mind as to how he would vote on the question.

The proposition is to revive the grade of lieutenant general for the purpose of conferring it not only for the recognition of distinguished and exceptional services already rendered to the country, but for the practical purpose of investing full command of the Army in the party receiving the appointment, in subordination, of course, to the Commander-in-Chief under the Constitution. I do not propose to enter upon the reasons which I supposed would control the House in passing this bill. Those reasons must suggest themselves to all men who love our country and the flag. They spring from the admiration which a great and magnanimous people must ever feel for deeds of heroism and for public service of untold value, and for which no reward can be esteemed too great. The question has been raised as to who will be appointed under the bill in the event of its passage. I take it there is no gentleman upon this floor who has really any doubt upon whom this appointment will be conferred. Under the language of the bill, referring to most eminent and distinguished service, I think one individual, and one individual alone, is pointed out so distinctly that no man can misunderstand.

A great deal has been said as to what might have happened if some such bill had passed two years ago; that such or such a man might have received the honor, and implying that the party upon whom the honor may be conferred under this bill may prove himself unworthy. How much, I would ask, is now to be required of a general before he can have the confidence of this House? Has not General Grant earned that confidence and proved himself worthy of full trust in the greatest positions? I demand to know what would have been our position as a nation in the present struggle had it not been for the achievements of General Grant? Where can you point to a series of greater triumphs than he has achieved, a more complete succession of victories, which are unsurpassed in history, and which for the brilliancy of their achievement, and in furtherance of the great cause in which he has so nobly fought, have made his name and his fame as lasting as the history of the nation?

I have spoken of the interest I feel in this bill, but if I know myself it is a feeling that rises far above the considerations of personal friendship which I entertain for the distinguished soldier whose name has been connected with it. I am not here to speak for General Grant. No man with his consent has ever mentioned his name in connection with any position. I say what I know to be true when I allege that every promotion he has received since he first entered the service to put down this rebellion was moved without his knowledge or consent; and in regard to this very matter of lieutenant general, after the bill was introduced and his name mentioned in connection therewith, he wrote me and admonished me that he had been highly honored already by the Government, and did not ask or deserve anything more in the shape of honors or promotion; and that a success over the enemy was what he craved above everything else; that he only desired to hold such an influence over those under his command as to use them to the best advantage to secure that end. Such is the language of this patriotic and single-minded soldier, ambitious only of serving his country and doing his whole duty. Sir, whatever this House may do, the country will do justice to General Grant. We can see that. I think I can appreciate that myself.

After the battle of Shiloh, a little less than two years ago, a wave of calumny and detraction swept over General Grant with a power that would have overwhelmed any man of less strength and courage. My neighbor and my friend, appointed upon my own recommendation, I sought in my place on this floor the earliest occasion to tell the country something of this general, denunciations of whom were ringing from one end of the country to the other. I believe I can say I scarcely had the sympathy of a single member on this floor in making that speech, which was only regarded as a somewhat extravagant defense of a friend. Willing to take the responsibility of standing by my record then, I now appeal to history for my justification, and ask if General Grant has not far transcended everything that I claimed for him.

It cannot certainly, Mr. Speaker, be necessary for me to enter into any detail of the services of General Grant to the country. They are as familiar as household words to our constituents, if not to us here. Why necessary to recount that long list of triumphs and of victories from Belmont to Lookout Mountain? Look at what this man has done for his country, for humanity and civilization—this modest and unpretending general whom gentlemen appear to be so much afraid of. He has fought more battles and won more victories than any man living; he has captured more prisoners and taken more guns than any general of modern times. To us in the great valley of the West he has rendered a service in opening our great channel of communication to the ocean, so that the great Father of Waters now goes "unvexed to the sea," which endears him to all our hearts. Sir, when his blue legions crowned the crests of Vicksburg, and the hosts of rebellion laid their arms at the feet of this great conqueror, the rebel confederacy was cut in twain and the backbone of the rebellion broken.

I speak of the fall of Vicksburg. I might speak of what went before. It was my good fortune to be with General Grant and with that noble army, every man of whom is a hero, at the commencement of the expedition which culminated in the taking of Vicksburg. We all know how ill at ease the public mind was last winter pending General Grant's operations on the lower Mississippi. The expedition by Grenada, the opening of the canal, the opening of the bayous, had not succeeded. The country saw all the attempts to flank that stronghold likely to prove abortive, and there was great anxiety. But, with unshaken confidence in himself, General Grant pursued the even tenor of his way, and with entire reliance upon his success in the plan finally adopted, and which could not be undertaken until the river and bayous should sufficiently recede to enable him to move. Then, sir, was seen that bold and daring conception which I say is without parallel in all military history. It was to send his army and his transportation by land on the Louisiana side from Milliken's Bend to a point below Vicksburg, and then run the frowning batteries of that rebel Gibraltar, with its hundreds of guns, with his transports, and thus enable him to cross the river below Vicksburg, and get on to the Mississippi side. The country was startled at the success which attended the running of those batteries by the frail Mississippi steamboats used as transports, and the rebels stood aghast when they saw seven or eight transports and all of Porter's gunboats below Vicksburg.

There was something in this matter of running those batteries by the transports which deserves more than a passing notice, as showing the indomitable spirit and courage of that magnificent army. Certain boats were detailed for the extraordinary and hazardous service of running the batteries, but, with one exception, the crews of all the boats refused to go. The provost marshal was then ordered to beat up for volunteers. No sooner was the notice given than soldiers rushed in for the service, and at once many times the number that was called for was filled—pilots, engineers, firemen, deck-hands, in the greatest numbers offered themselves. From one regiment, known as the Lead Mine regiment, raised in my own section, no less than one hundred and sixteen men and sixteen commissioned officers volunteered for that dangerous yet glorious service. The consequence of all this was that resort was had to lot as to who should have the privilege of risking life in that unparalleled adventure. One noble boy from my own city who had drawn the prize was offered $100 in greenbacks for his chance, which he refused to take, but courageously held on and successfully passed not only the Vicksburg but the Grand Gulf batteries. What language can do justice to an army animated by such a spirit? What triumphs and what glories might not justly be expected from it?

The transports and gunboats below the batteries, the army reaches by land marches Perkins's plantation, twenty miles above, and Hard Times landing, nearly opposite Grand Gulf. It was supposed that Admiral Porter, who always seconded General Grant with a zeal equal to his courage and ability, could reduce the batteries at Grand Gulf, after which the troops were to be crossed over in the transports, and were to land and carry the place by assault. But after five hours and a half of the most desperate naval fighting ever seen upon this continent, the brave Porter drew off his shattered fleet, unable to effect a reduction of the principal battery. During all of this time the army had been waiting with intense impatience for the time to come when the guns of the batteries should be silenced and they could land, and great was the disappointment when it was known that the fleet had failed to reduce the works. It seemed then that all had miscarried, and that the expedition on which so many hopes hung would be a failure.

At that moment was seen in General Grant that greatest of all gifts of a military man—the gift of deciding instantly amid the pressure of the greatest emergencies. I was with him when Porter reported his inability to reduce the batteries, and in an instant he made his new dispositions, and gave his orders. They were to debark all his troops, and march them down three miles below Grand Gulf, "and," said he, "after nightfall I will run every transport I have below their batteries, and not one shall be injured." And sure enough, when it became dark, Porter again attacked the batteries with his fleet, and amid the din and clatter of the attack, the transports all safely passed Grand Gulf. And, sir, it was a noble sight as this grand army was about to bivouac at Disharoon landing, three miles below Grand Gulf, with their camp fires burning brightly on that soft April night, when these transports, one by one, escaping all serious injury from the terrific tempest through which they had passed, rounded to, responding to eager inquiries "All is well," and which was followed by such a shout as our brave and patriotic soldiers only can give.

Early the next morning this whole army was again embarked on board the gunboats and transports, bound down the Mississippi "for Cowes and a market," for some place where a landing could be made on solid ground on the Mississippi side. And that was a proud spectacle when the grim old iron-clad Benton, the flag-ship of Admiral Porter, on which was General Grant, led the way down the river, the entire fleet and the transports following. She landed at a dilapidated plantation called Bruinsburg, and General Grant was the first man to go ashore to seek information. He there met a loyal "American citizen of African descent," who gave him trustworthy information in regard to the country and the roads into the interior. Instantly the debarkation of the troops commenced, and the line of march taken up toward Port Gibson. Before two o'clock the next morning, May 1, 1863, the enemy was encountered, and the battle of Port Gibson, the first of the series resulting in the capture of Vicksburg, was fought during that whole day, finally resulting in the complete rout of the enemy.

And that which must ever be regarded by the historian as the most extraordinary feature of this campaign is the astounding fact that when General Grant landed in the State of Mississippi and made his campaign in the enemy's country, he had a smaller force than the enemy. There he was, in the enemy's country, cut off in a measure from his supplies, with a great river in his rear, and in one of the most defensible of countries, through which he had to pass. To his indomitable courage and energy, to his unparalleled celerity of movement, striking the enemy in detail, and beating him on every field, is the country indebted to those wonderful successes of that campaign which have not only challenged the gratitude and admiration of our own countrymen, but the admiration of the best military men of all nations. My colleague [Mr. FARNSWORTH] has well said that General Grant is no "carpet knight." If gentlemen could know him as I know him, and as his soldiers know him, they would not be so reluctant about conferring this honor. If they could have seen him as I saw him on that expedition; if they could have witnessed his terrible earnestness, his devotion to his duty, his care, his vigilance, and his unchallenged courage, I think their opposition to this bill would give way.

When he left his headquarters at "Smith's plantation," below Vicksburg, to enter on that great campaign, he did not take with him the trappings and paraphernalia so common to many military men. As all depended on quickness of movement, and as it was important to be incumbered with as little baggage as possible, he set an example to all under him. He took with him neither a horse, nor an orderly, nor a servant, a camp chest, an overcoat, nor a blanket, nor even a clean shirt. His entire baggage for six days—I was with him at that time—was a tooth brush. He fared like the commonest soldier in his command, partaking of his rations and sleeping upon the ground, with no covering excepting the canopy of heaven. How could such a soldier fail to inspire confidence in an army, and to lead it to victory and to glory? Confer upon him the rank contemplated by this bill, and you excite the enthusiasm of all your armies, and all your soldiers will be eager to follow his victorious banners.

But, gentlemen say, wait and confer this rank when the war is over. Sir, I want it conferred now, because it is my most solemn and earnest conviction that General Grant is the man upon whom we must depend to fight out this rebellion in the field, and bring this war to a speedy and triumphant close. It is said that he will have to leave his army if this rank is conferred upon him and come to Washington. Let me say to gentlemen that they need have no uneasiness upon that score. General Grant, if this appointment shall be conferred upon him, will never leave the field, but he will be with his army wherever his presence is most needed; he will be with his soldiers to lead them on in this gigantic struggle to preserve our God-given Government, in which he, in common with all loyal men, have so great an interest.

Mr. WHALEY. I would inquire of the gentleman from Illinois whether the appointment of General Grant to the rank of lieutenant general would have the slightest tendency to deprive him of the privilege and honor of becoming a candidate for the next Presidency?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to go into any political considerations. I profess, in my action, so far as regards this question, to have been influenced by the highest considerations of public duty. I cannot conceive why gentlemen upon this side of the House should be so sensitive in reference to the conferring of this rank. I do not understand why they are so unwilling to come to a vote. I believe that upon this question there is but little difference of opinion among the great people of this country who are to control its destinies, and who want this war closed and this hideous rebellion suppressed at the earliest moment. Gentlemen may sit here in their seats and refuse to second the demand for the previous question, so that their record may not be known, but I tell them that there will be a record made hereafter. The people of this country now want a fighting and a successful general to lead their armies. They want a man who is willing to risk his own life upon the field. They have seen General Grant successful in every fight from Belmont to Lookout Mountain, and they now wish to see him marshal our whole armies and strike the last, greatest, and most deadly blow at the rebellion.

Mr. Speaker, I might go on much further, but I have extended my remarks far beyond what I intended when I took the floor. I want the House to come to a vote, and shall insist upon my motion for the previous question.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, I accord in the full measure of praise that has been bestowed on General Grant. There is not a man in all the nation for whom I feel more respect or a deeper regard. But the war is not yet ended. Other battles are to be fought; and some gentlemen on this side of the House doubt the expediency of passing this bill at the present time. We believe it to be more prudent, more wise, for the President to delay the appointment for some three or six months longer, so as to enable the major generals already in the field, and such as may be put into the field, to compete for this high honor. I am very glad, Mr. Speaker, that the bill has been introduced, because I believe it will be an occasion of emulation among the commanders in the field, through which this Republic may be enabled to have her own again, and be highly benefited.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, my friend from Connecticut says the war is not yet ended. It is not yet ended; and I tell my friend that I believe it never will be ended unless we place a fighting general in the command of the armies. That is what is the matter.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, I object to this bill as it stands, because I think it at once creates a partisan feeling in the country and disorganizes the Army, and not because I am opposed to the appointment of General Grant to the office of lieutenant general when the war is ended. If the motion for the previous question shall not be sustained, and if the amendment shall be rejected or adopted, I wish to propose an amendment by which the President shall be authorized to confer this office on such person as he sees fit, with the advice and consent of the Senate, when the present war shall have been brought to a conclusion; but not now.

I wish to say still further, that the office of lieutenant general, as an administrative office, is inconsistent with the administration of public affairs; and the office of General-in-Chief, in as far as it affects the administration of the military department of the Government, however well it may have succeeded, is also inconsistent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has indicated his amendment, which is no more nor less than to kill the bill. The effect is to do indirectly what it appears the gentleman does not wish to do directly. I trust there is no hostility from Massachusetts because this is a western general and has fought western battles. I am sorry to see this opposition come from the quarter it does. I move the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move that the bill and the pending amendments be laid upon the table.

Mr. J. C. ALLEN. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SCHENCK. The hour has arrived for taking up the enrolling act.

The SPEAKER. That bill is in the same position as this. It cannot come up until this is disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. May I inquire of the Chair whether it is not in order to move to postpone the consideration of this subject for one week?

The SPEAKER. It is not, pending the demand for the previous question and the motion to lay on the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 117; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashley, Baily, Beaman, Broomall, Clay, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Driggs, Garfield, Hale, Harding, Hutchins, Long, McAllister, James R. Morris, Noble, Orth, Williams, and Yeaman—19.

NAYS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Francis P. So the bill and amendments were not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; which was first on the amendment offered by Mr. Ross.

Mr. ROSS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, William J. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ames, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Beaman, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Baily, Broomall, Clay, Henry Winter Davis, Driggs, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Higby, Hotchkiss, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Longyear, Shannon, Upson, and Williams—17.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, as amended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. STEVENS demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 41; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. James C. Allen, Alley, Allison, Ancona, Arnold, Augustus C. Baldwin, John D. Baldwin, Baxter, Blaine, Francis P. Blair, Jacob B. Blair, Blow, Boyd, Brandegee, William G. Brown, Ambrose W. NAYS—Messrs. Ashley, Baily, Boutwell, Broomall, Chanler, Cole, Henry Winter Davis, Thomas T. Davis, Garfield, Grider, Hale, Hall, Harding, Benjamin G. Harris, Hotchkiss, John H. Morris, Noble, Perry, Price, Pruyn, Scott, Shannon, Stevens, Stiles, Strouse, Van Valkenburgh, William B. Washburn, Williams, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Yeaman—41.

So the bill was passed.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. STILES stated that his colleague, Mr. JOHNSON, was detained from the House by sickness.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a resolution in relation to the public printing; when the Speaker signed the same.

MONTANA TERRITORY.

Mr. BEAMAN. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the motion by which the bill providing a temporary government for the Territory of Montana was referred to the Committee on Territories.

The SPEAKER. The motion will be entered.

ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, with an amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SCHENCK. The motion pending, I believe, is to refer the bill and amendment to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. That motion is pending.

Mr. SCHENCK. I am very willing it shall go there if by unanimous consent it can be made a special order in committee to-day, and from day to day until disposed of.

No objection being made, the bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made a special order from day to day until disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will suggest that the bill relative to claims of the State of Pennsylvania has been made a special order in committee for to-day.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I ask that that special order may be postponed for one week.

Mr. STEVENS. If it is in order I will move that that bill be postponed as a special order until the enrollment bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I desire to ask my colleague whether his proposition will make the Pennsylvania bill a special order in committee after this bill has been disposed of?

The SPEAKER. It has been made a special order, and would take precedence of all other bills except appropriation bills made special orders.

There being no objection, the bill heretofore assigned as a special order for to-day in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was postponed until the enrollment bill shall have been disposed of.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The bill was read.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Strike out all after section one, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the quota of each ward of a city, town, township, or precinct, or of a county where the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, or precincts, shall be, as nearly as possible, in proportion to the number of men resident therein subject to draft, taking into account, as far as practicable, the number which has been previously furnished therefrom; and in ascertaining and filling said quota there shall be taken into account the number of men who have heretofore entered the naval service of the United States, and whose names are borne upon the enrollment lists as already returned to the office of the Provost Marshal General of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That if the quota from any State shall not be filled within the time designated by the President, the provost marshal of the district within which any ward of a city, town, township, precinct, or county, where the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, or precincts, which is deficient in its quota, is situated, shall, under the direction of the Provost Marshal General, make a draft for the number deficient therefrom; but all volunteers who may enlist after the draft shall have been ordered, and before it shall be actually made, shall be deducted from the number ordered to be drafted in such ward, town, township, precinct, or county. And if the quota of any district shall not be filled by the draft made in accordance with the provisions of this act and the act to which it is an amendment, further drafts shall be made and like proceedings had until the quota of such district shall be filled.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person enrolled under the provisions of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish, at any time previous to the draft, an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft, nor at the time in the military or naval service of the United States, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall be exempt from draft, not, however, exceeding the time for which such substitute shall have been accepted.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That boards of enrollment shall enroll all persons whose names may have been omitted by the proper enrolling officers; all persons who shall arrive at the age of twenty years before the draft; and all persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States who have not been in such service two years during the present war; and said boards of enrollment shall release and discharge from draft all persons who, between the time of the enrollment and the draft, shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years, and shall strike the names of such persons from the enrollment.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That any person drafted into the military service of the United States may, before the time fixed for his appearance at the draft rendezvous, furnish an acceptable substitute, subject to such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War. If such substitute is not liable to draft, the person furnishing him shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute is not liable to draft, not exceeding the term for which he was drafted; and if such substitute is liable to draft, the name of the person furnishing him shall be liable to draft in filling future quotas. And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provision of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft in filling that quota, and his name shall be retained on the roll in filling future quotas; but in no instance shall the exemption of any person, on account of his payment of commutation money for the procurement of a substitute, extend beyond one year; but at the end of one year in every such case the name of any person so exempted shall be enrolled again, if not before returned to the enrollment list under the provisions of this section.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That any drafted person who shall be declared to be exempt by reason of physical disability, and whose annual gains, profits, or income, as ascertained by the provisions of the act to provide internal revenue to support the Government, and to pay interest on the public debt, approved July 1, 1862, and the acts amendatory thereof, exceed the sum of $1,200, exclusive of all deductions authorized to be made in said acts, such person shall pay the sum of $300 to the person authorized to receive commutation money from drafted persons not exempted. And it shall be the duty of the provost marshal of each district to transmit to the collector of internal revenue of such district the names and residences of all persons drafted and declared to be exempt by reason of physical disability; and if any drafted person so declared to be exempt, and whose annual gains, profits, or income exceed the sum of $1,200, to be ascertained as aforesaid, shall neglect or refuse for the period of ten days after his name shall have been transmitted to the collector of internal revenue to pay the sum of $300 as aforesaid, it shall be the duty of the collector of internal revenue to collect said sum in the manner provided by law for the collection of income tax in default, together with all the penalties and costs therein provided, and to pay over the said $300 to the person authorized as aforesaid; and such drafted person so declared to be exempt, by reason of physical disability, who shall pay the sum of $300 within ten days after his name shall have been transmitted to the collector of internal revenue, shall not again be liable to draft during the time for which he was drafted; but if such person shall neglect or refuse to pay said sum for the period of ten days as aforesaid, he shall be liable to draft whenever the President of the United States shall call for men from the district in which he resides. And it shall be the duty of the collector of internal revenue to transmit to the provost marshal the names and residences of all such persons required to pay the sum of $300 as aforesaid who shall neglect or refuse, for the period of ten days, to pay said sum.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That no person of foreign birth shall, on account of alienage, be exempted from enrollment or draft under the provisions of this act, or the act to which it is an amendment, who has at any time assumed the rights of a citizen by voting at any election held under authority of the laws of any State or Territory, or of the United States, or who has held any office under such laws or any of them; but the fact that any such person of foreign birth has voted or held, or shall vote or hold, office as aforesaid, shall be taken as conclusive evidence that he is not entitled to exemption from military service on account of alienage.

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That any mariner or able seaman who shall be drafted under the act approved March 3, 1863, entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," shall have the right, within eight days after the notification of such draft, to enlist in the naval service as a seaman, and a certificate that he has so enlisted being made out in conformity with regulations which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, and duly presented to the provost marshal of the district in which such mariner or able seaman shall have been drafted, shall exempt him from such draft: Provided, That the period for which he shall have enlisted into the naval service shall not be less than the period for which he shall have been drafted into the military service: And provided further, That the said certificate shall declare that satisfactory proof has been made before the naval officer issuing the same that the said person so enlisting in the Navy is a mariner by vocation, or an able seaman.

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That whenever any such mariner or able seaman shall have been exempted from such draft into the military service by such enlistment into the naval service, under such due certificate thereof, the ward, town, township, precinct, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, or precincts, from which such person has been drafted, shall be credited upon its quota to all intents and purposes as if he had been duly mustered in the military service under such draft.

Sec. 11. And be it further enacted, That all enlistments into the naval service or marine corps that may be hereafter made of persons liable to service under the act of Congress entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, shall be credited to the ward, town, township, precinct, or county, when the same is not divided into wards, towns, townships, or precincts, in which such enlisted men were or may be enrolled and liable to duty under the act aforesaid, under such regulations as the Provost Marshal General of the United States may prescribe.

Sec. 12. And be it further enacted, That no pilot, engineer, or master-at-arms, having an appointment or acting appointment as such, and being actually in the naval service, shall be subject to military draft while holding such appointment.

Sec. 13. And be it further enacted, That the following persons be, and they are hereby, excepted and exempted from the provisions of this act, and shall not be liable to military duty under the same, to wit: such as are rejected as physically or mentally unfit for the service; the Vice President of the United States, the judges of the various courts of the United States, the heads of the various Executive Departments of the Government, the Governors of the several States, all persons actually in the military or naval service of the United States at the time of draft, and all persons who have served in the military or naval service two years during the present war and been honorably discharged therefrom. And no persons but such as are herein excepted shall be exempt.

Sec. 14. And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and so much of section ten of said act as provides for the separate enrollment of each class, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and the two classes mentioned in the third section of said act shall be consolidated.

Sec. 15. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall forcibly resist or oppose any enrollment, or who shall incite, counsel, encourage, or who shall conspire or confederate with any other person or persons forcibly to resist or oppose any such enrollment, or who shall aid or assist, or take any part in any forcible resistance or opposition thereto, or who shall assault, obstruct, hinder, impede, or threaten any officer or other person employed or aiding in making such enrollment, or employed or aiding in the performance of any service relating thereto, or in arresting or aiding to arrest any spy or deserter from the military service of the United States, shall, upon conviction thereof in any court competent to try the offense, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding five years, or by both of said punishments, in the discretion of the court; but nothing in this section contained shall be construed to relieve the party offending from liability under proper indictment or process for any crime against the laws of a State, committed by him while violating the provisions of this section.

Sec. 16. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War shall detail or appoint such number of additional surgeons for temporary duty in the examination of persons drafted into the military service, in any district, as may be necessary to secure the prompt examination of all such persons, and to fix the compensation to be paid to surgeons so appointed while actually employed. And such surgeons, so detailed or appointed, shall perform the same duties as the surgeon of the board of enrollment, except that they shall not be permitted to vote or sit with the board of enrollment.

Sec. 17. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War is authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, to permit or require boards of examination of enrolled or drafted men to hold their examinations at different points within their respective enrollment districts, to be determined by him.

Sec. 18. And be it further enacted, That provost marshals, boards of enrollment, or any member thereof, acting by authority of the board, shall have power to summon witnesses in behalf of the Government, and enforce their attendance by attachment without previous payment of fees, in any case pending before them, or either of them; and the fees allowed for witnesses attending under summons shall be five cents per mile for mileage; and no other fees or costs shall be allowed under the provisions of this section; and they shall have power to administer oaths and affirmations. And any person who shall wilfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, or member thereof, acting by authority of the board, or who shall, before any civil magistrate, wilfully and corruptly swear or affirm falsely, to any affidavit to be used in any enrollment, pending before any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, on conviction, be fined not exceeding $500, and imprisoned not less than six months nor more than twelve months.

Sec. 19. And be it further enacted, That copies of any record of a provost marshal or board of enrollment, or of any part thereof, certified by the provost marshal, or a majority of said board of enrollment, shall be deemed and taken as evidence in any civil or military court in like manner as the original record: Provided, That if any person shall knowingly certify any false copy or copies of such record, to be used in any civil or military court, he shall be subject to the pains and penalties of perjury.

Sec. 20. And be it further enacted, That all claims to exemption shall be verified by the oath or affirmation of the party claiming exemption; and the truth of the facts stated, unless it shall satisfactorily appear to the board of enrollment that such party is for some sufficient reason unable to make at present such oath or affirmation; and the testimony of any other party filed in support of a claim to exemption shall also be made upon oath or affirmation.

Sec. 21. And be it further enacted, That if any person drafted and liable to render military service, shall procure a decision of the board of enrollment in his favor upon a claim to exemption by any fraud or false representation practiced by himself or by his procurement, such decision or exemption shall be of no effect, and the person exempted, or in whose favor the decision may be made, shall be deemed a deserter, and may be arrested, tried by court-martial, and punished as such, and shall be held to service for the full term for which he was drafted, reckoning from the time of his arrest.

Sec. 22. And be it further enacted, That any person who shall procure, or attempt to procure, a false report from the surgeon of the board of enrollment concerning the physical condition of any drafted person, or a decision in favor of such person by the board of enrollment upon a claim to exemption, knowing the same to be false, shall, upon conviction in any district or circuit court of the United States, be punished by imprisonment for the period for which the party was drafted.

Sec. 23. And be it further enacted, That the fifteenth section of the act to which this is amendatory be so amended that it will read as follows: that any surgeon charged with the duty of such inspection, who shall receive from any person whomsoever any money or other valuable thing, or agree, directly or indirectly, to receive the same to his own or another's use, for making an imperfect inspection, or a false or incorrect report, or who shall wilfully neglect to make a faithful inspection and true report, and each member of the board of enrollment who shall wilfully agree to the discharge from service of any drafted person who is not legally and properly entitled to such discharge, shall be tried by a court-martial, and, on conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not less than $300 and not more than $10,000, shall be imprisoned at the discretion of the court, and be cashiered and dismissed the service.

Sec. 24. And be it further enacted, That the fees of agents and attorneys for making out and causing to be executed any papers in support of a claim for exemption from draft, or for any services that may be rendered to the claimant, shall not, in any case, exceed five dollars; and physicians or surgeons furnishing certificates of disability to any claimant for exemption from draft shall not be entitled to any fees or compensation therefor. And any agent or attorney who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any greater compensation for his services under this act, and any physician or surgeon who shall, directly or indirectly, demand or receive any compensation for furnishing said certificates of disability, shall be deemed guilty of a high misdemeanor, and, upon conviction, shall, for every such offense, be fined not exceeding $500, to be recovered before any court of competent jurisdiction in an action of debt, one half for the use of any informer who may sue for the same in the name of the United States, and the other half for the use of the United States, and shall also be subject to imprisonment for a term not exceeding one year, at the discretion of the court.

Sec. 25. And be it further enacted, That no member of the board of enrollment, and no surgeon detailed or employed to assist the board of enrollment, and no clerk, assistant, or employee of any provost marshal or board of enrollment, shall, directly or indirectly, be engaged in procuring or attempting to procure substitutes for persons drafted, or liable to be drafted, into the military service of the United States. And if any member of a board of enrollment, or any such surgeon, clerk, assistant, or employee, shall procure, or attempt to procure, a substitute for any person drafted, or liable to be drafted, as aforesaid, he shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, upon conviction, be punished by imprisonment not less than thirty days nor more than six months, and pay a fine not less than one hundred nor more than one thousand dollars, by any court having competent jurisdiction.

Sec. 26. And be it further enacted, That so much of the act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved on the 3d day of March, 1863, as may be inconsistent with the provisions of this act is hereby repealed.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the bill by sections for amendment.

The first section was read, as follows:

That the President of the United States shall be authorized, whenever he shall deem it necessary, during the present war, to call for such number of men for the military service of the United States as the public exigencies may require.

Mr. A. MYERS moved to add the following:

And all persons drafted and entering the military service of the United States to continue in the same for a term not exceeding eighteen months.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Section four was read, as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That any person enrolled under the provisions of the act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1863, or who may hereafter be so enrolled, may furnish, at any time, an acceptable substitute, who is not liable to draft, and such person so furnishing a substitute shall be exempt from draft during the time for which such substitute shall not be liable to draft, not exceeding three years; but no person in the service of the United States shall become a substitute to serve in any regiment or company except among the troops of the State in which he originally enlisted or from which he was drafted.

Mr. FINCK. I move the following amendment:

In line six strike out the words "who is not liable to draft;" and in line eight strike out "not be liable to draft," and insert "be mustered into the service."

Mr. Chairman, this section refuses to allow a party enrolled and subject to draft, before the draft actually takes place to furnish a substitute; and furthermore, it limits the kind of substitute to be presented by the drafted man—it confines the substitute to those persons who are not liable to the draft. I think that it would be right after the enrollment and the draft have taken place to allow drafted men to furnish as substitutes those not drafted, whether their names are upon the roll or not. It appears to me to be the true policy of the American people to raise men by a voluntary system. Now, before this draft takes place, when you have half a million, or a million in a State, if you make a provision that the party whose name appears upon the roll as drafted may procure a substitute without limiting him to that class of persons who are not liable to duty under this section, then there is a probability that those who are enrolled and able to procure a substitute can avoid the draft. By this bill the substitutes are confined to those who are not liable to the draft. That is what I object to. I want drafted men to go wherever they please to obtain substitutes. Not only that, when a man procures a substitute and he is mustered into the service, the time for which he is mustered in ought to be put to the credit of that man. For these reasons I have moved my amendment.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. That amendment, if I understand it, takes two names instead of one from the list of men enrolled. Now, the person who furnishes a substitute has his name taken off, and if the amendment be adopted it will take his own name and that of another from the list. It makes the number to be drafted only one half.

Mr. FINCK. It will give the Army the benefit of one half at least.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the gentleman's proposition be divided.

Mr. FINCK. I agree to that. The first portion of the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FINCK. I withdraw the remaining portion of the amendment.

Mr. ROSS. I move that the fourth section be stricken out. If it becomes necessary to have a draft, I want to have some means to reach the speculators and contractors, and I know of no other way than to strike out this commutation section.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the fifth section by striking out the words, "on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls," and insert in lieu thereof, "during the time for which he was drafted, or until the whole roll shall be exhausted;" so that it will read:

And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of an act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate to relieve such person from draft during the time for which he was drafted, or until the whole roll shall be exhausted; and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400 instead of $300.

Mr. Chairman, my object is to provide that a man who is drafted and pays his commutation of $400 shall be exempt from any further draft during the time for which he has paid commutation, unless the roll should be exhausted, when he shall again be liable to draft. I think that the money which he pays to procure a substitute—for that is the object of it—ought to stand in lieu of his actual service.

Mr. GANSON. That puts the man who pays commutation on the same footing as the one who procures a substitute.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I desire to say to the committee that many of the amendments which will be proposed to this Senate bill are already in the substitute which is proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs, and if the Committee of the Whole could pass over the Senate bill and take up the substitute reported from the committee, it seems to me it would very much facilitate our discussion and consideration of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That can be done by general consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot consent, because if we can amend the original bill of the Senate so as to make it as good or better than the substitute, then we can take it when so amended and save the trouble of going over the substitute. There are one or two provisions in the original bill which I like, and which are not in the substitute.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. If we are to perfect the original bill, there are many amendments I desire to propose, which I should not offer if we were to proceed directly to the consideration of the substitute. There is, for instance, in this very section a clause which should be stricken out.

The CHAIRMAN. The course proposed to be pursued can only be done by general consent; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, for this reason: by his amendment, I understand, he desires to place the man who pays his commutation money upon the same footing precisely as the man who furnishes a substitute.

Mr. STEVENS. It does place him precisely upon the same footing, unless the whole enrollment shall be exhausted.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The gentleman's amendment would place them upon the same footing substantially, because the man who furnishes a substitute who is liable to draft can himself be drafted again as soon as that roll is exhausted.

Now, what the Government wants is men, and it is believed that by retaining the commutation clause, but with this restriction, we will get men; that persons who are drafted will employ substitutes as far as they can rather than pay the commutation money into the Treasury. Now, it is very easy to suppose a case where the whole roll may be exhausted without procuring the men necessary to fill up the Army, if you allow men to be exempt upon paying $300 for the term of three years. We think it is better, if we retain the commutation clause at all, to retain it with the restriction that persons paying it shall only be exempt from draft on that call. The President has now called for five hundred thousand men to be drafted. Now, a man who pays $300 after being drafted under this call, is exempt from service, and cannot be drafted again under the same call. But should the President find it necessary one month later to issue another call for one hundred thousand men, or any number more, that man's name would be placed upon the roll, and he would be subject to draft on the new call.

Again, I do not know how you are going to manage this matter of a draft with a provision that a man shall, if he pays his money, be exempt from draft until that roll is exhausted. Suppose, for instance, an enrollment is made in a district. The names of all men subject to the draft are put into a box, and as fast as other men become liable to draft by arriving at mature age, their names are added and put into the box also. So the names in this box are being added to every little while, and there is no time when it can be said that the roll is exhausted. This course will also require more clerical force to keep the accounts and to manage the matter; because it will be necessary, whenever a man pays his $300, that an account should be kept of it, in order that he should not be liable to be drafted again until all the names in the box at that time shall be exhausted.

I do not know that I make myself understood by the committee. This roll or box is never exhausted; you are all the time adding to or drawing from it, and you can never know when the names are exhausted which were upon the roll at any particular time.

Mr. STEVENS. You make a draft, and draw out of the box, for instance, fifty names; and they are not put in again, but kept out. If another call is made, you go on and draw from the names remaining.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The difficulty lies here: that between the first drawing of names and a subsequent drawing other and new names are added, by men moving into the district or by young men arriving at mature age; and so you are constantly putting in and drawing out. Therefore it was thought by the Committee on Military Affairs to be the wisest course to fix some definite period during which a man should be exempt from draft in case he furnished a substitute not liable to draft; and they put in the provision that if the substitute was liable to draft or the man had paid his commutation money, such person should be relieved from draft only on that call, but that his name should be retained on the roll and be subject to draft on future calls.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move to strike out all after the word "enlisted" in line nineteen of the section, and to insert what I send to the Clerk's desk. The part which I propose to strike out embraces what is proposed to be stricken out by the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. That is hardly in order as an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. It strikes out a still larger portion of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. It will be in order after the pending amendment is disposed of.

The question was taken on Mr. STEVENS's amendment; and it was agreed to—ayes 76, noes 37.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now move to strike out all after the word "enlisted" in line nineteen, page 4, down to the end of the section, as follows:

And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procurement of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls, and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400, instead of $300.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And so much of the thirteenth section of the act of which this act is an amendment as authorizes exemption from military service by the payment of a sum not exceeding $300 is hereby repealed.

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as this section embraces the idea in the main of substitution, I have submitted this amendment, so that this question shall be presented to the House at the earliest moment, as the action of the House upon subsequent sections relating to the same point must necessarily depend upon its action on this.

This amendment presents the simple, naked question whether it is policy to perpetuate the provision of the act of 1862 which accords exemption from military duty on the payment of $300.

I have but this to say upon the subject, that our experience thus far under the provisions of the act has proved it to be an entire failure so far as its main object, the raising of troops, is concerned. I have noticed in looking over the reports from the New England States where a draft has taken place, that while a large amount of money has been raised, there has been an entire failure in the main object of obtaining troops.

Mr. BOYD. I move to amend the amendment so as to strike out all the provisions of the act which authorize the payment of commutation money or the employment of substitutes, and upon that amendment I desire to make one or two remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's amendment is in effect the same as the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. BOYD. If it is the same, I have nothing to say upon the subject.

Mr. GANSON. I am opposed to that part of the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana which proposes to repeal the commutation clause of the act to which this is amendatory, and thereby to deprive those drafted of the right to purchase exemption from the liability to do military duty by the payment of $300. And, sir, I am opposed to it for the reason that that act has already been enforced in a portion of the States, and I do not know but in all; and many persons who have been drafted have purchased exemption from liability to do military duty by paying $300. I think that a proper construction of the act exempts a person so paying to the same extent as if he had furnished a substitute. There may be a difference of opinion, however, in regard to that construction; but I think that it would be unjust toward others in the same States who may be drafted in the future to deprive them of an opportunity of purchasing exemption on the same terms as those heretofore drafted have been allowed to avail themselves of. This amendment would deprive them of that right, and hence I am opposed to it. I am in favor of retaining the $300 commutation clause as it now stands in the original act, and opposed to increasing the amount to $400 for the same reason as I have assigned.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I have had some difficulty, in reading over the Senate bill and the substitute reported by the Military Committee, in determining whether the committee intend this as a bill to raise money or as a bill to raise men. But the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNS-

WORTH,] who is a member of the committee, tells us that the object of the committee is to raise men, and not money. Now, sir, if that be the object, then we can arrive at it better by striking out the whole of the fifth section, and prohibiting exemption from military service by the payment of commutation money or the procuring of substitutes. If it should be known to the country that after the 1st of March no substitutes could be provided by persons drafted, and that no persons could be exempted from military service by the payment of $300, the pending call would be filled, and the five hundred thousand men called for to-day would be had; for every person who does not desire to engage in the military service would at once set to work to fill up the number of men called for by the President. More than that, it is the only just method of securing men to fill up the ranks of the Army.

We have been told that it is unjust to permit a man to escape from the service who is able to pay $300 for that escape and to require a man not possessed of the $300 to go into the Army. We have been told that that is a provision in favor of the wealthy and in opposition to the poor. If that be so, the only way in which we can remedy it, and the only way in which we can establish perfect equality in the country, is to require every man to take his chance in the wheel, and if he be drawn, to go into the Army, or procure a volunteer before coming to the draft. Let every man take his chance, whether he be rich or whether he be poor, whether he be pursuing one avocation in life or be pursuing another avocation. If his fate, as the wheel turns, assigns him to the role of Government duty, let him go. That establishes an equality. That secures to the Government the service that every citizen owes to the Government in times like these. That is a complete enforcement of the right of the Government to demand from a citizen that military service without which no Government can be maintained. If Congress shall adopt that rule, striking out the commutation clause and prohibiting the employment of substitutes, then every citizen will stand before the law on a perfect equality with every other citizen. I shall, therefore, favor such an amendment of this bill as will abolish not only the commutation clause but also the right of persons to employ substitutes.

Mr. BLAINE. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from New York [Mr. GANSON] could not find a broader reason for opposing the pending amendment than that a few had escaped by reason of the commutation clause, and that therefore it would be unjust to deny the same avenue of escape to those who may be drafted in future. For myself, I support the commutation principle because I believe it is expedient and just; and I hope that the gentlemen on that side of the Chamber who intend to vote to retain it in the enrollment act will not base their action on so narrow a ground as the gentleman from New York has based his—

Mr. GANSON. I desire to say that I am in favor of retaining the commutation clause on the ground that I regard it as proper and just, and that the amount is sufficient. I merely said that I was opposed to striking it out entirely, because I thought it unjust toward that portion of the community who were not in a situation to avail themselves of the right to purchase exemption from the performance of military duty, and that I was in favor of retaining the $300 because it is eminently just and proper that it should be retained.

Mr. BLAINE. I am very glad to hear the explanation of the gentleman from New York. The reason why I commented upon his position was that, as we all know, very grave and very great excitement was produced in a portion of the State of New York last summer in consequence of the passions and prejudices of a portion of the population being aroused against the principle of commutation.

Mr. GANSON. I desire to inform the gentleman that I have never been engaged in that.

Mr. BLAINE. I am very glad to know that the gentleman was not. I never heard that he was. But this commutation clause was everywhere denounced by gentlemen on that side of the Chamber as favoring the rich and oppressing the poor. Now, sir, if the commutation clause favored any class, and should be retained for any class, it is the great "middle interest" of society—the class on which the business and the prosperity of the country depend. If that clause be stricken out, as the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] proposes, and if every person drafted be compelled to serve in the Army, without the right either of commutation or substitution, you will have placed upon the statute-books of the country a law which the first Napoleon said took all the strength and all the absolutism of the French empire to enforce; and he recorded it as his deliberate judgment that a conscription thus enforced, as it was in France, would always prove to be "the dread and desolation of families." I warn gentlemen with whom I am politically associated on this side of the Chamber against any such harsh and radical law as that; and I am very glad to see on the other side of the Chamber a general disposition to support the commutation principle just as it has thus far existed in the enrollment act.

Mr. GANSON. You will always see it.

Mr. SPALDING. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. DAWES reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration as a special order the act (S. No. 36) to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863, and had come to no resolution thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. KELLOGG, of Michigan, (at a quarter past four o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1864.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. Dr. SUNDERLAND. The Journal of yesterday was read.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I perceive that the Journal states that the report of the Judiciary Committee in reference to the case of Mr. HALE concludes with a resolution. That is not so. The committee asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject. No resolution was annexed to the report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal will be so corrected.

NEW SENATOR.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, Hon. GEORGE READ RIDDLE, the Senator elect from the State of Delaware, is present and ready to take the oath and to enter upon the discharge of his trust as a Senator.

The oaths prescribed by law were administered to Mr. RIDDLE, and he took his seat in the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of J. N. Carpenter, paymaster in the United States Navy, praying for compensation for clothing stolen from him on board United States sloop Saratoga, while in the port of Philadelphia, January 4, 1863; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented the petition of Captain H. Clay Wood, of the eleventh United States infantry, praying for compensation for property lost by the evacuation of Fort Cobb, Texas, under post order No. 87, issued for the evacuation of that post; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of Captain John P. Sherburne, first infantry, United States Army, praying for indemnification for losses caused by the surrender of the department of Texas to the rebels; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the memorial of Captain John P. Sherburne, first infantry, United States Army, praying for indemnification for losses caused by public money being stolen, for which he was accountable; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented the petition of Elizabeth Mills, widow of John Mills, praying for an increase of pension; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented the memorial of John Christie, clerk to the commandant of the navy-yard at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, praying that the accounting officers of the Treasury may be authorized to allow the payment of the sums that have been appropriated for the pay of the clerks at the Portsmouth and Philadelphia navy-yards from October, 1857, to July, 1859; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. MORGAN presented three petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the formation of a properly organized ambulance and sanitary corps for our armies, and the enlistment of men for such service; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer the petition of the president and directors of the South American Steamship Company, a corporation established by law, in which they set forth that they propose to inaugurate communication by means of steam vessels between the United States and St. Thomas, in the West Indies, and Pernambuco, Bahia, and Rio de Janeiro, and they pray that an appropriation from the United States may be made in their behalf, either by way of subsidy or for mail service. I move the reference of this petition to the Committee on Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I also offer the petition of Richard Yates, Governor of Illinois; which, as it is brief, I will read:

STATE OF ILLINOIS, EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
SPRINGFIELD, January 13, 1864.

To the Honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I do earnestly petition your honorable body to exercise its utmost constitutional power, at the earliest practicable period, in emancipating all persons of African descent held to involuntary service or labor in the United States.

RICHARD YATES.

I ask the reference of this petition to the select committee on slavery and freedmen.

It was so referred.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of A. R. Davis, of Montgomery county, Maryland, praying compensation for slaves alleged to have been freed by the operation of the act emancipating slaves in the District of Columbia, reported adversely thereon, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator ask for the present consideration of the report?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Let it lie on the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It objected to, it cannot be considered at the present time.

Territory of Minnesota in the year 1857, to ask that it be printed and recommitment to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a bill (H. R. No. 40) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865, have directed me to report it back with sundry amendments. The Committee on Finance have been placed in possession of a large number of communications from the State Department in reference, one of them, to a change of laws, and the rest to an increase of the compensation of consuls at certain places. They consider that this is matter of legislation which is not appropriate to that committee, and they have instructed me to report them to the Senate and request that they be referred to the Committee on Commerce, to which they properly belong; and I will say to the Committee on Commerce that if they sanction the propositions they will be appropriate amendments to the consular appropriation bill which I have just reported, and I shall let that bill lie for some days in the hope that the question may be taken up at an early day by the Committee on Commerce, so that they may be ready with their amendments when the bill shall come up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That disposition will be made of the papers, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives had signed an enrolled joint resolution (S. No. 18) in relation to the public printing; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

THANKS TO COMMODORE RINGGOLD.

Mr. HICKS. I desire permission to withdraw a resolution which I had the honor of reporting on the 19th of January, tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship

Sabine, for the purpose of making some corrections. I desire to withdraw it and substitute for it a corrected resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will allow the Chair to suggest that he will perhaps meet the question more appropriately by offering his new proposed resolution as an amendment to the original resolution.

Mr. HICKS. Very well, I will take that course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator move to take up the resolution now?

Mr. HICKS. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution (S. No. 19) tendering the thanks of Congress to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HICKS. I move to amend the resolution by striking out one "l," in the name Cadwalader, as it is printed; and in line nine by striking out the letter "S," which is put in as a middle name of Major Reynolds; and in lines ten and eleven, before the word "ship," by inserting "line-of-battle;" so as to make the joint resolution read:

Resolved, &c. That the thanks of Congress are hereby tendered to Commodore Ringgold, the officers, petty officers, and men of the United States ship Sabine, for the daring and skill displayed in rescuing the crew of the steam transport Governor, wrecked in a gale on the 1st day of November, 1861, having on board a battalion of United States marines under the command of Major John Reynolds, and in the search for, and rescue of, the United States line-of-battle ship Vermont, disabled in a gale upon the 26th of February last, with her crew and freight.

The amendments were agreed to. The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in. The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

THANKS TO GENERAL THOMAS.

Mr. NESMITH. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution (S. No. 11) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the officers and men who fought under his command at the battle of Chickamauga.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to present the thanks of Congress to Major General George H. Thomas and the officers and men who fought under his command, for their gallantry, good conduct, and soldierlike endurance at the battle of Chickamauga, on the 19th and 20th of September, 1863.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

INVESTIGATING COMMITTEES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. DOOLITTLE on the 28th of January, which was modified to read as follows:

Resolved, That in all sessions of committees to take the testimony of witnesses in relation to any matter of fact pertaining to the conduct of any Department of the Government or of any branch thereof, the head of such Department shall be requested to employ some proper and competent person connected with the same to aid in the examination and cross-examination of witnesses, and to furnish any other evidence or proof pertinent to the matter inquired into.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, in regard to that resolution I shall say something presently; but before I do it I want to notice some remarks which fell yesterday from the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] in which he took occasion to comment on the statement I had made in the Senate a few days before, and to characterize it as an attack on the Navy Department. I was not in the Senate when the Senator commenced his remarks, but I have looked them over in the Globe, and I do not understand, either from what I heard or from what is printed as having been said, that the Senator questioned in the slightest degree the entire accuracy of the statement which I made. I gave the authority upon which I made the statement when I made it. I said that it was from one of the officers in charge of the Library who furnished me the statistics. But the Senator finds fault not with what I did say, but with what I did not say. He says there were a great many things that I ought to have said and that I might have said, and he intimates that if I had been on the stand and he had been cross-examining me, he would have put a great many questions to me, some of which would be relevant and some irrelevant, and to some of which I should have to answer one way and to some another.

Mr. President, I have not the slightest doubt on earth that if I had been on the stand and the Senator from Iowa had been my cross-examiner he could have kept me on the stand all day, if he chose, putting questions, some of which would have been relevant and some irrelevant, some of which would have been pertinent and some not, some of which I might have answered and some of which I could not answer. Some of them might have been like the question proposed by the Irish tailor to Captain Simms when lecturing on hollow spheres; and that was, whether if the atmosphere combined with the hemisphere and produced a concussion, animal heat could be generated? [Laughter.] A great many such questions might have been put; but, sir, I stand on what I said.

The Senator finds fault that I did not, when I gave the account of the estimates, go on and reduce our currency to gold. He says I ought to have told the Senate when I stated that they asked for $142,000,000 for the Navy this year that it was in a depreciated currency. Sir, was there a member of the Senate, was there anybody on earth that had the slightest doubt as to what I meant; that I meant $142,000,000, such as we commonly speak of, when we speak here, every time we mention the currency? Does every gentleman here, when he has occasion to speak of dollars, find himself under the necessity of quoting the price of gold and telling the Senate what the real value of it is in gold? I supposed that when a man addressed the Senate he ought to understand what Chief Justice Marshall told a young attorney who was arguing before him. He told him that counsel ought to consider that the Supreme Court of the United States knew something; that he need not tell them everything; that they were acquainted with some of the first principles of the law. [Laughter.] Sir, I supposed when I spoke of $142,000,000 that everybody knew I meant $142,000,000 of the common currency in use; and I do not think the facts stated were subject to the charge of disingenuousness because I did not reduce the sum to gold currency. Nothing on earth was further from my mind than that in making that statement I was making an attack on the Navy Department. I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that we were called upon to appropriate an immense sum for that Department. I wanted the eyes of the Senate directed to that fact, in order that they might take every precaution to see that it was wisely and well appropriated.

But, sir, there is another matter that the Senator spoke of in those remarks which seems to me to require a single word of comment. He represents that he himself has been dissatisfied with some of the proceedings of the Navy Department, and indeed of all the Departments; but the difference between him and me is, that he is cool, imperturbable, not easily excited by passion, and does not come into the Senate to "ventilate his griefs" here. That, he says, constitutes the difference between him and me. Now let me say a single word. I defy that honorable Senator, I defy any gentleman that sits around me, or ever sat around me, to point his finger to a word that I have spoken in the Senate in which, to use the classical language of the Senator, I ever "ventilated my private griefs." No, sir, never. Upon that subject I have a rule to which I have invariably and religiously adhered ever since this war commenced; and that was, that I would have no enemies but the enemies of my country; if I had griefs, they should be buried; if I had wrongs, they should be submitted to in silence; if I had resentments, they should be smothered; but while this contest lasted, while this tremendous struggle endured, I have sworn an oath like that of the ancient crusaders when they started to redeem the holy sepulcher from the profanation of the infidel, that every private quarrel, every resentment, every wrong should be buried, and they would have no feeling but one settled, determined purpose to redeem from the profanation of the infidel the holy place they went to conquer; that they would have no resentments, and would have no foes but the foes of Christ and his church. That, sir, has been the sentiment by which I have endeavored and shall endeavor to be governed from the beginning to the end of this conflict.

Let me say to the honorable Senator that if I felt disposed to "ventilate my griefs" and wrongs here I could tell a tale of quiet and patient submission to wrongs, contumely, insults, and assassin-like stabs at my reputation that would astonish those who would listen to me. But, sir, I will do nothing of the sort. They shall be buried never to reach the light until the clouds of war that now hang over this distracted country shall be dispelled; then and not till then shall I undertake to vindicate myself from what I conceive to be wrong, contumely, and insult. Sir, I have no purpose, no end, no aim, no desire but for a vigilant, a faithful, and an energetic prosecution of this war. But, Mr. President, I will be candid. I want the war prosecuted with energy, with vigor, and with effect, but I do not want those who are doing it to console themselves for their patriotic efforts in behalf of the country by filching from the public Treasury. I stand here, and I will stand as long as I do stand here, a guardian of the public Treasury, faithful according to my abilities to what I conceive to be the interests of my country. Having said this, I have nothing more to say on that matter, and I leave that question; and now I want to say a word in regard to the resolution and in regard to the honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DOOLITTLE] who has offered it.

The Senator says that the reason why he has offered the resolution calling upon the head of every Department, whenever his conduct is under investigation by a committee, to send a person to examine the witnesses, is because some two years ago I expressed a sentiment which I have not retracted, and which he seems to think disqualifies me from doing justice to the Departments. Sir, let me tell that honorable Senator that the transaction to which he refers and of which he complains was not brought under the cognizance of the Senate till after it had been referred to the Secretary of the Navy, and the Secretary of the Navy had submitted a written statement, which was printed and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs before they made a report upon it. I think the practice of the Senate and of every committee of the Senate invariably has been, when they have had before them any matter of this sort, or any matter calling for information from any of the heads of Departments, to inclose the communication to the head of the Department who was interested in it, and ask for any light or any suggestions that he might see proper to make. I know that, without exception, such has been the course of the Naval Committee since I have been connected with it, whether I was chairman of it or not.

Now, Mr. President, where is the necessity for this new rule? I tell you, sir, it will work infinite mischief. It is a proclamation to the country that the Senate are incompetent to their work, and they invite the heads of Departments to send somebody in to help them to make their investigations. What will be the result? There is hardly one of your large committees that does not have to bring the conduct of some head of a Department under its supervision; and you will have every meeting of the Senate committees turned into a pettifogging justice's court, and some pettifogger will be sent by the heads of Departments to interrogate and cross-examine the witnesses, and the sittings of the committees will not be under the direction and control of the committees themselves, but they will be subject to the cross-examination of those agents who may be sent there.

Has any practical injustice resulted from the present course? Is there any head of a Department, or any subordinate of a Department, who has been injured, aggrieved, or wantonly assailed by any committee of this body? Has there been any injustice done, or is there any fear of injustice, that this extraordinary course is proposed at this time? Adopt it, and you cannot hold a committee meeting to discuss the ordinary measures of any of the Departments of the Government without being under the necessity of sending outside the Senate to invite some one to cross-examine everybody who makes statements before you.

Mr. President, we must have confidence in ourselves, in the members of this body. If we cannot, let us abandon the duties which we are here to discharge. The reason for introducing this resolution as given by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin is that, from the opinions I have entertained and the sentiments I have expressed, I am unfit and incompetent, disqualified to act upon the committee of investigation which has been ordered about the naval expenditures, for it is no more than that. If it be so, if that is the judgment of the Senate, let them say so, and do not undertake to change the law and change the rule, and introduce a new rule simply because you have got an improper person at the head of one single committee.

It is intimated, and more than intimated, that I am governed by hostility to the Navy Department. God knows there never was a more false and more atrocious calumny uttered. I have sought no such place. I have not sought to be at the head of the Naval Committee, nor at the head of this committee of investigation. The honorable Senator from New York [Mr. MORGAN]—he will pardon me for the allusion—knows that at the commencement of this session I went to him and earnestly entreated him that he would himself consent to be chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, and that I would gladly stand by and make way for him and consent to act second upon the committee under his lead. I thought it was due to the great and patriotic State of New York, to her immense mercantile interests, to her great population, to her as the first in point of wealth, commerce, and everything that relates to the protection which the Navy is to afford, that he should occupy that place, and most gladly would I have consented to sit under him. But, sir, the Senate thought differently. Without any solicitation of mine they thought differently, and they placed me where I am. I shall endeavor, so long as I occupy that place, faithfully, fearlessly, and impartially to discharge the duties that pertain to the place, and if it becomes me to express censure for any act that comes under my supervision, I will express it, God helping me, let the censure fall where it may and on whom it may. Sir, as I said before, I have no friends but the friends of my country, and I have no enemies but those that are striving for her overthrow; and if ever I have governed myself for a single moment in this body on this floor, or out of it, in committee or elsewhere, on any other principle than that, I desire the condemnation of the Senate, and of every honorable man in the Senate.

But, sir, the honorable Senator once made an excuse for me that I had been long schooled in the Opposition. It is true that I have been long schooled in the Opposition, and perhaps I have not sufficiently learned all the morality which ought to belong to a majority. I have not learned to approve that in the majority which I condemned in the party in power when we were in a minority; but I have endeavored and I will endeavor, while I do anything, to discharge the duty that belongs to me faithfully and impartially. Let me say to the honorable Senator right here that it is true, as he says, that I have not retracted what I said two years ago. What is more, I have never seen occasion to retract it; and I will say further, that if I had occasion I very much fear I should repeat it more emphatically than I ever did in my life before. If these things disqualify me, so be it; but I pray the Senate not to pass a rule which will inevitably work mischief from any such temporary considerations.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, certainly I care nothing about this resolution applying to any other committee except the committee of which I have been made a member, and of which the honorable Senator from New Hampshire is chairman; but I repeat that the declarations which have been made by that Senator to-day, as well as the declarations made by him two years ago, the declarations which he made upon the occasion of moving for the appointment of this committee, are such as to satisfy the mind, as it seems to me, of every reasonable man that he acts from the belief, made up already in his mind, that he is pursuing in the Department transactions of fraud and corruption practiced in the Department itself as well as practiced upon the Department. His language was this:

"I declare upon my responsibility as a Senator that the liberties of this country are in greater danger to-day from the corruptions and from the profligacy practiced in the various Departments of the Government than they are from the enemy in the open field."

And he says to-day that he has no enemies but the enemies to his country, and he declares that the Departments of this Government are this day greater enemies of the liberties of this country than the rebels in the field. That is substantially what he says, sir; and saying that, he moves a committee of investigation upon the Navy Department.

Mr. President, in his speech the other day the Senator substantially charged that the expenditures of this Department were greater than the expenditures of all the civilized nations in the world in the support of their navies annually, leaving out Italy and one of the other smaller Powers of Europe. If this be true, the investigation by this committee requires an examination into every branch of the conduct of the Department; and if it is to arrive at the truth it requires that every power should be used that the Department is capable of, as well as the Senate, in order to ascertain the facts necessary to give the truth to the country. I feel perhaps more deeply, Mr. President, than I should otherwise were it not for the fact that I am not personally acquainted with the administration of the Navy Department. I have not been placed upon any committee where I have had an opportunity to make that acquaintance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will pause. It becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the special order at one o'clock.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I think that perhaps this can be disposed of in a short time.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the special order be postponed, in order that the Senator from Wisconsin may at least finish his remarks. It may be done by common consent, if there be no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will allow the Senator to proceed. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. This inquiry, sir, if directed to any purpose, must of necessity go into the whole question of the building of steam vessels for the Navy, steam-engines for the Navy-guns for the Navy. It must extend to everything connected with the Navy Department if it is to be efficient for any purpose in reducing the enormous and gigantic expenses of which the Senator complains; and, as I was saying, nothing in my experience in this body has fitted me to be a person proper to investigate into such facts. The honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] ever since he has been a member of this body, has been upon the Naval Committee, has made himself perfectly familiar with all its details in all its branches; and if there be any reason why the honorable Senator from Iowa should decline to sit on this committee that reason would apply with tenfold force to myself. And before I am willing to go into this investigation, I feel that it is a necessity to the committee and a duty to the committee and to the Senate, as well as to the Department itself, that the Department should be permitted to send before the committee some person connected with the Department who is perfectly acquainted with the whole business of the Department in all its details, with the mode of its making contracts, with the steam-engines that are employed, with the kind of vessels that are constructed, with the management of navy-yards, and all that vast amount of business of which I for one do not profess that I have any sufficient knowledge to enable me to go into an investigation.

I feel, sir, that this committee raised at this time, with this avowal of the Senator from New Hampshire that the Departments by their profligacies and corruptions are greater enemies to the people of this country than the rebels themselves, is an attack on the Navy Department.

Mr. HALE. I simply want to say that the Senator is using language that I never used, conveying an idea which I never uttered, and is altogether wide of anything that the limits of debate ought to justify him in. He says that I said the profligacies of this Department of the Government were greater enemies than the enemy in the field. I said no such thing. What I said two years ago could not possibly have reference to this; but I said nothing like that.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What the Senator said was, as I understand, "The liberties of this country are in greater danger to-day from the corruptions and from the profligacy practiced in the various Departments of the Government than they are from the enemy in the open field;" and he reasserts it to-day, and declares that if he had the power he would assert it in still stronger language.

If this is not an attack upon the honesty, the integrity of a Department in the administration of its affairs, I do not understand language; and when such an attack is made by the person who takes the position as chairman of a committee of investigation, I think it is but just on the part of the Senate to say that such a committee, raised under the lead of one who makes such declarations to investigate into the conduct of a Department, should be called upon to request the head of the Department to send some one to be present at the examination of witnesses who has some knowledge of its transactions and may shed light upon them, and enable the committee to arrive at the truth.

Sir, who does not know that the disappointed office-seekers who cannot get office at the hands of the Departments, the disappointed contractors who cannot get such contracts as they desire, to make themselves rich upon the Government; who does not know that these men by hundreds and by thousands are all around us, ready at all times to fill the ears of all who listen to them with stories of the corruptions practiced in the Departments themselves? That sometimes the Departments may be imposed upon, I do not doubt; that they often are, is undoubtedly true; and I am willing to go with that Senator, or any other, for the purpose of ferreting out the truth, and to pass any law that may be necessary to prevent these abuses. I undertake to say, however, that I believe the heads of the Departments of this Government are to-day just as anxious to ferret out these abuses as the Senators upon this floor; and I put this question to the Senate: suppose the honorable chairman of the committee on the conduct of the war should rise and make an avowal in relation to the War Department similar to that made by the Senator from New Hampshire, and declare that the corruptions practiced in that Department were more dangerous to the country than the enemy in the open field, and declare his firm belief that such corruptions existed, would it be anything more than just to the head of the War Department to say that Mr. Stanton should be permitted, when an investigation was going on involving the good faith of his Department, to send some one, an Assistant Secretary or some clerk in his Department familiar with the facts, to be present with the committee, and to furnish them the information which is necessary?

That is all I ask. I seek to cover up no truth, to defend no Department against any wrong which may have been committed by them; but what I seek is that justice shall be done as well to the heads of Departments as to the Senate. The country can only suffer by misrepresentation and falsehood, and in my judgment the country suffers whenever there is an unfounded declaration that any Department of this Government is guilty of fraud and corruption, because it goes to the confidence of the people in the Government, and the people, as they rule this country, must have confidence in their rulers if the Government is to be sustained.

Mr. SHERMAN. Before the Senator takes his seat I desire simply to ask him one question. Has he, as a member of the committee, requested the committee to give notice to the Navy Department that they are ready to call on them for information?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have never as yet attended any meeting of the committee, and no such proposition has been made in the committee to my knowledge.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will submit this proposition to the Senator from Wisconsin, based upon the experience I have had as a member of these committees. I have no doubt, at least I have every reason to suppose, that every committee of the Senate would, on proper representation by a member of the committee, give notice of any accusation to the party accused, and give that party an opportunity to cross-examine witnesses and to testify to facts to the contrary. If I supposed the special committee referred to would not do this I should vote for a resolution of instruction requiring them to do it; but until they refuse to do that I submit to the Senator from Wisconsin whether we ought to place on our Journals a resolution requiring any committee not to deny this plain justice to any one accused.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I have no objection myself to have this resolution confined to this particular committee, if that be the pleasure of the Senate; nor would I have any objection, if it would better suit Senators, that the resolution should be postponed until the question is raised in the committee. I have no objection to that; but I give notice that if the committee in its meeting shall determine not to invite the head of the Department which is assailed (for I look upon this as an assault upon the head of the Department and its administration) to send some one connected with the Department to attend the meetings of the committee, I shall renew the resolution in the Senate.

There was one other question upon which I wished to say a single word. The Senator from New Hampshire says that on a former occasion I reminded him of the fact that he was always trained in the minority, and he trained so little in the majority that he hardly knew how to conduct himself in the majority. Sir, it was not I who said it. It was the honorable Senator from New Hampshire who said it himself, and I assented to it by saying that I believed what he said was true. Those are the facts upon that subject. There is perhaps considerable force in what the Senator has said, that the long habit of continual denunciation against the Administration or the party in power for fifteen or twenty years in succession has had some effect upon the habits of his mind, both in thought and in action; but I did not assume to make that remark upon my own responsibility. It was simply reaffirming what the Senator had said.

Mr. HALE. I simply rise to say that I think now we shall behave ourselves, because the honorable Senator has given us notice that if we do not behave well he shall certainly apply a corrective; and I think that is a better way to govern a school than to flog them at first. [Laughter.]

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President, I do not participate at all in this feeling which is manifested here between different Senators. I only look at the merits of this resolution as a general proposition offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to adopt a new rule, virtually placing the committees of this body under the direction of the Departments which we may wish to examine into, making it peremptory, whenever a committee is organized in this body to inquire in reference to any matter in any Department of this Government, to send to that Department and receive its attorneys before the committee.

If the Floyd transaction or the case of a clerk of the Interior Department, as during the administration of Thompson, and the purloining of Indian trust bonds by the hundred thousand were to be examined into by a committee of this body, the first thing peremptory upon the committee under this resolution would be to send to those Departments and bring before the committee the attorneys of the parties implicated!

Now, sir, I have some confidence in the action of this body and of its committees. I am opposed to such a rule. In regard to the particular committee which has called for this resolution, I have no knowledge. I have no desire to embarrass that committee more than any other, and I would say to my friend from Wisconsin in all kindness, that if great harm has resulted from the speech made by the Senator from New Hampshire two years ago, and the remarks to which he gave utterance at that time were so objectionable, it seems to me it cannot make them any better to keep reading them day after day in the Senate. Possibly the country might have forgotten those execrable expressions of the Senator from New Hampshire if they had not been repeated to us so often. However, if some good is to result from their repetition, I suppose it is proper that they should be repeated and the Senator from New Hampshire held responsible for them.

But, sir, it is in regard to this resolution that I desired to speak. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] yesterday on this resolution went into an elaborate defense of the Navy Department; and I will take occasion here to say that I have as much confidence in the Navy Department of this Government as in any of its Departments. I believe that Department has been managed with signal ability, notwithstanding the complaints which have been made. It is possible that contractors may have defrauded the Department; but I have not the slightest suspicion that the head of that Department is in any way implicated in any contracts or frauds. I believe, with the Senator from Wisconsin, that he is as much opposed to them as any of us. I will not undertake to say whether the criticism of the Senator from Wisconsin upon those who have not got office and have not obtained contracts is just. He seems to suppose that all these complaints come from disappointed office-holders and disappointed contractors. Did it never enter the mind of the Senator from Wisconsin that contractors and office-holders themselves are likely to be a little biased also? Did it never enter into his mind that the contractor who is defrauding the Government might have a little bias upon his mind against an investigation as well as the disappointed contractor in favor of it?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Does my friend from Illinois suppose that I asked that a contractor should be sent before the committee?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Not at all.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What then is the purpose of the inquiry?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will tell the Senator. I understood him to denounce these investigations; that they were got up by disappointed contractors and office-holders. I merely wanted to remind my friend—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to correct the honorable Senator. I said no such thing. I did not say that these investigations were got up by disappointed office-seekers or contractors either. I say it is these disappointed office-seekers and contractors that come to members of Congress filling their ears with these stories of what they have received at the hands of the Government, and many of these stories are false and exaggerated—not that the Senate got up these committees of investigations to accommodate those men at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It seems then that they are only the originators of the complaints in the opinion of the Senator from Wisconsin. That may be so, and doubtless many of the accusations are false; but I tell the Senator from Wisconsin, and the friends of the Administration and of the Government, that nothing is to be made by undertaking to hide or cover iniquity, and this attempt to—

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I am not disposed to allow my honorable friend to place me in a false position. Have I said anything in favor of hiding or covering up any transaction? Not at all, sir; not at all. I have said that I believed, for the purpose of obtaining the truth, it will serve the Government better that the head of the Department who knows all the facts, or has persons who do know all the facts as to the transactions of the Department, should detail some one to sit with a committee that know nothing about them; for I confess that I do not know anything about the transactions of the Navy Department.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator from Illinois will allow me just here, to my personal knowledge I know that the chief of the Navy Department has been desiring for the last two years to have just such an investigation as this that has been moved by the Senator from New Hampshire, the chairman of the Naval Committee, on this identical subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have no doubt of it. I should expect it, from the opinion I entertain of the head of the Navy Department; and I think it is an over-zeal on the part of some gentlemen to undertake to oppose these investigations. The Senator from Wisconsin tells us he is not disposed to cover up anything. What is the purport of his whole speech? Why is it that he comes in here denouncing men who are not office-holders, and who have not got contracts, except it is to prevent investigation? As a true friend of the Government and of the Administration, I believe, as the Senator from Iowa has remarked, that they will court an investigation into any charges that may be made against their fidelity or honesty in managing the Departments, and I will not take it for granted that a committee of this body is inspired by hostility to any Department in its investigation. I will not assume that.

This resolution is brought into the Senate, it seems, before the committee has ever met. I concur entirely with what the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has said. If, when this committee meets, in the opinion of the committee, or any member of the committee, matters are being investigated about which the Department should be advised, and it is desirable to have a resolution passed to allow the head of the Department or any of his officers to appear before the committee, I will go with the Senator from Wisconsin for it. But why this sensitiveness in advance? I believe that nothing wrong will be found that will reach the head of the Department at all. There may be wrong in some of the ramifications of the Department. It would be wonderful if in the expenditure of one hundred millions of money annually no frauds and corruptions were practiced by the numerous agents that have to be employed in the expenditure; but that it goes to the head of the Department I do not believe. I have heard nobody make any such accusation.

Whenever such facts are developed as justify any member of this body, acting on his responsibility as a representative of one of the States of the Union, in coming forward with a resolution to investigate a transaction which he believes to be wrong, I am for giving him his committee and allowing a fair opportunity for investigation, and I will not assume in advance that that investigation is to be an attack on the Administration or any Department of the Administration; and I do not believe that the Navy Department so regard this investigation.

I trust that no such resolution as this will be adopted. I regard it as a reflection upon the committees of the Senate, upon ourselves; but I say to the Senator from Wisconsin, if, when this committee is organized, it is made to appear to the Senate that information cannot be had from the Departments, or that it is desirable to have any of the officers of the Departments before the committee and they cannot be obtained, which I do not believe, for I think there is no difficulty—I think every committee has got along without the least difficulty in all these investigations with the Departments; I have always been so informed—but if difficulty does arise and the information cannot be obtained, or injustice is likely to be done to any Department of the Government for want of an opportunity to explain its transactions, the Senator from Wisconsin can have my vote any time to bring the proper facts before the Senate. However, I would not do this in advance by a general rule which looks like a reflection on our committees, and which, it seems to me, is wholly unnecessary.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will move that this resolution be postponed until Monday next; and the special order of the day, on which the honorable Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] has the floor, can then come up.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLISTMENTS IN THE ARMY.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The special order of the day, being the bill (S. No. 41) to promote enlistments in the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend that bill by substituting for it the amendment I send to the Chair.

The VICEPRESIDENT. The question now before the Senate is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. HENDERSON,] which will be read, after which the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts will be in order.

The Secretary read the amendment, which was in section three, line five, after the word "he" to strike out the words "his mother, and his wife and children," and after the word "notwithstanding," in the seventh line, to insert:

And his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862.

So that the whole section will read as follows:

That when any person of African descent whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he shall forever thereafter be free, any law, usage, or custom to the contrary notwithstanding; and his mother, his wife, and children shall also be free, provided that by the laws of any State they owe service or labor to any person or persons who have given aid or comfort to the existing rebellion against the Government since July 17, 1862; and all laws and parts of laws inconsistent herewith are hereby repealed.

The VICEPRESIDENT. Upon this question the Senator from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the bill now before the Senate presents not only the question of the employment of negroes in the military service of the United States, but also in my judgment the question of the emancipation of the whole negro race in this country. The second section of the bill provides that all persons of African descent who have been or may be hereafter employed in the military or naval service shall receive the same uniform, pay, arms, and equipments as other soldiers of the regular or volunteer forces of the United States other than bounty. The third section provides that "when any person of African descent whose service or labor is claimed in any State under the laws thereof, shall be mustered into the military or naval service of the United States, he, his mother, his wife, and children, shall forever thereafter be free." It is manifest, Mr. President, that if a slave is employed in the military service the inevitable result of that employment is emancipation. It would appear to be just, when a slave renders military service and exposes his life in a civil war like this, that it should inure to the benefit of his wife, his mother, and his children. It is equally clear that if by the laws of war all slaves who enter into the military service in the southern States, and all who are connected with them by the ties of blood shall be emancipated, the tenure of slavery in this country would become so uncertain as to result in universal emancipation. I will, therefore, treat this proposition according to its logical effect, and as involving the emancipation of the negro race in this country.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me a moment? I had proposed, in order to avoid raising that question just now, to amend the entire act by striking out the whole bill, and simply providing to pay the negro troops now in the field, as there is a great deal of suffering in regard to it, great discouragement as to enlisting, and to let the other matter stand to some future day. If the Senator chooses to debate the bill, however, very well.

Mr. SHERMAN. In my view of the subject, this will make very little difference, because I believe that the employment of negro slaves in the southern States will result in emancipation in all those States, and as the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to employ negro slaves in the Army and Navy, and to invite them by bounties, by high pay, by uniform, by all the inducements now held out to our own soldiers and sailors, the result will be universal emancipation in this country. I therefore prefer to discuss all these kindred propositions as a whole.

Has Congress or the President power to employ slaves in the military service? Can we emancipate them either as a punishment of rebels, or as a reward for military service? If these powers exist, to what extent and in what way should we exercise them? These questions present the most difficult problem of the war, which requires in its solution more than human wisdom. I certainly would not engage in the discussion did not the responsibility of my position require me to meet them as practical questions of legislation. For many years this Senate Chamber has rung with angry discussions on the slavery question. The most eloquent, the most gifted, the wise, the learned, each and all of the great names that have adorned American history in Convention and in either House of Congress, have expended their eloquence, their learning, all the artillery of excited debate on the slavery question as it affected a single slave or an unpopulated Territory. It devolves upon us now to pass upon a guarantee, a pledge, which if made, honor and public faith will never hereafter allow the nation to withdraw; a pledge which, if redeemed, will directly emancipate a majority of the slaves in this country, and in its logical consequence within a short time will make every human being within our limits free, unless he forfeits his freedom by his crime. In the discussion of such a question it becomes vital that we carefully examine our powers. The race whose military service we require has yielded forced labor, unrequited toil to ours for generations. If we induce them to incur the risk of death and wounds in war upon the promise of emancipation, and do not redeem that promise, we add perjury to wrong. The soldier who has worn our uniform and served under our flag must not hereafter labor as a slave. Nor would it be tolerable that his wife, his mother, or his child should be the property of another. The instinctive feeling of every man of generous impulse would revolt at such a spectacle. The guarantee of freedom for himself, his mother, his wife, and his child is the inevitable incident of the employment of a slave as a soldier. If you have not the power, or do not mean to emancipate him and those with whom he is connected by domestic ties, then in the name of God and humanity do not employ him as a soldier. Let him in his servitude at least be free from the danger incident to a free man. If I had doubts about the power to emancipate the slave for military service, I certainly would not vote to employ him as a soldier.

And so vast a subject as this deserves the dignity of a separate bill. The Military Committee have unwisely incumbered this bill with provisions about adjutants, quartermasters, and other minor details of legislation. The guarantee of freedom has annexed to it no provision to secure it. No details are given. We know that the relation of husband and wife is not recognized with slaves, and yet this relation is spoken of as a measure of emancipation. Who is the wife of a slave? If reference is had to local law it declares that a slave can have no wife, and if you mean to make this guarantee effective you must define who shall be considered the wife of the slave. It is one of the worst features of the system of slavery that a man who will render you military service under this bill is not recognized by the law as the father of children; but the children follow the condition of their mother. Who will be held to be the children of the slaves who may fight and die in your service? This bill does not define them. A great act of emancipation like this, intended to have effects upon future generations, certainly should have more ample provisions to secure its execution, and should be clothed in such language as to show that we appreciate the dignity and importance of such legislation. If we examine this bill we find that it is not only incomplete in its details, but that it merely modifies existing legislation. By the act of July 17, 1862, we authorized the President to employ persons of African descent in the military and naval service. So careless were we in legislating upon this subject that on the same day in separate bills we passed provisions upon this subject almost identical, and yet these provisions contain no details. We must then look to the present law in order to determine whether any further legislation is needed. The principal difference between this bill and the law as it stands is that this bill includes the slaves and their relatives of loyal masters in adhering States, and yet contains no provision for their compensation.

In the view I shall take of this matter, it is indispensable that in adhering States where slaves of loyal citizens are taken for the public service, provision must be made for their compensation. Heretofore in practice, the Secretary of War has appropriated the bounty paid in for substitutes to the purchase of negro slaves; but this has been done in the absence of legislation from the necessity of the case. Surely in treating so vast a subject we ought to make the law simple, plain, effective, and complete.

Nor ought we to leave the question of the emancipation of slaves who serve in our armies to rest solely on the President's proclamation. Some of the ablest lawyers in this country have declared that the President has no power to proclaim the emancipation of the slaves. This power has not been settled by any court or tribunal, and has been denied not only by political parties, but by able lawyers who are friends of the Administration. It is difficult to perceive in the Constitution of the United States where he derives this power. In his recent message he casts doubts upon the subject, and invites interference by the courts. This proclamation was never sanctioned by Congress, and can only have effect so far as it is executive. It cannot have effect upon slaves who are not brought within its operation during actual hostilities. The exceptions contained in this proclamation make it partial and ineffective. If executed in the seceding States it impairs the value of slaves in loyal States, and yet leaves slavery an existing institution.

If negroes of the southern States, as they are now gathering about our banner, fight for us nobly and well, if they prove by their courage that they are capable of being free men, they should be free. They are now on trial. My sympathies are not necessarily with the negro race; but if the negro now shows by his courage, by his capacity, by his endurance, by his bravery, that he is able to win his freedom and maintain it, then I wish to secure him that freedom by all the sanctions of law, and not to rest it upon the uncertain tenure of a President's proclamation. We are here independent of the President; it is our duty to examine critically the question of his powers and the effect of his acts.

And, sir, we must not forget that the President who issued this proclamation may abrogate it; he may modify it, or extend the exceptions by a new amnesty. We know that he entered upon this path of emancipation only after the country became wearied and almost exhausted under the unnatural protection extended by his officers to slavery. We know that when General Fremont, early in the war, refused to surrender slaves to rebel masters and by proclamation emancipated slaves who came within his lines, the President set aside his proclamation and extended his confidence only to those who protected the property, even of open public enemies, in their slaves. When General Hunter issued his proclamation in South Carolina, where, if anywhere, such a proclamation could be justified, in the presence of the enemy, in the nest of secession, in the sight of the worst rebels of the country, the President set aside that proclamation. When we were legislating here in anxious deliberation, and finally concluded that it was our duty to emancipate the slaves of the leading rebels in the southern States, those who held high offices, and not only to emancipate their slaves but to confiscate their land and other property, our legislation was suspended, and we were compelled to change it and modify it at the desire of the President, and in that way to destroy the vitality of our legislation. We must also remember that within one month before the first proclamation of emancipation was issued the President ridiculed his power to emancipate slaves, and a common remark was attributed to him that such a proclamation on his part would amount to nothing more than the Pope's bull against the comet.

So far was this conservatism carried—for I will call it by the name its friends choose for it—that the political party to which the President belongs lost every election that fall. Ohio is now represented in the other House of Congress by thirteen gentlemen who certainly do not represent the opinion of the majority of her people, and who owe their seats entirely to the discouragement caused by the mode in which the war was then conducted. The whole of this state of feeling grew out of the backwardness of the President in meeting this question of emancipation and the employment of negroes in this war. We must also remember that the exceptions contained in the President's proclamation very much impair the value of the proclamation, even if it should be sustained by the courts. It has never yet been tested in a single tribunal; no judge has ever yet pronounced in favor of its validity. No constitutional provision can be pointed out to sustain its power. Men have doubts about it. Under these circumstances, can you expect the negroes of the southern States who are informed upon the subject to rally around your banner? Or if, as I know they are, they are ignorant and take your promise for your power, I ask you whether you are willing to let them risk their lives upon the basis of a proclamation on the validity of which you yourselves have doubts, especially if you have the power by law to sanction that proclamation and to give it validity.

We must remember that the Executive is but one branch of the Government. His powers are defined by the Constitution. They are simply executive. He can neither make nor suspend the operation of a law. In time of war he is Commander-in-Chief of our Army and Navy; but is this power sufficient to change the laws of States and communities, or do they extend beyond the lines of our armies, and especially will they extend into the future peaceful times which we hope may soon come upon us? I shall hereafter endeavor to show that Congress is invested with clear power to guaranty emancipation to slaves who enter our armies; but where can such a power be found for the President? Even if, in the opinion of Senators, the proclamation is effective, if it has the power and efficacy of law, it is our duty to give to that proclamation the sanction of the legislative authority. We must, by some act carefully conceived and carefully worded, give additional sanction to that proclamation. If you have the power to arm slaves, and if they fight for you, you must make them free, and if you guaranty their freedom you must adhere to that guarantee to the bitter end. The idea of getting these poor ignorant Africans into our service, calling upon them to risk their lives for us, to be slaughtered in our civil war, and then not to secure them emancipation, would be the height of injustice. If the negro fights for us his freedom must be secured if we have it in our power to secure it. I would never authorize a single slave to be employed in this civil war unless I had the power to emancipate him. Why, sir, if you put him in your ranks, and make him fight for you, and then do not give him liberty, you treat him worse than the meanest slaveholder that ever lived. The slaveowners only rob him of his wages; they only take from him the sweat of his brow; but if you take his life and then do not secure to him and to his children their freedom, you do him a still greater wrong.

Have we this power, and if so whence is it derived and to what extent can we execute it? The power to emancipate a slave by Congress or the President certainly does not exist in time of peace. This is an axiom in American politics. The Second Congress, upon the petition of Benjamin Franklin, declared that the national Legislature had no power over slavery in the States. The declaration has been repeated by almost every Congress since that time. No political party that has ever been organized in this country has claimed the power of interfering with slavery in the States. At the very last session of Congress before this war broke out the House of Representatives, by a unanimous vote, declared that Congress had no power to emancipate slaves, and no power over the subject of slavery in the States. It was so declared by the President; it was so declared in the Chicago platform. It is, as I have said, an axiom in American politics that Congress has no power over slavery in the slaveholding States; that slavery is simply a local institution protected by local law, having existence commensurate only with that local law; that Congress has no power over it whatever except as that power grows out of the enforcement of the provision of the Constitution of the United States for the recapture of fugitive slaves. This, I believe, is admitted on all hands. If, therefore, we have power to emancipate, we must derive it from some other source, and not from the ordinary powers of Congress in time of peace.

It is equally clear that the existence of a mere insurrection in our country will not justify interference with slavery. This has been settled now by many cases in our courts. I have listened very often to the argument made by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. Davis] on this point, but the difficulty with him—and I submit it to his judgment, for I intend to appeal to his candor to-day—is that he does not distinguish between insurrection and war. The line is broad and deep. We have had some insurrections in this country, but we have never before had a civil war. There was an insurrection in Massachusetts, Shay's rebellion, before the formation of the Constitution, growing out of the depressed condition of industry. That was simply an insurrection, a rising of ignorant men against the authorities of the State of Massachusetts. It was put down partly by judicial proceedings and partly by mild force. Then we had an insurrection in western Pennsylvania, called the whisky insurrection. A large body of armed men were called out, but it was finally put down rather by marshals and constables than by military force.

My friend from Kentucky says they had one in Massachusetts in the Burns case; and he has arraigned the Senator from Massachusetts for some complicity in that matter. The Burns case was a mere mob, a mutiny, if you please; but suppose it was an insurrection, what then? Insurrection is not war, as I shall show by the authorities; very far from it. We had an insurrection, or what I may call an insurrection, in Kansas when the people of Missouri invaded the Territory of Kansas. Armed men marched over from that State into an infant Territory, seizing upon their ballot-box, and controlling the operations of their government. That was an insurrection, and none the less an insurrection because the executive authorities of the country sustained and sanctioned it, to their dishonor. It was an insurrection against the laws, but it was not war; very far from it. We had a kind of insurrection, an émeute, in Utah; but it never rose to the dignity of war. It was simply a dissatisfaction on the part of the people there with the acts of certain executive authorities, and resistance to those acts; but the resistance disappeared on the approach of a military force. It was at most insurrection. To show that this distinction is laid down in the law-books, I will refer to Mr. Lawrence's recent edition of Wheaton's International Law. In a note on page 522 it is said:

"Publicists distinguish between popular commotion (émotion populaire) or tumultuous assemblage, which may be directed against the magistrates or merely against individuals; sedition, (sédition), applying to a formal disobedience particularly directed against the magistrates or other depositaries of public authority; and insurrection, (soulevement), which extends to great numbers in a city or province, so that even the sovereign is no longer obeyed; and civil war. Popular commotion, sedition, and insurrection are all State crimes, even though arising from just causes of complaint; every violent measure being interdicted in civil society. These cases are always supposed to be susceptible of being suppressed by the sovereign; and it is usual, in doing so, to grant an amnesty in all but exceptional cases."

"A civil war is when a party arises in a State which no longer obeys the sovereign and is sufficiently strong to make head against him, or when, in a republic, the nation is divided into two opposite sections, and both sides take up arms. Usage applies the term civil war to every war between members of the same political society. If it is between a part of the citizens on the one side and the sovereign and those who obey him on the other, it is sufficient that the malcontents have some reason to take up arms in order that the disturbances should be called civil war, and not rebellion. The prince never fails to call all his subjects who openly resist him rebels; but when the latter become sufficiently strong to make head against him, to compel him to carry on war regularly against them, he must be contented with the term civil war. Civil war breaks the bonds of society and of the Government; it gives rise in a nation to two independent parties, who acknowledge no common judge. They are in the position of two nations who engage in disputes, and, not being able to reconcile them, have recourse to arms. The common laws of war are in civil wars to be observed on both sides. The same reasons which make them obligatory between foreign States render them more necessary in the unhappy circumstances where two exasperated parties are destroying their common country."

It will be necessary for Senators to keep in view these distinctions, because upon them rests the whole argument in this case. Civil war is where an insurrection has assumed such power and strength as to invoke armies, when victories and defeats alternate, when the matter ceases to be a mere insurrection or rising against the civil authority, and when marshals and constables are no longer necessary, but armies must be called upon to decide the conflict. The law of 1795 defines what an insurrection is. I have not the law before me, but the words are familiar. In such cases, the President must call out the militia of the State, through its Governor, the riot act must be read, and various precautions are prescribed; constables and marshals must be employed to a certain extent; notice must be given to the insurgents; and they must be dispersed in that way, if possible. The law of 1795 provides the manner in which an insurrection shall be treated, but when the insurrection assumes the magnitude of civil war, other laws must govern; the law of 1795 ceases to apply; and THE LAWS OF WAR as recognized among the civilized and Christian nations of the world must then decide the contest.

It is sometimes difficult to ascertain when an insurrection melts into rebellion, and when a rebellion assumes the proportions of civil war is often difficult of ascertainment; but in the present case, the character of the struggle in which we are engaged has been ascertained and definitively settled by every department of the Government. The Supreme Court of the United States has already declared that this is no longer an insurrection, but a civil war. Every department of the Government concurs that this is a civil war and not an insurrection. When the President of the United States originally called out seventy-five thousand volunteers he treated it partly as an insurrection and partly as a civil war—a kind of incongruous condition not easily understood; but Congress, as soon as it convened, treated it as a civil war, authorized the employment of half a million men, and called it war. The President issued a proclamation declaring a blockade, a thing not known as against insurgents. Finally, the decision of the Supreme Court in the prize cases during the December term, 1862, declared that it was civil war and not insurrection. I will read a short extract from that decision; and I shall have occasion to refer to it frequently:

"This greatest of civil wars was not gradually developed by popular commotion, tumultuous assemblies, or local unorganized insurrections. However long may have been its previous conception, it nevertheless sprang forth suddenly from the parent brain, a Minerva in the full panoply of war. The President was bound to meet it in the shape it presented itself, without waiting for Congress to baptize it with a name; and no name given to it by him or them could change the fact."

"It is not the less a civil war, with belligerent parties in hostile array, because it may be called an 'insurrection' by one side, and the insurgents be considered as rebels or traitors. It is not necessary that the independence of the revolted province or State be acknowledged in order to constitute it a party belligerent in a war, according to the law of nations."—2 Black's Reports, page 669.

The decision goes on upon that basis, treats these rebels as we commonly call them, these enemies, as enemies in war, open war, to be put down according to the laws of war. That point was, however, previously settled by another tribunal. We are one of the family of nations. Great Britain, with a hasty indecency, before the facts were known, when our minister was on his way to take his place at that court, a minister whose very name should have commanded the respect of Great Britain, recognized the insurgents as belligerents; and France followed her example. By that fact we are bound, as one of the family of nations; and after that acknowledgment by Great Britain and France we dared not treat the rebels as simple insurgents, but we were bound to wage the war against them according to the laws of war. Each nation must decide this question of belligerent for itself. Great Britain did decide it; France decided it; and we have concurred in that decision. Every department of this Government has held the insurgents to be belligerents, entitled to the benefit of the laws of war, and the war must be waged against them according to the laws of civilized nations.

I have heard in this Senate Chamber very often the ridiculous idea that these people are our erring brethren, insurgents, whom it is our duty to conciliate with kindness. That is no longer their condition. They are enemies, and we are bound to treat them as enemies. We are bound to wage war against them according to the laws of war. We dare not treat them as insurgents. If Jefferson Davis should be captured to-morrow he would be a prisoner of war, and we dare not, according to the laws of war, until we put down all opposing force, hang him as a traitor. That very principle was decided early in this war in the case of General Buckner. Buckner was not only a traitor to his country, the United States at large, but he was a traitor to Kentucky. He had inveigled the young men of that State into an organization, and finally led them off into the armies of the rebels. He was a traitor to Kentucky as well as to the United States, and the authorities of Kentucky demanded him for trial, but the national authorities very properly said that he was no longer an insurgent, and could not be treated by them according to the laws of Kentucky, but he must be treated as an enemy, a prisoner of war, according to the laws of war, to be exchanged in due time, and he was exchanged.

We can no longer, then, consider these men as insurgents; and Senators who talk about them as erring brethren who must be coaxed and wheedled and brought back to our embraces to their old place in the Union by anything but force of arms, misunderstand the legal relation that now exists between us and these enemies. They are no longer erring brethren. We, as members of a common community, owe that community obedience, allegiance, love, and affection, and we are bound as citizens to treat the open enemies of our country as our personal enemies.

Mr. President, the effect of civil war in substituting new laws for our Government is stated very clearly by Vattel, and at the risk of being wearisome I will read an extract:

"A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies, and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as thenceforward constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Though one of the parties may have been to blame in breaking the unity of the State and resisting the lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact. Besides, who shall judge them? who shall pronounce on which side the right or wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. They stand therefore in precisely the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest, and, being unable to come to an agreement, have recourse to arms."—Vattel, page 425.

The Constitution of the United States now furnishes no guide. There are no rules prescribed in the Constitution pointing out how we shall treat public enemies who are regarded as such. The Constitution only deals with people in a state of peace, or, at most, in a state of insurrection. It does not define our relations or our duties to enemies. When these people assumed the power and position of enemies, you could no longer look in the Constitution of the United States, or to the laws made in pursuance thereof, for the mode and manner in which you should treat them. This principle is clearly laid down in the laws of nations. By their unity, by their vigor, by their strength they have won the position of enemies, and you cannot treat them as insurgents. Civilized society would not allow you to treat these enemies, who by their vigor and courage have held you at bay for nearly three years, as common insurgents or traitors and felons. You must treat them as enemies. The legal consequences that grow out of this relation I shall follow up hereafter.

The same doctrine which I have quoted from Vattel is laid down in Wheaton's International Law, a work of more modern date, but I will not read the quotation. It is also laid down by the Supreme Court in the decision to which I have already referred, and from which I shall take the liberty of reading another extract. The counsel for the defendants insisted that these people in the South were simply insurgents, and that therefore the blockade, which was the matter in controversy, was not legal. The Supreme Court, after repeating the arguments of the counsel, go on to say:

"This argument rests on the assumption of two propositions, each of which is without foundation on the established law of nations. It assumes that where a civil war exists, the party belligerent claiming to be sovereign cannot, for some unknown reason, exercise the rights of belligerents, although the revolutionary party may. Being sovereign, he can exercise only sovereign rights over the other party."

This is an argument I have heard adduced over and over again in the Senate.

"The insurgent may be killed on the battle-field, or by the executioner; his property on land may be confiscated under the municipal law; but the commerce on the ocean, which supplies the rebels with means to support the war, cannot be made the subject of capture under the laws of war, because it is 'unconstitutional.' Now, it is a proposition never doubted, that the belligerent party who claims to be sovereign may exercise both belligerent and sovereign rights, (see 4 Cr., 272.) Treating the other party as a belligerent, and using only the milder modes of coercion which the law of nations has introduced to mitigate the rigors of war, cannot be a subject of complaint by the party to whom it is accorded as a grace or granted as a necessity. We have shown that a civil war such as that now waged between the northern and southern States is properly conducted according to the humane regulations of public law as regards captures on the ocean."

"Under the very peculiar constitution of this Government, although the citizens owe supreme allegiance to the Federal Government, they owe also a qualified allegiance to the State in which they are domiciled. Their persons and property are subject to its laws."

"Hence, in organizing this rebellion, they have acted as States claiming to be sovereign over all persons and property within their respective limits, and asserting a right to absolve their citizens from their allegiance to the Federal Government. Several of these States have combined to form a new confederacy, claiming to be acknowledged by the world as a sovereign State. Their right to do so is now being decided by wagers of battle. The ports and territory of each of these States are held in hostility to the General Government. It is no loose, unorganized insurrection, having no defined boundary or possession. It has a boundary marked by lines of bayonets, and which can be crossed only by force; south of this line is enemy's territory, because it is claimed and held in possession by an organized, hostile, and belligerent power."

The doctrine is here laid down distinctly that an insurgent may be killed on the battle-field or by the executioner, that his property on land may be confiscated under the municipal law, and his property on the ocean may be seized and taken as that of a public enemy. The particular case was one of seizure on the ocean, and the seizure was held to be legal, and the property was divided among the captors according to our law for the distribution of captures taken from the public enemies.

Now, Mr. President, let us apply these principles to the bill before us. We are in war. Have we the right in war as against public enemies to emancipate their slaves? Have we a right according to the laws of war to employ the slaves of our own citizens in arms against the public enemy? Have we a right in accordance with the laws of war to emancipate them and their families, those that are connected with them by domestic ties? These are the questions. I have already passed over the principal difficulty in the way, and that is the argument so often made that we are restrained from doing this because these enemies are our fellow-citizens. I have shown you that the men in rebellion have won a position beyond the reach of your Constitution; that our war with them must be tested by the laws of war; and these questions must be decided by the laws of war as recognized and practiced among civilized nations in ancient and modern times. That is the position which I hold.

Then, by the laws of war, have we a right to arm our own slaves, and to arm the slaves of our enemies and emancipate them? Now, sir, I say that there never was a country in the world, in ancient or modern times, which held slaves, that did not at some period of its history arm them, and employ them against the common enemy; and there never was a case where, when those slaves were so employed, they were not emancipated. This proposition, I think, will be sustained by the most careful examination of history. Slaves fought for the Greeks on the battle-field of Marathon; and to the credit of the Athenians they were emancipated for their services. The Spartans marched with their Helots into the battle-field. The Thessalian mountain Penestæ were bond-servants. There were many slaves on board of the Athenian fleet at the successful naval engagement before the islands Arginusæ, and as the honor of the victory belonged to them, it is to the credit of the Athenians that they emancipated them and invested them with all the rights of Platæan citizenship. The Helots attended the Carthaginians as light-armed troops; and on the battle-field of Platæa there were thirty-five thousand Helots to five thousand Spartans. The warlike habits of the Thessalians imposed upon their slaves the duty of following them to the army. During the Peloponnesian war a single citizen of Thessaly put twelve thousand of them at the disposal of Athens. And when Jason of Pheræ strove to gain the ascendancy over Greece, he counted upon the slaves to equip the vessels with which he disputed the empire of the seas with the Athenians.

The right of emancipation denied to individuals was exercised by the State. The supreme authority and traces of its exercise pervade the entire history of Sparta. Seven hundred Helots were raised to the rank of Hoplites and placed under Brasidas as general, who employed them to aid in the conquest of the cities of Thrace. Three or four hundred Athenians were, a little later, sent to the succor of Syracuse, and when Epaminondas threatened the Spartans at their own hearthstones they brought out as auxiliaries a thousand recently emancipated Helots. According to Xenophon, liberty was offered to all those who volunteered to defend the republic, and in an instant more than six thousand were enrolled. During the protracted and often renewed wars between the Spartans and the Athenians slaves were much employed as help to one belligerent or hindrance to another. Thus we learn from Xenophon that when the Spartan general Callicratidas had captured the town of Methymna, in Lesbos, the whole of the property there was plundered by the soldiers, but all the slaves Callicratidas collected into the market-place, and when his allies urged him to sell the Methymnæans also, he said that while he was commander none of the Greeks should be enslaved so far as he could prevent it. The next day he set at liberty the freemen and the Athenian garrison, and sold all the slaves that were of servile origin.

I know that many denominated slaves among the Greeks were not strictly slaves, according to our meaning of that term, but they were servitors. I cannot stop to define the various kinds of servitude known to Greece in ancient times, but it appears that all the grades of slaves or servitors fought for or against their masters, and in all cases won their freedom by so doing. I shall not stop now to discuss the difference between the slaves of Greece and our own slaves, because I shall be able to quote more pertinent examples. My purpose is only to show that among the Greeks in all their wars, civil and foreign, on land and at sea, slaves were employed as soldiers, and were always emancipated as the result of their employment.

The Romans did the same from the very foundation of their Government. In the palmiest days of the Roman republic they employed their slaves as soldiers. There are many cases which I might adduce; but there is one to which I will take the liberty of referring particularly. In the war between the Romans and the Carthaginians, which was a desperate war for life or death, things assumed that position after the battle of Cannæ that the Romans had either to submit to the Carthaginians or the Carthaginians to the Romans. There was no longer room enough in this little world of ours for those two rival nations, very much the same condition in which we are now placed. Livy tells us:

"The urgent necessity and the scarcity of men of free condition occasioned their adopting a new mode of raising soldiers, and in an extraordinary manner. They purchased, with the public money, eight thousand stout young slaves, asking each whether he was willing to serve in the wars; and then gave them arms."

And they did serve, and were emancipated. In the same war, at a later period, under Tiberius Sempronius:

"In the mean time Tiberius Sempronius, the Roman consul, after performing the purification of his army at Sinuesæ, where he had appointed them to assemble, crossed the river Volturnus and encamped at Liternum. As he had in this post no employment for his arms, he obliged the soldiers frequently to go through their exercise that the recruits, of whom the greatest part were volunteer slaves, might learn from practice to follow the standards and to know their own centuries in the field. In the midst of these employments the general's principal care was, and he accordingly gave charges to the lieutenants general and tribunes, that 'no reproach east on any one on account of his former condition should sow discord among the troops; that the veteran soldier should be satisfied at being put on a level with the recruit, the free man with the volunteer slave; that they should account every one sufficiently honorable and well-born to whom the Roman people intrusted their arms and standards; observing that, whatever measures fortune made it necessary to adopt, it was equally necessary to support these when adopted.'"

I think this is very wise and pregnant advice even to the people of our own time. Still another case, to show how these soldiers fought in battle when the idea of liberty was held out to them. In the same war, under Quintus Fabius:

"The legions which he had with him consisted mostly of volunteer slaves who had chosen rather to merit their liberty in silence, by the service of a second year, than to request it openly. He had observed, however, as he was leaving his winter quarters, that the troops on their march began to murmur, asking whether 'they were ever to serve as free citizens?' He had, however, written to the senate, insisting not so much on their wishes as on their merits, declaring that 'he had ever found them faithful and brave in the service; and that, excepting a free condition, they wanted no qualification of complete soldiers.' Authority was given him to act in that business as he himself should judge conducive to the good of the public. Before he resolved upon coming to an engagement, therefore, he gave public notice that the time was 'now come when they might obtain the liberty which they had so long wished for; that he intended next day to engage the enemy in regular battle, in a clear, open plain, where, without any fear of stratagems, the business might be decided by the mere dint of valor. Every man then who should bring home the head of an enemy, he would instantly, by his own authority, set free; and every one who should retreat from his post he would punish in the same manner as a slave. Every man's lot now depended upon his own exertion; and, as security for their obtaining their freedom, not he himself stood pledged, but the Consul Marcellus, and even the whole senate, who, having been consulted by him on the subject of their freedom, had authorized him to determine in the case.' He then read the consul's letter and the decree of the senate, on which a universal shout of joy was raised. They eagerly demanded the fight, and ardently pressed him to give the signal instantly. Gracchus gave notice that they should be gratified on the following day, and then dismissed the assembly. The soldiers, exulting with joy, especially those who were to receive liberty as the price of their active efforts for one day, spent the rest of their time until night in getting their arms in readiness."

I intend to follow out this occasion, and show the effect of the promise of emancipation on those slaves, who were blacks, as will appear in the course of the narrative:

"Next day, as soon as the trumpets began to sound to battle, the above-mentioned men, the first of all, assembled round the general's quarters, ready and marshaled for the fight. At sunrise Gracchus led out his troops to the field, nor did the enemy hesitate to meet him. Their force consisted of seventeen thousand foot, mostly Britanni and Lucanians, and twelve thousand horse, among whom were very few Italians. Almost all the rest were Numidians and Moors."

If there is any distinction on account of color, we here have the case of Numidians and Moors fighting for their liberty.

A SENATOR. They were not negroes.

MR. SHERMAN. The distinction between them and negroes I leave to others whose sight is very refined.

"The conflict was fierce and long; during hours neither side gained any advantage, and no circumstance proved a greater impediment to the success of the Romans than from the heads of the enemy being made the price of liberty; for when any had valiantly slain an opponent he lost time, first in cutting off the head, which could not be readily effected in the midst of the crowd and tumult, and then his right hand being employed in securing it, the bravest ceased to take part in the fight, and the contest devolved on the inactive and dastardly. The military tribunes now represented to Gracchus that the soldiers were not employed in wounding any of the enemy who stood on their legs, but in maiming those who had fallen; and instead of their own swords in their hands they carried the heads of the slain. On which he commanded them to give orders with all haste that 'they should throw away the heads and attack the enemy; that their courage was sufficiently evident and conspicuous, and that such brave men need not doubt of liberty.' The fight was then revived, and the cavalry also were ordered to charge; these were briskly encountered by the Numidians, and the battle of the horse was maintained with no less vigor than that of the foot; so that the event of the day again became doubtful, while the commanders on both sides vilified their adversaries in the most contemptuous terms; the Roman speaking to his soldiers of the Lucanians and Britanni as men so often defeated and subdued by their ancestors; and the Carthaginian of the Romans as slaves, soldiers taken out of the work-house. At last Gracchus proclaimed that his men had no room to hope for liberty unless the enemy were routed that day and driven off the field.

"These words so effectually inflamed their courage that, as if they had been suddenly transformed into other men, they renewed the shout and bore down on the enemy with an impetuosity which it was impossible long to withstand. First the Carthaginian vanguard, then the battalions, were thrown into confusion; at last the whole line was forced to give way; they then plainly turned their backs and fled precipitately into their camps, in such terror and dismay that none of them made a stand, even at the gates or on the rampart."—Baker's Livy's Rome, vol. 3.

The Romans gained a complete victory, and Tiberius Gracchus in an imposing spectacle, which is here described at great length, gave them their freedom and secured it to them forever. It was afterwards secured permanently by a decree of the Roman senate. There are many cases of this kind in Roman history. It is full of examples where slaves fought for their freedom. Cato used them at the defense of Utica, and required their masters to emancipate them. Plutarch is full of examples of the kind. Tacitus, in the later periods of Roman history, recites many similar examples. In the republic, in the empire, in their civil wars, in their foreign wars, slaves were used, and in every case they were emancipated. The distinction in the character of the slaves, whether white or black, was never made. The Romans held different degrees of slaves, and of various nations. Some of the Germans, many of the Asiatic nations, and many of the African tribes were held as slaves. There was no distinction ever made between them on account of their color. Their condition, not their color, fixed their slavery.

But, sir, this employment of slaves in the military service was not confined to ancient times. At the present day they are used by many nations. On a recent occasion in the Spanish colony of Cuba, with a population of one half slaves, a militia of free blacks and mulattoes was directed by General Pezuela to be organized in 1854 throughout the island, and it was put upon an equal footing with regard to privilege with the regular army. This measure was not rescinded by Governor General Concha in 1855, but the black and mulatto troops have been made a permanent corps of the Spanish army in this slaveholding island. So with the Portuguese. Slaves have been used by the Portuguese in their wars; and now in the Portuguese colonies on the coast of Africa the regiments are composed chiefly of black men. So at Prince's Island, St. Thomas, Loanda, and many other places where they hold colonies, their soldiers are negroes. In the Dutch colony on the Gold Coast of Africa with a population of one hundred thousand, the garrison of the fortress consists of two hundred soldiers, whites, mulattoes, and blacks, under a Dutch colonel. In the capital of the French colony in the Senegal on the same coast, at St. Louis, the defense of the place is in the hands of eight hundred white and three hundred black soldiers. In the Danish island of St. Croix, in the West Indies, for more than twenty-five years past there have been employed two corps of colored soldiers in the presence of slaves. So in Brazil, so in Turkey. Our English friends, who were so eager to recognize the belligerent powers of the confederacy, also employ manumitted slaves. The British army stationed in the West Indies consists of four regiments. These regiments, the last of which was raised in 1862, were formerly recruited exclusively from liberated Africans, that is, from negroes captured on the slave traders voyaging to Sierra Leone. These slaves generally belonged to different tribes, who supplied the creole negroes. When the slave trade was prohibited there were no more liberated Africans to be had, and the regiments are now recruited among the population of the islands themselves, and they are composed of negroes and creoles in the proportion of sixty per hundred soldiers of the former and forty per hundred of the latter. There is one European sergeant to each company.

It is equally clear that in our own country in the revolutionary war and in the war of 1812 colored soldiers were employed on both sides. We are of course all familiar with the ordinary incidents of the revolutionary war; and we know that Lord Dunmore issued his proclamation in 1776 inviting the slaves to leave their masters, and he organized them into regiments. He formed two regiments near the site of Fortress Monroe. It is a remarkable fact that our revolutionary fathers feared the arming of the negroes more than anything else; and what tended to defeat the general arming of them was the fact that a large portion of the loyalists in the southern States owned slaves. Many of the men who were the traitors to our country at that time were the owners of slaves, although that was not true of them as a class, because many of the noblest, ablest, best men in the revolutionary service were the owners of slaves. In South Carolina it was manifest that the large owners of slaves were men who joined the British, and insisted on the surrender of Charleston. That fact is proven by many passages in revolutionary history. In the works of John Adams, volume two, page 428, he gives the reason why the negroes were not more generally employed by the British. He says:

"All the king's friends and tools of Government have large plantations and property in negroes, so that the slaves of the Tories would be lost as well as those of the Whigs."

That was a reason why the British did not organize more negro troops in South Carolina at that time. Their own friends, upon whom they depended for aid, would lose their slaves as well as the Whigs. When Lord Dunmore's proclamation was issued, it was answered on our side by a manifesto that I will read a short extract from, to show how far the men who now justify and sustain slavery have departed from the teachings of their fathers. The reply to Lord Dunmore's proclamation will be found in the American State Papers. It was addressed to the negro slaves in Virginia, and it used this language:

"Let them further consider what must be their fate should the English prove conquerors. If we can judge of the future from the past, it will not be much mended. Long have the Americans, moved by compassion and actuated by sound policy, endeavored to stop the progress of slavery. Our assemblies have repeatedly passed acts laying heavy duties upon imported negroes, by which they meant altogether to prevent the horrid traffic. But their humane intentions have been as often frustrated by the cruelty and covetousness of a set of English merchants, who prevailed upon the king to repeal our kind and merciful acts, little, indeed, to the credit of his humanity. Can it, then, be supposed that negroes will be better used by the English, who have always encouraged and upheld this slavery, than by their present masters, who pity their condition; who wish in general to make it as easy and comfortable as possible; and who would, were it in their power or were they permitted, not only prevent any more negroes from losing their freedom, but restore it to such as have unhappily lost it?"

Mr. President, remember this was a manifesto issued in Virginia to the slaves to show them why they ought not to join the English; and in that very manifesto they were told that the English had always been their enemies; that the English had insisted upon the continuance of the slave trade; that the English could not better their condition; but that they themselves had always pitied their condition; had always opposed the slave trade, and earnestly wished, as soon as the measure could be effected, that those who were then held as slaves should be made free. I have no doubt that that was the language held out by nearly all the great men of the Revolution. I have before me an extract from a letter of Mr. Jefferson on that subject. Lord Cornwallis, in the course of the revolutionary war, occupied the plantation of Mr. Jefferson and took some thirty of his slaves. Mr. Jefferson said that if it had been done for the purpose of making them free it would have been right; but that was not the purpose. I have no doubt that if during our revolutionary war the English had treated the negroes as they might have done, if they had not been cut off by their being tied to the loyalists of South Carolina, who were large owners of slaves, if the negroes themselves had not been impressed with the conviction that it was better for them to adhere to the present masters, who were kind and wished them freedom, the negroes would have thrown their weight into that contest probably at a doubtful period, and might have changed the result. It is remarkable that the opinions then held by the people of Virginia should be so changed that within less than a century the very descendants of those men who promised their negroes freedom in the Revolution should be supporting and sustaining a government based solely on negro slavery, and intended to perpetuate and extend it.

Mr. President, I wish to show the action of the different States on this subject, because my argument depends on the fact that at all times, in all ages, by our own countrymen as well as by others, negroes have been employed in the military service. If so, we, in this terrible war, entered upon for the purpose of perpetuating the institution of slavery, ought surely to be able and willing to arm the negro slaves to secure their own freedom. I find that slaves and negroes fought in the New England States during the Revolution. I read an extract from Bancroft's History of the United States, volume seven, page 421:

"Nor should history forget to record that as in the army at Cambridge, so also in this gallant band?"

That is, at the battle of Bunker Hill—

"the free negroes of the colony had their representatives. For the right of free negroes to bear arms in the public defense was, at that day, as little disputed in New England as their other rights. They took their place, not in a separate corps, but in the ranks with the white man; and their names may be read on the pension rolls of the country, side by side with those of our soldiers of the Revolution."

There are many cases that I might cite. Salem, who killed Major Pitcairn at the battle of Bunker Hill, was a negro.

In Virginia, slaves were employed as substitutes for white soldiers, and here is an act of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Virginia, passed in 1783:

"An act directing the emancipation of certain slaves who have served as soldiers in this State, and for the emancipation of the slave Aberdeen."

"1. Whereas it hath been represented to the present General Assembly that, during the course of the war, many persons in this State had caused their slaves to enlist in certain regiments or corps raised within the same, having tendered such slaves to the officers appointed to recruit forces within the State, as substitutes for free persons whose lot or duty it was to serve in such regiments or corps, at the same time representing to such recruiting officers that the slaves, so enlisted by their direction and concurrence, were freemen; and it appearing further to this Assembly that on the expiration of the term of enlistment of such slaves that the former owners have attempted again to force them to return to a state of servitude, contrary to the principles of justice and to their own solemn promise."

"2. And whereas it appears just and reasonable that all persons enlisted as aforesaid, who have faithfully served agreeable to the terms of their enlistment, and have thereby of course contributed toward the establishment of American liberty and independence, should enjoy the blessings of freedom as a reward for their toils and labors."

Here then it appears that the Legislature of Virginia emancipated all the slaves who had served in the revolutionary Army, and there is a recital that many cases of that kind had occurred where slaves had served in the Army. Many other instances are cited in this connection where slaves served in Virginia, and were rewarded for their services by their liberty. So in South Carolina, one of the most interesting incidents of the war was the earnest effort made by Colonel Laurens to arm the negro population in the southern States upon the promise of emancipation. The correspondence between Colonel Laurens and George Washington and Mr. Hamilton and Congress on this subject is voluminous. I will read one or two extracts to show the opinion of several distinguished revolutionary leaders as to the employment of slaves even in South Carolina, and to show that they were defeated in that project by the very motive that now holds from us the services of thousands of able-bodied men. Here is a letter from Henry Laurens, dated March 16, 1779, to General Washington:

"Our affairs in the southern department are more favorable than we had considered them a few days ago; nevertheless the country is greatly distressed, and will be more so unless further reinforcements are sent to its relief. Had we arms for three thousand such black men as I could select in Carolina, I should have no doubt of success in driving the British out of Georgia and subduing East Florida before the end of July."

That was his opinion, and George Washington replied to that:

"The policy of our arming slaves is, in my opinion, a moot point unless the enemy set the example. For, should we begin to form battalions of them, I have not the smallest doubt, if the war is to be prosecuted, of their following us in it, and justifying the measure upon our own ground. The contest then must be who can arm fastest. And where are our arms?"

In a subsequent letter, General Washington considered that the time had arrived when slaves should be armed; but I read this now so that I may show the correspondence fairly. A committee of Congress, consisting of Mr. Burke, Mr. Laurens, Mr. Armstrong, Mr. Wilson, and Mr. Dyer, appointed to take into consideration the circumstances of the southern States, and the ways and means for their safety and defense, on the 29th of March, 1779, reported to Congress this resolution:

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the States of South Carolina and Georgia, if they shall think the same expedient, to take measures immediately for raising three thousand able-bodied negroes."

General Lincoln, who was in command at Charleston, in a letter to Governor Rutledge, dated March 13, 1780, says:

"Give me leave to add once more that I think the measure of raising a black corps a necessary one; that I have great reason to believe if permission is given for it that many men would soon be obtained. I have repeatedly urged this matter, not only because Congress have recommended it, and because it thereby becomes my duty to attempt to have it executed, but because my own mind suggests the utility and importance of the measure, as the safety of the town makes it necessary."

I find a letter from Mr. Madison, written November 20, 1780, to Joseph Jones:

"Yours of the 18th came yesterday. I am glad to find the Legislature persist in their resolution to recruit their line of the army for the war; though, without deciding on the expediency of the mode under their consideration, would it not be as well to liberate and make soldiers at once of the blacks themselves as to make them instruments for enlisting white soldiers?"

James Madison makes the very recommendation that we now propose—to free them first and then enlist them afterwards, always connecting the two ideas together. He says further:

"It would certainly be more consonant with the principles of liberty, which ought never to be lost sight of in a contest for liberty, and, with white officers and a majority of white soldiers, no imaginable danger could be feared from themselves, as there certainly could be none from the effect of the example on those who should remain in bondage, experience having shown that a freedman immediately loses all attachment and sympathy with his former fellow-slaves."

There is the idea held out distinctly that those who were employed in service were to be emancipated as the result of their employment. Here is Colonel Laurens again, to show how persistently he adhered to this idea of arming the negro population of South Carolina, he being a native of South Carolina, in a letter to General Washington, dated May 17, 1782:

"The plan which brought me to this country was urged with all the zeal which the subject inspired, both in our Privy Council and Assembly, but the single voice of reason was drowned by the howlings of a triple-headed monster, in which prejudice, avarice, and pusillanimity were united."

This is the indignant language used by Colonel Laurens:

"It was some degree of consolation to me, however, to perceive that truth and philosophy had gained some ground, the suffrages in favor of the measure being twice as numerous as on a former occasion. Some hopes have been lately given me from Georgia, but I fear, when the question is put, we shall be outvoted there with as much disparity as we have been in this country."

Here is the reply of General Washington to Colonel Laurens:

"I must confess that I am not at all astonished at the failure of your plan. That spirit of freedom which, at the commencement of this contest, would have gladly sacrificed everything to the attainment of its object, has long since subsided, and every selfish passion has taken its place. It is not the public, but private interest which influences the generosity of mankind, nor can the Americans any longer boast an exception. Under these circumstances it would rather have been surprising if you had succeeded, nor will you, I fear, have better success in Georgia."

Here General Washington, in reply to the indignant letter of Colonel Laurens, especially commends the undertaking, and says he is not disappointed that the effort had failed, because self-interest, prejudice, and hate now had taken the place of a manly love of liberty. I will show you further that General Greene had this same subject brought to his attention while in command of the southern department. In a letter to Washington, dated January 24, 1782, he said:

"I have recommended to this State to raise some black regiments. To fill up the regiments with whites is impracticable, and to get reinforcements from the northward precarious, and at least difficult, from the prejudice respecting the climate. Some are for it; but the far greater part of the people are opposed to it."

Then he goes on to suggest how available the blacks might be if used in the Army. I might go on at some length, because I find here ready to my hand a collection of all the historical incidents connected with the employment of negroes, showing that they were employed in Rhode Island and indeed in all the colonies; but I will not weary the Senate with these details. It is sufficient to say that nearly all the leading men of the Revolution, Washington, Jefferson, Hamilton, Madison, Laurens, Greene, and Lincoln, were in favor of using slaves, and at the same time emancipating them as the result of the service, and it was resisted in the southern States partly from a fear that the British would arm them, and partly from the fear of losing their own property in slaves.

Mr. President, I will go further. Slaves and negroes, especially free negroes, were used by us in the war of 1812. You are all familiar with the proclamation of General Jackson issued at Mobile to the free negroes. When white men faltered, when they involved him in judicial controversy, when the danger was imminent that the English would bombard the city of New Orleans, the free negroes, at the proclamation of General Jackson, rallied to his standard. What did Old Hickory do? Did he turn his back on them and say, "You are negroes, and are beneath me in the social scale?" That was not the answer. Old Hickory enrolled them in his ranks; they were mustered into the service, and they bravely aided to beat back the waves of the British army. General Jackson, with a manly heroism that does him credit, issued his proclamation giving them especial thanks for their services. I am afraid that some of those gentlemen who are so fastidious, if negroes, whether free or slave, should come up and offer their lives in the service of their country, if they were willing to assume all the burdens of war, if they were willing to risk wounds and pains and death, would answer them with contempt, and would spit upon them. That was not the example set by the great men of the Revolution or of the war of 1812.

I do not know that I can express myself in better language than General Jackson did in his proclamation calling out the free negroes of Louisiana, and I shall therefore take the liberty of reading that proclamation, which was dated at Mobile, September 21, 1814. He says:

"HEADQUARTERS SEVENTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
MOBILE, September 21, 1814.

"To the Free Colored Inhabitants of Louisiana:

"Through a mistaken policy you have heretofore been deprived of a participation in the glorious struggle for national rights in which our country is engaged. This no longer shall exist.

"As sons of freedom you are now called upon to defend our most inestimable blessing. As Americans, your country looks with confidence to her adopted children for a valorous support as a faithful return for the advantages enjoyed under her mild and equitable Government. As fathers, husbands, and brothers, you are summoned to rally around the standard of the eagle to defend all which is dear in existence.

"Your country, although calling for your exertions, does not wish you to engage in her cause without amply remunerating you for the services rendered. Your intelligent minds are not to be led away by false representations; your love of honor would cause you to despise a man who should attempt to deceive you. In the sincerity of a soldier and the language of truth I address you."

He goes on to state the inducements offered to them; and afterwards, after they had served faithfully, he issued the following address to them:

"To the Men of Color:

"Soldiers! From the shores of Mobile I collected you to arms—I invited you to share in the perils and to divide the glory of your white countrymen. I expected much from you, for I was not uninformed of those qualities which must render you so formidable to an invading foe. I knew that you could endure hunger and thirst and all the hardships of war. I knew that you loved the land of your nativity, and that, like ourselves, you had to defend all that is most dear to man. But you surpass my hopes. I have found in you, united to these qualities, that noble enthusiasm which impels to great deeds.

"Soldiers! The President of the United States shall be informed of your conduct on the present occasion; and the voice of the Representatives of the American nation shall applaud your valor, as your general now praises your ardor. The enemy is near. His sails cover the lakes. But the brave are united, and if he finds us contending among ourselves it will be for the prize of valor, and fame, its noblest reward."

Commodore Perry used negroes on the lakes. A considerable portion of the force employed by him at the battle of Lake Erie were free negroes; and he regarded them as good soldiers. They aided him in repelling the British in their very formidable attack on our northern frontier. I am not ashamed to acknowledge that the people of Ohio, in the war of 1812, owed their safety from further invasion from the British not only to the bravery of white soldiers but also to the large number of negroes who enlisted in the service. In our naval service, I am informed that they have been always used. I believe that in every vessel-of-war over which our flag now floats, in whatever country it may be found, the negro fights side by side with the white man; and our tars do not consider themselves as degraded because a man of a different race and a different color can show bravery and courage as well as themselves.

The State of New York, in the war of 1812, organized negro regiments. I find among the statutes of New York "An act to authorize the raising of two regiments of color," passed October 24, 1814.

But not only did we use negro soldiers in that war, but the British employed them against us. They organized a negro force within one hundred miles of Washington, and if they had made extensive inroads into our country no doubt they would have employed more. To establish this let me read from Alison:

"Three regiments of Wellington's army arrived in Chesapeake Bay in the middle of August, 1814. General Ross commanded the land forces, Admiral Cockburn the fleet; their first measure was to take possession of Tangier Island, where they erected fortifications, built store houses, and hoisted the British flag; inviting at the same time the negroes in the adjoining provinces to join the British force in the island, and offering them emancipation in the event of their doing so. Seventeen hundred speedily appeared, were enrolled and disciplined, and proved of no small service in subsequent operations."—Alison's History of Europe, English edition, vol. 13, p. 435.

I have thus, Mr. President, perhaps at the risk of being wearisome, shown that in ancient and in modern times, by all civilized nations, by our own country and by our enemies, in all of our wars, negro soldiers both free and slave have been used in the military service, and in every case where slaves have been so used they have been secured their liberty. It would be an intolerable injustice, to which no people would ever submit, to serve in the military service without securing that greatest of boons. My answer, then, to the main question, whether the employment of negroes, free or slave, is justified by the laws of war is, that by the practice of all nations it is justified.

I come then to another question that it is necessary for me briefly to refer to, and that is whether there is anything in the Constitution of the United States that forbids us from employing free negroes or slaves. On that point there can be no doubt. The only restraint upon the law of war contained in the Constitution is in article three of the Amendments, which provides that "no soldiers shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner to be prescribed by law." With this exception, all the practices of civilized nations may be used in this war. There is nothing in the Constitution of the United States prescribing the mode and manner of dealing with an enemy; nothing which affects the power of the President or the power of Congress over the Army or Navy except the simple restraint that soldiers shall not be quartered in any house in time of peace without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war but in a manner prescribed by law. When I look again to the powers of Congress I find that Congress is invested with the broad power to declare war; no such power is conferred on the President.

There is no reference in the Constitution to the power of the President in time of war except that he is Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy; but Congress is empowered to "raise armies." Congress may "make rules and regulations for their government." Congress alone has all those powers which are called war powers in other countries. In England, in France, in all monarchies, as a matter of course the executive authority embraces all the war power; but under our Constitution the President has no war power except simply to command the Army and Navy according to the laws that we prescribe. Congress must pass rules and regulations; Congress must raise armies. By the Constitution the President has no power to enlist a single soldier, black or white, bond or free, except as is authorized by law, or, as is said by the Supreme Court, in the decision to which I have already referred, in a case of public exigency he may anticipate at his peril the action of Congress, and if his action is subsequently ratified and approved by Congress it then becomes operative from the beginning. But as an original question, the President does not possess any war powers. They are all vested in Congress. Congress alone can raise armies; Congress alone can make rules and articles for their government.

Now, sir, is there any exception in the Constitution as to our power to raise armies? Where is the clause limiting our power to free men, to white men, to aliens, or to any other class of people? The power to raise armies is as high as heaven, as broad as our own country, and includes every man within it. We may muster in the whole population. We may by conscription laws force our whole population into the Army. We alone can do it. Congress, by a law sanctioned by the President, can exercise this power, and no other authority can.

Why is it that we are called upon every day to fix the price of service, to fix the pay of the soldier? Why is it that we are now called upon to raise the pay of the soldier from thirteen dollars to sixteen dollars a month? Why does not the President do it? Simply because Congress alone has the power to prescribe the mode of raising an army and the pay of an army. If the President cannot raise the pay of a private soldier from thirteen dollars to sixteen dollars a month where does he find the power to offer as pay to the black soldier his liberty—the highest reward? There is the question. Remember, I do not object to the exercise of this power; I am in favor of it. I believe the war has been protracted so long because we have feared, through prejudice and probably on account of old party relations, to exercise the great powers that are invested in us. I believe that from the beginning, when the rebels assumed the position of enemies, we should have armed against them the whole negro population of their country. They need not tell me that if we arm the negroes they will arm them. They cannot arm their negroes unless they promise them their freedom. If they promise them their freedom their whole confederacy crumbles into dust. Their whole confederacy is built, as Mr. Stephens said, on the idea that man should own property in man; that the negro is inferior and must be held subordinate to the white race; that he must be held as a slave. If they arm the slaves and promise them freedom their whole confederacy would crumble into dust. I do not fear any empty threats of that kind. I say from the beginning we should have armed the slaves; but before doing so, in my judgment, we ought to secure them by law, by a great guarantee, in which you and I and all branches of the Government would unite in pledging the faith of the United States, that forever thereafter they should hold their freedom against their old masters.

It is not that I object to the proclamation of the President. I simply want to give it the form and sanction of law. I have doubts about his power to issue this proclamation, or that it will be of any validity. I fear this as the great injustice of the times; that when this war shall be over, if Congress allows this matter to rest solely on the President's proclamation, and a negro comes up and shows that proclamation in a court of law as his charter of freedom, your court of law will turn him adrift, and tell him it was a mere piece of parchment issued by a man who had no authority to guaranty it. That is what I fear. I wish to guard against that contingency by clothing this promise of emancipation with all the guarantees and sanctions of law; and with my view of the powers of Congress I have not the slightest doubt that we can do it. I have not a doubt that we may declare that we will enlist into the Army of the United States negroes, whether bond or free, in the southern States; and that, as wages or as pay for their services, we may decree their emancipation.

Mr. President, we give bounties to soldiers; we give land to soldiers. By what authority do we do this? I ask you, if we can induce white men to enter the service by a promise of one hundred and sixty acres of land and by $300 bounty, why can we not induce a negro to enter the military service for the highest of all compensations—the emancipation of himself? Why, sir, we take your son who owes you service for a short period; we take him under age; we enlist him in the service; we induce him to enter that service by bounties, by the promise of lands, and by the liberal inducements held out to our soldiers; and by that very act we deprive you of the labor of your son. Under what authority of law do we do this? Under the simple authority to raise armies. That authority overrides all your rights.

I agree with the sentiment expressed by the Senator from Maryland [Mr. Johnson] the other day, if I understood him correctly, that Congress in the exigencies of the country may arm the negro population of this country and muster them into service. The only question on which he and I would differ would be as to the measure of compensation that ought to be held out to these negroes for that service. He admits that we have the power to use their physical force; and in the face of the historical cases I have quoted no man can doubt our power to muster these blacks into our service. The only question is whether, as a compensation for their services, we can promise them emancipation; and upon this point I see no limit to our power. Why, sir, you are about to confer the highest honor on General Grant as a reward for his services. You make our white soldiers generals, and give them the star, the garter of our republican form of government. You give them honor, name, that for which men fight and struggle more than anything else. You give them all these. I ask you, when you can take money, lands, honor, property, everything, and give them to your white soldiers, can you not give to the negro who is put into your service his own liberty and secure it to him forever? It is a narrow view of the powers of Congress to say we have no right to give a negro freedom as the result of military service.

What is the consequence of this doctrine? It is this: in prosecuting war against these rebellious States we may exercise against them the powers of war. But, sir, in dealing with another class of people we are restrained by certain constitutional obligations. Upon this point I shall probably differ with many of my political friends; but I am here to speak my earnest convictions. As against the rebels of the South, I say, you can seize their slaves; you can put them in your armies; you can make them serve you; you can emancipate the whole race as a measure of war, because by the laws of war emancipation and the employment of slaves are proper incidents of war. Therefore in the seceding States there is no difficulty in the way; and even as to the loyal men in those States the decision of the Supreme Court is that as those States have gone out of the Union you may prosecute even against your loyal citizens in those seceding States the laws of war. States as communities have gone out, and the Supreme Court have decided in the very case to which I have referred that the laws of war obtain against all loyal citizens in the seceding States. I will read an extract from that decision:

"All persons residing within this territory whose property may be used to increase the revenues of the hostile power are, in this contest, liable to be treated as enemies, though not foreigners. They have cast off their allegiance and made war on their Government, and are none the less enemies because they are traitors."

Therefore it is that if a loyal man in the seceding States loses his property it is not by our act, it is by the act of the enemy. By a well-recognized principle of international law the government of a State is not responsible for the acts of the enemy. The destruction of slavery in the seceding States is the act of the enemy necessarily growing out of the state of war; and if our own loyal citizens are affected by the operations of the laws of war in the seceding States they have no right to complain against the United States. If my house is burned over my head by a public enemy I have no right to reclaim the value of that house from the United States. The Government is never responsible for the act of the enemy. It is bound to use all necessary force, so far as it can, to protect its citizens; but if it cannot do so, or if, in the course of the war, the private property of a citizen is destroyed, that citizen has no right to reclaim the property from the Government. This is a clear principle of international law. Therefore, as to the loyal people in the seceding States, they take the fortune and chances of war. It may be hard on them. I confess it is. I pity them from the bottom of my heart. I have seen brave and true and loyal men from those States who have lost all their property, who have been dragged into unwilling servitude in the southern States; but that is the fortune of war. We cannot protect them. If their property is destroyed and their slaves emancipated as the result of this war it is not the act of the Government, it is the act of the rebels with whom it was their misfortune to be associated.

Now, sir, you come to another class of citizens in the adhering States, as they are called, in the loyal States. I ask you whether they are not entitled to certain constitutional privileges which you are sworn to give? You cannot use against these loyal men in the adhering States the laws of war. As against all the enemies of the Government, those who do anything whatever to contribute to overthrow the Government, living in the adhering States, you have a right to prosecute the laws of war. The people of Ohio decided that in a very mild case in our own State. They believed that a certain gentleman who was very prominent had committed such acts as indicated him as a public enemy. The military authorities seized him and expelled him beyond the limits of the State of Ohio. His friends endeavored to excite a great deal of compassion for him on that account. On what ground was it justified? If any true friend of his country had been seized in Ohio, had been deprived of his liberty, had been expatriated, the whole people of the gallant State would have risen in arms to defend him, although he was the humblest of their citizens; but they believed he had taken such a course in this war that he was a public enemy; that he had done all he could to aid the public enemy; that he was regarded by them as their friend, and by us as an enemy. Therefore the act of the Government in seizing him and forcing him beyond our lines was justified by an overwhelming vote of the people of Ohio; but upon what ground? On the ground that he was a public enemy. Therefore, as to all those men who in the adhering States have been false to the Government, who have by acts—not by mere words, because I would not hold a man responsible for his words—done anything to aid and contribute to the success of the rebels in this war, they may be treated according to the laws of war. If they lose their slaves so much the better. If they lose their property so much the better. No one ought to complain of it. They have taken the chances of the success of this war; let them enjoy them.

But now, sir, you come to another class of people; and I ask my political friends this plain question: when there are loyal men in the adhering States—I do not speak of that class who live in southern States—but when there are loyal men in the adhering States who have been true to your country and true to your flag, I ask you whether you do not owe them the application of a different rule? I say you have the right to take the slaves of those loyal people. You have the right to take the slave of my friend from Kentucky, [Mr. Davis:] you have the right to take the free negro in his neighborhood; you have the right to take his son; you have the right to take him, if it is necessary, to crush the rebellion; and I believe he would be as ready to respond, if his personal services were needed to put down the rebellion, as any man in the Senate. Although I do not agree with many of his opinions I believe him to be patriotic, courageous, and brave. I know he has in the hour of danger stepped forward and been mustered under our flag and carried a musket by the side of the common soldier. This Government has the right to his slave if they want him. They have the right to a free man. They have the right to use them in the military service. I ask you, when the slave of a loyal man is taken in the adhering States are you not bound to give him fair and legitimate compensation? It is not a sufficient answer for you to say to me that you do not recognize property in slaves. The answer to that is that by the local law of the State which has remained true to the Government he is recognized as property, and the master is protected in the enjoyment of that property within the limits of that State. If you deprive him of that property you are bound in honor and conscience to share with him the loss.

Here is a feature of the bill introduced by the Committee on Military Affairs that I cannot approve. I do not think it will take very much money to pay for such slaves. I am in favor of using the slaves of the people of Missouri, of Kentucky, and West Virginia, and Maryland wherever they can be mustered into our service; but, sir, I think when you take the slave of a loyal master you should pay a fair and reasonable compensation for the labor of that slave. It is true, as my friend from Maryland said the other day, that the value of the slave is very small in Maryland. I would only pay the master that depreciated value. That depreciated value is caused by the rebellion. That depreciation which has been brought upon his property by the act of the rebels he is not entitled by the laws of war to have compensation for. My property may be depreciated. The property of all loyal citizens may be depreciated. I have no right to complain of this. I have no right to ask compensation for this. Therefore, to the extent his property is depreciated by the rebellion in Maryland, he should not be paid; but to the extent his property is of value in Maryland at the time we take it, we ought in justice and honor and good conscience to give him a reasonable compensation.

That is my view, and I believe the people of the State of Ohio, who in this war have certainly shown their willingness to meet all the sacrifices that have been put upon them, who have done their full share in furnishing you officers and men to fight your battles, will not begrudge the small pittance that may be paid under this system of compensated emancipation to the people of the border States who have been true to the flag of our country in the hour of its great danger. By these principles in the further discussion of this bill I shall be guided.

I think, therefore, to conclude, we ought, by a wise, carefully prepared law, to enroll the negroes of this country into the armed service of the United States so far as they can be properly used. I believe they will fight well. We ought to secure to them their freedom. To all the slaves in all the rebel States I would secure freedom to the last man, woman, or child. I never would allow the men who have rebelled against the best Government God ever gave to man to own a slave, or, I was about to say, to own any other property. They are outcasts. They have rebelled. Their rebellion was causeless. I have no pity for them in all the sufferings that may be heaped upon them in their own generation. For those men who domineered in this Senate, who domineered in the other House, who converted our political bodies into arenas for the defense of slavery, for those men who when fairly beaten in a political contest took up arms to overthrow the Government, I have not the slightest sympathy or respect. They are not only enemies but they are traitors, and I will enforce against them not only the laws of war but the municipal laws of our own country as to treason. So as to all those men living in the northern States, slave or free, who in this hour of danger have been active in their opposition to the Government, who have not given what the Government has a right to have, a manly, generous, free support, I have no sympathy whatever. I do not speak of mere political opposition evinced in words or with a desire to have somebody else selected President rather than Mr. Lincoln; but for those men who have actually aided the rebels in the adhering States I have no sympathy. I do not care how many of their slaves you put into the service; how much of their property you take; how much you confiscate. I perhaps will go as far as the farthest. All I ask is that when you touch the local rights and the local property of those brave and true men of the southern States who have been true to the country in this hour of danger you ought to extend to them reasonable consideration for the circumstances by which they are surrounded.

In this war we are all called upon to make sacrifices. Those men in the border States have suffered worst of all. Missouri has been trodden over by armed men in all directions. So to some extent has Kentucky; so to some extent has Maryland. Tennessee has been ridden over with the hoof of war. These people have suffered. We cannot help that. We cannot spare them all suffering. All the property of all the people of the United States could not redress the wrongs of this war. All we have got to do is to fight it through. But I say, for one, I never will consent to deprive true and loyal men of the adhering States who have been true and have rendered good service, not merely lip service, but have rendered good service in the hour of the country's peril—I will not take from him even his own local rights without giving him a fair and honest compensation. That, I believe, is the true theory of this whole difficulty.

On the subject of emancipation I am ready now to go as far as any one. Like all others, I hesitated at first, because I could not see the effect of the general project of emancipation. I think the time has now arrived when we must meet this question of emancipation boldly and fearlessly. There is no other way. Slavery is destroyed, not by your act, sir, or mine, but by the act of this rebellion. I think, therefore, the better way would be to wipe out all that is left of the whole trouble, the dead and buried and wounded of this system of slavery. It is obnoxious to every manly and generous sentiment. The idea that one man may hold property in the life of another, may sell him like cattle, is obnoxious to the common sentiment of all. Now, when the power is in our hands, when these rebels have broken down the barriers of the Constitution, when they must be treated by the laws of war, when we dictate those laws, not the President, let us by law meet this question of emancipation boldly and fearlessly. I am prepared to do it, and to vote to-day, to-morrow, or any day for a broad and general system of emancipation. Then, sir, I would couple with that idea fair, honest compensation to those loyal men who, in the adhering States, own this class of property. The amount paid to them would be insignificant compared to the cost of this war.

These sacrifices we must make. I know we are called upon to make more. What homestead in this country has not made a sacrifice? What family can you enter in this broad land where the drapery of mourning is not hung over the hearthstone, where there are not sons and brothers and kindred who have fallen in this war? Why, sir, if you tell the young widow who has lost her husband in this contest that she has not suffered as much as the slaveholder of Kentucky will suffer by the loss of his slaves she would consider you a fool or a madman. The mother who has seen her noble son depart from her side full of the lusty vigor of manhood and seen him again return broken by disease, ready almost to die—I ask you whether her sufferings and sacrifices are not greater than that of any slaveholder in the world?

I tell you, Mr. President, this war has in my judgment demonstrated the necessity in this republican form of government of doing what our forefathers hesitated about doing, to wipe out with one bold and manly stroke of legislation, not of proclamation, the whole system of slavery in this country. Then, when this is done, for the good that it will bring upon us, for the honor it will bring upon our race, for the glory it will bring on our country, then free in every sense of the word, we can afford to deal generously with those whose local interests we have sacrificed and whose property we have taken.

I see before me, then, a plain path of duty. I shall insist that, as the result and consequence of this rebellion, the system of slavery shall disappear from among the institutions of our people, and I shall desire to protect and compensate all I can the loyal slaveholder, to preserve unimpaired every feature of our Government, to preserve unimpaired the rights of all the States. I am willing to temper this system of compensation to the action of the States themselves. I am willing to move slowly, surely; and as I see movements are going on in Maryland, Missouri, West Virginia, and I trust soon in Kentucky and Tennessee, to wipe out this system by the action of those States, I shall not interfere with that action. But, sir, for one, while I hold a seat on this floor I shall insist that, as the result of this war, as the great punishment of this rebellion, as the great good to be derived from it, the system of involuntary slavery shall disappear from among us. Although our generation may have made all the sacrifices of the war I believe the future will reap all the benefit. Our nation, now thirty millions, in fifty years will be an untold number. Throw open the South, throw open the West to emigration from all the countries of the world, and a single generation of men, free, industrious, and happy, will compensate our nation for all the losses and sacrifices of this great war.

But, sir, while you leave upon our national record a single spot of that institution which has created all our broils and all our controversies, which has lain at the root of all our troubles, we are not safe. The framers of the Government believed that this institution would pass gently away. It has not done so. Where it once gets a foothold it will extend itself. Therefore, I am for the broadest extirpation, the broadest eradication of this institution, so far as I can within the power contained in the Constitution of the United States. But, sir, in doing that I consider this nation rich enough and strong enough to deal generously and liberally with those who, while they owned this property, have yet been true to our country and true to our flag.

Mr. BROWN. I desire to ask the Senator from Ohio, with his permission, whether I understood him as saying in the course of his argument that he was prepared to enter upon a system of compensation to all the non-slaveholders for the losses and sacrifices they had suffered in this war?

Mr. SHERMAN. Oh, no. I expressly stated that by the laws of war all the losses and sacrifices by private citizens in the course of the war were not to be compensated by the Government.

Mr. BROWN. Then I wish to know why it is that the Senator distinguishes on the point of compensation in favor of the slaveholder as against the non-slaveholder.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer very promptly I do not. If I go into Missouri and take the personal property of the Senator from Missouri, and use it in the service of the United States, I am bound to pay for it; but if the public enemy should go there and take his private property, and use it or destroy it, the Government is not bound to pay for it. I would apply the same rule precisely to this class of property as to other personal property; and in considering the question of compensation I would make all deductions for that necessary diminution of value which the rebellion has caused to slavery.

Mr. COWAN. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Ohio a question. I want to know whether I understand him on this point: I understand him to say that, in his opinion, the power of this Government to free slaves is a belligerent right. Do I understand him to say that this Congress, the municipal legislature, is the organ through which the nation manifests itself in the exercise of that right, or whether the Executive is the organ?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator could not have listened to me, or he would have answered that question himself. I think Congress must pass rules and regulations by which our Army shall be organized, say who shall be in the Army, what they shall be paid being in the Army, and how they shall be managed; that is, the rules and regulations governing the organization of the Army. When they are in the field in the face of the enemy, the President, as Commander-in-Chief, as a matter of course designates that this division shall go here, and another division there, &c.

Mr. COWAN. That is not exactly the question I put. It is this: I understand the bill now before the Senate provides not only for liberating the enlisted person, but it also goes further and declares that his mother, his wife, and his children shall also be liberated. As I understand the argument it is that by virtue of our belligerent rights against the rebels—who are belligerents, this being an actual war, we have the right to do that thing—we have the right to liberate slaves. But the question I desire to ask is this: which is the proper organ of the Government for that purpose? Is it the municipal legislature or is it the Executive of the nation? Which of the two is it that comes in contact with belligerents when the nation is in war, after the declaration of war has been made? As I understand it, Congress has the right to declare war. That is an exceptional power that it enjoys. In other countries the executive or the monarch, the sovereign, has the right to declare war; but in this country Congress decides that question. If war is declared, then who is it that is to determine what shall be done as against the belligerent; or, in other words, who shall determine what shall be done under the laws of war as against this belligerent? Is it the President, or is it the legislature?

Mr. GRIMES obtained the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think—

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator wishes to answer the question of the Senator from Pennsylvania, I will give way. I rose merely to move an adjournment; not that I want the floor, but the idea of catechizing a Senator after making a speech over two hours long, seems rather a strange one.

Mr. SHERMAN. I am perfectly willing to answer the question.

Mr. COWAN. I want to understand the Senator's position on that point.

Mr. GRIMES. If the Senator wants to make a speech now I will give way; otherwise I will move an adjournment.

Mr. CARLILE. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion for a moment.

Mr. GRIMES. Certainly.

Mr. CARLILE. The profound respect I entertain for the sincerity of the convictions of the Senator from Ohio, who has just addressed the Senate, as well as the importance of the subject under consideration as presented by him, has caused me to rise and say to the Senate, if they will indulge me by an adjournment, I shall attempt to discuss this proposition and reply to some of the erroneous positions, as I think, taken by my friend from Ohio. In order that I may not at the moment do him injustice, I desire to have the speech of the Senator as it will be reported in the Globe before me before I reply; and therefore I am willing to have an adjournment now.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me to move to go into executive session instead of an adjournment?

Mr. CARLILE. Certainly.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, February 2, 1864.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. CHANNING.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

VERMONT RESOLUTIONS.

Mr. MORRILL, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution by the Legislature of the State of Vermont approving of the plan for ship navigation from the Mississippi river to the eastern seaboard by means of a ship canal, and requesting their Senators and Representatives to use their exertions to the accomplishment of the object.

He also, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution by the Legislature of the State of Vermont instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to use their influence to secure such modification of the post office laws as to allow the transmission through the mails of packages to soldiers at the same rates as now required for the transmission of books.

He also, by unanimous consent, presented a joint resolution by the Legislature of the State of Vermont instructing their Senators and requesting their Representatives to exert their influence for the passage of a law which shall secure equal pay to all soldiers now or hereafter mustered into the service of the United States.

The resolutions were laid on the table.

COMPENSATION OF INSPECTORS.

On motion of Mr. FENTON, by unanimous consent, Senate bill No. 66, to increase the compensation of inspectors of customs in certain ports, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

PURCHASE OF NAVAL SUPPLIES.

Mr. FENTON asked the consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform this House, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the supplies for that Department during the past fiscal year were purchased upon contract, as required by law; and if not, what proportion thereof and of what kinds were purchased in open market; that he also inform the House whether purchases were made in any of the bureaus of his Department without advertising for proposals, and whether by other officers than the Navy agents, and by what authority purchases were so made, and of what articles; and that he also inform the House of the practice of asking proposals for supplies in classes, giving the contract to the lowest average bids for a class of articles, oftentimes at the great pecuniary disadvantage of the Government, inasmuch as the price may be low on certain articles when few are required and high on others of which large quantities are required; and whether the practice of inviting proposals and awarding bids in this manner is required by law; and that he also inform the House whether any, and if so what, alterations in the laws relating to the purchase of naval supplies are, in his opinion, necessary.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will not object to the resolution if the gentleman will modify it by striking out "if not incompatible with the public interest," and also strike out the word "requested" and insert in the place of it the word "directed." I believe it is not usual to insert the words "if not incompatible with the public interest" in resolutions calling for information from the head of a Department, and I can conceive of no possibility of the information now called for being not compatible with the public interest.

Mr. FENTON. Understanding that the modifications suggested by the gentleman from Indiana are in accordance with the usual custom in such resolutions, I will accept the modifications.

The resolution was then, by unanimous consent, received, considered, and adopted.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a bill making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1865; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, ordered to be printed, and made the special order for Tuesday next, and from day to day until disposed of.

PRINTING OF NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That there be printed two thousand five hundred copies of the Navy Register for the year 1864, for the use of the members of this House.

BOUNTIES AND ARREARS OF PAY.

Mr. HALE. In response to inquiries which have been made as to the cause of the great delay which has arisen in the payment of the bounties and arrears of pay in the cases of wounded and deceased soldiers, I have received the following communications, which I ask to have read, and printed in the Globe.

The Clerk read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, January 18, 1864.

SIR: I beg leave to inclose a report of the Second Auditor of the Treasury, in response to inquiries made by you as chairman of the Committee of Claims in the House of Representatives.

It will gratify you to observe that the principal cause of delay arising from want of room for the accommodation of an increased clerical force having been partially removed, and the force largely, though still insufficiently, augmented, the settlements are now made with much greater promptitude and rapidly than heretofore. Five thousand four hundred and thirty-five more claims were settled than were received during the months of December and November. It is my hope that sufficient room may soon be obtained for all clerks that are needed for the prompt dispatch of this important business.

I agree with the Auditor that the bill proposed by Hon. Mr. FENTON in the House will, if it shall become a law, greatly facilitate the settlement of these meritorious claims, and share his conviction that nothing has been left undone that could be done by any bureau with the same room and force to settle them at the earliest possible moment.

I trust it will be possible within a short time by the aid of the legislation now in progress to bring up all work of this description as to leave no cause to complain of delay to any one.

Very respectfully,

S. P. CHASE,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. J. T. HALE, Chairman Committee of Claims, House of Representatives.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

SECOND AUDITOR'S OFFICE, January 14, 1864.

SIR: In compliance with your request and in reply to inquiries relating to the claims of deceased and discharged soldiers, and to the causes of delay in their settlement, made by Hon. JAMES T. HALE, chairman of the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives, I have the honor to report:

That such claims have been generally settled up to the 31st of December, 1862, where the rolls could be obtained, and in cases where the muster and pay rolls for November and December embraced also the months of January and February, 1863, settlements are being made to the latter period.

On the 1st day of January, 1863, there were on hand and unsettled of this class of claims 1,870. There were settled during the year 13,467.

On the 1st day of January, 1863, the number on hand and unsettled was 37,354. The number settled during the year was 45,767, and there remained on hand unsettled, on the 1st day of January, 1864, 74,590.

A variety of causes have contributed to delay the settlement of this class of claims. Inability to obtain the necessary rolls, defective rolls, and insufficient proof of death may be referred to as among them, but the principal cause of this vast accumulation is chargeable to an insufficiency of clerical force.

This subject has been the constant source of deep solicitude. In my annual report, under date of November 19, 1861, and some three months after I was placed in charge of this bureau, the following language occurs:

"By reference to the monthly reports from this office, made to your Department since the close of the fiscal year, it will appear that there has been a constant and rapid increase of its business beyond the capacity of my present clerical force to perform, and that, in some of its divisions, there has been an accumulation of unsettled claims. This has been unavoidable.

"The present clerical force in this office was intended to be and is only adequate to the prompt settlement of the current business arising under the peace establishment of the Army, demanding an annual expenditure of twelve or fourteen million dollars. It is limited by law to one chief clerk, eleven clerks of the third class, seven of the second, and three of the first.

"During the Mexican war, and for several succeeding years, the force was increased to forty-nine clerks, and yet the business fell sadly in arrears, and the delay attendant upon the adjustment of claims and debts against the Government was the occasion of great inconvenience and injustice to claimants and creditors.

"The true interest of the Government, as well as justice to claimants, demands that settlements should be made promptly and without delay. To accomplish this object a sufficient force of competent accountants should be employed to prevent an accumulation of claims in the office.

"If the increase of the Army and its expenses during the Mexican war created a necessity for more, than doubling the number of clerks in this office, it will be apparent that the business growing out of the employment of an Army of half a million men, and the disbursements of three or four hundred million dollars per annum, will require a much larger clerical force in the offices auditing war accounts and claims.

"In view of the recent increase of the business, I believe that within the next six months at least fifty additional clerks will be necessary to perform the current work of the office, and I hope that you may deem it proper to urge upon Congress the necessity of authorizing such a temporary increase of the clerical force as a prompt adjustment of claims may require."

The attention of Congress was invited to the recommendation, and in the following May the authority for a general increase of clerical force in the Treasury Department was given, but at that time the current business of the office had so increased that, notwithstanding the additional force which the Secretary had assigned to it in anticipation of the action of Congress, it became necessary to employ a large portion of the additional force in registering, briefing, examining, and filing claims and letters, and in attending to the correspondence necessary to prepare the claims for settlement.

With the increase of clerks came the necessity for suitable rooms for their accommodation. Earnest efforts were made by the Department from time to time to obtain them at my request, but only with partial success, as the other portions of the building were wanted for the accommodation of bureaus of other Departments.

As the files of this office embrace all the vouchers of disbursements for the pay of the Army, the purchase of ordnance and ordnance stores for recruiting, for medical and hospital purposes, and for the Indians, since 1817, they could not with propriety be removed into a building not fire-proof, and thus expose them to destruction; and no suitable building other than the one now occupied could be obtained. Nor could settling clerks be detached and distributed in other buildings without seriously impairing the efficiency of the office, and increasing the risk of losing the muster and pay-rolls, which are usually vouchers in paymasters' unsettled accounts, and borrowed from those accounts to settle the claims of deceased and discharged soldiers. Under these considerations no course could be pursued but to fill such rooms as could be obtained with clerks, and use every possible effort to keep down the accumulation of business until suitable rooms for a sufficient clerical force could be obtained. This has been done, and there has been no time since the first allowance and appointment of additional clerks to this office in 1862 when the rooms have not been filled beyond their capacity for convenience and health.

Since the 22d day of September last about sixty clerks have been added to this bureau to occupy the rooms vacated by the removal of the office of the Fourth Auditor to the Treasury building, and, as the general details of its business had been provided for, nearly the whole number were assigned to the duty of settling soldiers' claims. They were entirely unacquainted with the principles or details involved in such settlements, and will yet become more effective as they become more familiar with the business; but it gives me pleasure to inform you that, through their aid, five thousand four hundred and thirty-five more cases were settled than were received in the months of November and December. The number of cases settled in October was 4,390; in November, 6,446; and in December, 9,690.

It may be fairly estimated that, under favorable circumstances, settlements may be made at the rate of about ten thousand a month without any further increase of clerical force; and that by the middle or last of August next all claims now in the office, where the necessary evidence can be obtained, will be settled. During the last six months the receipts of applications have fallen off several thousand from those of the six preceding months, or of the corresponding months of 1862, so that, while the delay now existing in making settlements will be constantly diminishing, it must diminish more rapidly as the business of the last six months of 1863 is reached, and so continue until the short period within which settlements can be made will have been attained.

More room is needed for the convenience, comfort, and health of the clerks than is now assigned to this bureau. With the exception of four, the rooms are not large, are lighted by but a single window, and are without any proper ventilation; yet eight clerks, and occasionally nine, are compelled to work in each of these rooms. If it shall be deemed advisable to expedite the settlement of accumulated claims by a still larger temporary increase of clerks, additional office room is imperatively required.

Allusion has been made already to some other causes of delay. Although settlements are still delayed by the want of the pay and muster-rolls necessary to settle the accounts, there is reason to believe that an administrative examination of the paymasters' accounts, in the order in which payments are made, will remove that obstruction and place the rolls in possession of this office as rapidly as they may be required.

The bill proposed by Hon. Mr. FENTON in the House of Representatives, if enacted, will remove the difficulties which now exist in relation to evidence of death, and also as to payments and allowances to soldiers in hospitals, and, if strictly enforced, will very greatly facilitate the settlement of claims.

Sharing in the anxiety often expressed by you that this class of claims should be settled at the earliest possible moment as a solemn duty of the Government to a class of citizens suffering by reason of patriotic sacrifices, nothing has been left undone that could be done by this bureau to accomplish that end; and it gives me great pleasure to assure you of the zeal and patient industry with which the clerks in this bureau have struggled to meet the almost overwhelming demand upon it.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. B. FRENCH,

Second Auditor.

Hon. S. P. CHASE, Secretary of the Treasury.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE,

WASHINGTON, December 21, 1863.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith a copy of a communication from Hon. JAMES T. HALE, chairman of the Committee of Claims of the House of Representatives, dated December 19, 1863, and requesting information with regard to the delay in settling claims of deceased and disabled soldiers in the offices of the Paymaster General and Second Auditor, with any suggestions to remedy the same that can be offered.

In reply to this communication I would respectfully submit the following report:

As regards disabled soldiers who are discharged from service on account of wounds or disability, their final accounts are not settled in the office of the Paymaster General, but by the various paymasters in the field or at the numerous posts where such paymasters are stationed throughout the country. I am not aware of the slightest delay in the settlement of such claims having occurred, nor has any well-founded complaint of that character ever been made to this Department. On the contrary, it is believed that the discharged soldiers have been paid with commendable promptness. These soldiers are required to have certain discharge papers, which contain a statement of the amount of pay, clothing, &c., due them at the time of their discharge, and according to which the paymasters settle their accounts. These papers are made out by their company officers in the field, or surgeons in charge of the hospitals from which they may be discharged, and the paymasters have no control whatever over the same, but must be guided conclusively by what is stated in them. These papers are often grossly defective or incorrect; and the soldiers or the United States are thereby (as the errors are on one side or the other) made the losers by the ignorance or carelessness of the officers who thus make out these discharge papers. The only remedy that can be suggested for this evil is to require greater care on the part of such officers in the performance of this duty, and to punish, as a military offense, any neglect or omission in making out correct discharge papers.

By act of 3d March, 1863, the $100 bounty previously granted to soldiers who had served two years was allowed to all soldiers who were discharged on account of wounds received in action before having rendered such two years' service. The paymasters were instructed to pay the claims under that act at the same time that they settled the arrears of pay, &c., due such disabled men on their discharge papers.

The Second Auditor of the Treasury, however, refused to pass any accounts of paymasters for such disbursements, and directed that the same should be at once suspended. The reason given by the Second Auditor was that Congress had made no appropriation for the payment of such claims. All payments of such bounty to wounded men were therefore suspended under this ruling of the Auditor, and all claims under that act are still unsettled.

This Department was and is ready to pay this bounty as soon as authorized by the proper authority.

As regards the settlement of the claims of deceased soldiers, I would respectfully state that such settlements are assigned by a formal and standing and well-considered regulation of 1832 to the Second Auditor of the Treasury, and that neither the Paymaster General nor any of his officers have any control or authority in the matter. The reasons for placing the settlement of these claims in charge of the Second Auditor are obvious. The rolls of the different regiments, batteries, &c., in service on which the paymasters make payments are forwarded by them in the course of a few weeks after such payments to the office of the Paymaster General, where they receive a preliminary examination, and are then forwarded to the Second Auditor of the Treasury for final settlement of the paymasters' accounts as disbursing officers responsible to the Treasury Department for the public funds received from it. These accounts remain forever after on file in the office of the Second Auditor, where they can at any time be referred to; and from the date contained on such rolls, &c., as relates to the deceased soldiers, the necessary information is obtained to settle the amounts due them at the time of their decease.

It is apparent, therefore, that it would be impossible to commit the claims of deceased soldiers to the paymaster who pays the regiment, &c. He returns the rolls and the required information only for a few weeks, and the necessary claims of the heirs, &c., could not possibly be prepared and proved in that time. For the same reason these claims could not be settled in the office of the Paymaster General, where these accounts and rolls remain only a short time in transit to the office of the Second Auditor. But in that office these rolls are frequently retained, and can be at once referred to when the claims of the heirs are presented, whether such claims come in in a month or two after the soldier's death, or, as is frequently the case, not for a long period, even years, after his decease.

Another reason for placing the settlement of these claims in charge of the Second Auditor and his revising officer, the Second Comptroller, is the character of the claims themselves. In determining the right of parties to come in as heirs of a deceased soldier, in settling whether sufficient proof of such heirship has been given, and in numerous other similar questions constantly arising under these claims, the accounting officers of the Treasury act in a sort of judicial capacity, and with an authority that could not be allowed ordinary paymasters, or even the Paymaster General, who is simply a military officer and exercises only military authority. The determining such questions can only be vested in officers having final jurisdiction in the matter, and whose decisions are binding, and not in subordinates, whose accounts are liable to revision and suspension, and disallowance, even, if incorrect.

Since the present rebellion attained the vast proportions it has grown to, the large number of troops in service and consequently large number of paymasters required to pay them has multiplied to an enormous extent the number of accounts required to be rendered. Every exertion has been made to have these accounts promptly rendered to this office and examined, and forwarded to the Second Auditor as soon as possible. Owing to the want of sufficient clerical force, and of office accommodation, some accumulation of these accounts occurred in this office, but never to a sufficient extent to interfere with the settlement of these deceased soldiers' claims in the Second Auditor's office. This will more fully appear from the report which was made on this subject from this office on — Instant, a copy of which I have the honor herewith to inclose, marked A. From this report it will be seen that while this office had forwarded to the Second Auditor the accounts of paymasters up to April 30, 1863, the claims of deceased soldiers were only being settled up to September 1, 1862, or more than six months behind the date to which the necessary rolls and accounts were filed with the Auditor, which were required for reference in such cases. Under arrangements lately authorized by the honorable Secretary of War, the clerical force of this office has been and still is being increased, and it is intended to examine and forward to the Second Auditor all the accounts now in this office, and hereafter to have these preliminary examinations made immediately on the receipt of the accounts, and they at once transmitted to that officer for final settlement.

It is presumed that the delay in settling the claims of deceased soldiers in the office of the Second Auditor has arisen from the same cause as that in settling the disbursing accounts of paymasters in the same office, namely, want of sufficient examining clerks both there and in the revising office of the Second Comptroller. A simple remedy, therefore, would be to increase the clerical force in both those offices to such an extent that all claims can be taken up as soon as filed, examined, and passed upon. What increase would be necessary for this purpose can, of course, be best determined by the officers.

Some additional force has already been added in the Second Auditor's office, and he is now settling daily a much larger number of these claims of deceased soldiers than formerly, though still not enough, it is believed, to keep up with the number of fresh ones daily presented.

It is not seen that any other remedy is required, and it is doubted whether any change of the method of settling these claims could be adopted advantageously at the present time, even if such change had some certain benefits or improvements. It is a dangerous experiment to alter a long-established and well-considered method of transacting business in the midst of such great pressure and amount of work as is now existing in every branch of the Government. A new scheme would require time and experience to perfect it; and meanwhile constant trouble and difficulties would interfere, and cause many more delays and complaints than those sought to be removed.

I have the honor to be, sir, with the highest consideration and esteem, your obedient servant,

T. P. ANDREWS,
Paymaster General.

Hon. E. M. STANTON, Secretary of War.

The communications were laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HALE. In connection with these communications I have been instructed by the Committee of Claims to report the bill which was submitted by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. FENTON], and which, as I understand, was prepared in accordance with the wishes of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. HALE, by unanimous consent, then reported from the Committee of Claims a bill to facilitate the payment of bounties and arrears of pay due for the service of wounded and deceased soldiers; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read at length. It provides that upon the death of a non-commissioned officer, private, musician, artificer, or other enlisted person employed in the military service of the United States it shall be the duty of his commanding officer, or, if a member of the non-commissioned staff, it shall be the duty of the adjutant of such command immediately to make triplicate statements thereof, specifying the date, place, and cause of death, embracing the full military history of the deceased, one to be forwarded to the Adjutant General, one to the Surgeon General, and one to the Second Auditor of the Treasury.

The latter officer shall cause such statement to be filed and entered in alphabetical order in books covering all the data contained in such statements.

Upon the death of an officer in the military service the commanding officer is to make full statements in the case of non-commissioned officers, &c. Upon proper proofs of heirship, the Second Auditor of the Treasury is to issue immediately a certificate of the sum found to be due to the deceased for bounties, arrears of pay, clothing, &c., which certificate shall be paid by any paymaster of the United States Army—the certificate to issue and be made payable to heirs in the order now prescribed by law and the rules of the Auditor. Where the death takes place in a hospital, away from the command of the deceased, the surgeon in charge is to make the triplicate statement, and also notify the command to which deceased belonged.

The second section makes it the duty of the commanding officer, on pain of dismissal, to furnish a full descriptive list to the officer or soldier detached from his command, furloughed, or sent to hospital, sick or wounded.

The third section makes it the duty of the Commissioner of Pensions to adjust all claims for bounty, under rules and upon proofs as required in cases of invalid pensions, and to issue certificates therefor, payable by any paymaster of the United States Army.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will only say a word.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HALE. I desire to call for the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. All of this subject has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it properly belongs.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. HALE. I withdraw it.

Mr. FENTON. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise for the purpose of making an extended remarks in favor of the pending bill. I suppose it is well understood by the House that the bill simplifies the mode and facilitates the payment of arrears of pay and bounty due to the widows, children, parents, brothers, or sisters of deceased soldiers, about which there has been so much complaint. In addition, the bill provides for the adjustment of claims for bounties now provided by law to soldiers wounded in battle by the Commissioner of Pensions, and upon the same proofs required to obtain invalid pensions, thereby obviating the necessity for making two sets, separate claims and duplicate papers. No one can object to this.

The delay in the payment of these dues to the relatives of deceased soldiers, arrears of pay and bounty, has been the source of wide-spread complaint, and the subject had, early in the session, my earnest investigation in search of the cause and the proper remedy, so that the heirs of those who laid down their lives in defense of the institutions and liberties of the country should not complain of unnecessary delay in the adjustment of their claims. The bill before us accomplishes the object, in my judgment. At all events, it points out the way for payment within sixty days from the death of the soldier, if proper proof of heirship is made, and with less clerical force, instead of taking twelve to eighteen months, as now.

One word in reference to what the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs has said, that this whole subject has been referred to that committee. Early in this session this bill was introduced by me, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and a few days subsequently, by order of the House, the whole subject in reference to the delay of payment of arrears and bounty due to disabled or deceased soldiers was sent to the Committee of Claims. The attention of the Secretary of the Treasury and the Second Auditor was called to the bill which I had introduced and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It was thought by them, and so communicated to the House, that this would obviate the defects in the present method, and reduce it to the most speedy and perfect system. In compliance with the resolution of the House, the Committee of Claims have submitted the pending report and bill, which is a transcript of the bill introduced by me, and I hope that there will be no objection on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs because it comes from the Committee of Claims. It can make no difference to the House, nor will the country care, what committee brings in the measure; it should be passed without delay.

But I did not intend to speak to the bill, but to defend a most faithful public officer from the charges of neglect or needless delay in the settling of these claims; and I ask to submit a statement, for I am convinced that the Second Auditor (Hon. E. B. French) has done all any person could, with the force under him, and with the law as it now stands, to dispatch with promptness and fidelity the business relating to these accounts.

The data in the Auditor's office will show that in addition to those causes of delay generally known to exist, there are many other very fruitful and annoying ones which those engaged in the settlement of this class of claims meet with constantly, and which are difficult to be fully understood by persons not somewhat acquainted with the manner in which settlements have to be made.

First. In the volunteer regiments of many of the States consolidations are made of two or more regiments; and frequently, in such cases, no mention is made upon the rolls of the date at which the consolidation took place; in consequence of which much time and labor are required in ascertaining to what period the deceased soldier was last paid, which fact is essential to the just settlement of the claim of his heirs. For instance, suppose the third Kentucky regiment was united with the seventh Kentucky September 10, 1862, but the date does not appear upon the rolls. John Jones originally enlisted in the third regiment June 4, 1862, but dies a member of the seventh regiment February 20, 1863, some months after the consolidation. The period to which he was last paid is sought for. The muster-roll of the seventh regiment for January and February, 1863, contains his name and states that he enlisted June 4, 1862, not saying in what regiment. The roll of the seventh for November and December, 1862, has his name, but it is found that he was not paid for those two months; the roll for September and October, 1862, also has his name, but he was not paid for those months; the roll for July and August, 1862, is examined, but his name is not upon it; the clerk then, thinking his name may have been omitted by mistake, examines the next preceding roll, that for June and July, which covers the date of his enlistment. His name is not found. It is then concluded that he must have originally enlisted in some other regiment; but in what one, and when was he transferred? None of the rolls of the seventh mention the consolidation, and other means must be resorted to in order to ascertain, which necessarily requires much time and labor in addition to that already expended.

Second. Cases are met with where the name of the soldier does not appear upon any roll of the company of which he was a member, in which case, of course, after much looking up and examining of rolls to no purpose, the application must be suspended while a correspondence is going on between the office and the attorney acting for the claimant, and between the attorney and his client in turn. This defect in rolls is of frequent occurrence, and retards the action of the office to a great extent. It requires as much time to look up the rolls and examine them, and write to the attorney for further evidence, in a case of this kind, as to settle a perfect claim. Additional proof may be received in three weeks, but probably not under six; meanwhile the rolls are needed, perhaps, by the clerks settling paymasters' accounts, or at the Second Comptroller's, and when the requisite evidence arrives they must be hunted up again, and as much time is required in the final settlement of the claim as would have sufficed to settle many claims at first.

Third. Regiments, particularly of cavalry, are frequently divided into several detachments and remain so for a long time. The rolls of such detachments often utterly fail to give any data necessary to the settlement of the claims of the heirs of those who may have died. Only the names of those who are paid appear, no information as to what has become of the others being given; and as members of the same company are put into several different detachments, it is found to be almost impossible to obtain the necessary information for the settlement of claims arising under them.

Fourth. Perhaps the failure of company officers to note upon the rolls the several dates at which soldiers die is the cause of more trouble and delay than any one of the above-mentioned defects, and is of frequent occurrence.

These are some of the prominent impediments in the way of the settlement of claims, for which the remedy is to be found in this bill. There are other serious difficulties, arising from the confused manner in which clothing accounts are stated upon the rolls and final statements. The amount of delay produced by this cause is nearly equal to that incurred by any of the defects heretofore named. This, however, is rather a subject for departmental than legislative action, and can be entirely and completely remedied by the Department. The difficulties with which the Secretary of the Treasury and the Auditor have had to contend are great; pass this bill, and you give them relief from the pressure of obstacles and complaints, and make the poor and deserving claimants, the relatives of our brave soldiers, rejoice.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is very true, as I have stated, that this whole subject has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. It is equally true that that committee have submitted it to a sub-committee for close investigation; that it was recently the subject of discussion before that committee; that that committee is engaged upon this whole matter thus sent to them by the House for examination; and now, sir, while thus engaged we are surprised with what has just taken place. We have the explanation of the gentleman who introduced the bill and had it referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, while the subject has been sent to that committee, by some reference or in some way it has also been brought before the Committee of Claims, which committee, satisfying themselves after consultation with some of the Executive Departments, have now submitted the pending proposition, and ask that it be put on its passage under the operation of the previous question. I submit, and I do so in plain words, whether this is acting with a proper respect toward the Committee on Military Affairs—the very same subject having been referred to that committee and having been at different times under discussion there, that committee also having under consideration a bill which covers this and kindred matters? When that is the case, is this subject to be brought before the House by this side-wind? And I say this without meaning any disrespect to the Committee of Claims, or to anybody bringing forward this bill. I ask whether it is proper to report it when the same subject has been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and on which they have bestowed close and careful attention?

Mr. Speaker, I have not had time to look at the pending bill. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FENTON] says that it corresponds with that which, on his motion, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Suppose it does, the Committee on Military Affairs have been revising that bill to ascertain whether it contains all of the provisions that it ought to contain.

Mr. FENTON. I will say that the pending bill, I believe, meets with the entire approval of the sub-committee of the Committee on Military Affairs, to which it was referred. I can see no reason for objection in the manner in which the proposition has been brought before the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. It is not a question of pride at all.

Mr. HALE. The Committee of Claims examined into the subject, and on the recommendation of the Second Auditor they have reported in favor of this bill becoming the law. There has been delay for considerable time to get it before the House. There is no idea of doing anything discourteous to the Committee on Military Affairs. If that be the only objection, we are perfectly willing that that committee shall report the bill, and put it on its passage. Our only object is to save time. We think that the payment of these claims of disabled soldiers should be speedily accomplished. It was because the Committee on Military Affairs did not report the bill that the Committee of Claims felt it to be their duty to bring the subject before the House. It is to expedite a meritorious class of claims, the delay in paying which has been the cause of just complaint. This bill will facilitate the payment of a large class of meritorious claims. There can be no objection to the bill by anybody except upon the mere matter of courtesy. I had no idea of committing any act of discourtesy toward the Committee on Military Affairs. I disclaim any such intention. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to be heard one moment longer.

Mr. HALE. I have no objection, but I do not wish to lose my right to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania will retain the floor.

Mr. SCHENCK. I have not supposed there was any intentional discourtesy upon the part of the Committee of Claims. I have simply stated to the House the facts of this matter, and I submit to the House whether, under the circumstances, having once referred the whole subject to a committee which has not, as a committee, had an opportunity to read or to examine the bill, (it not having been printed,) or to ascertain whether it contains all that is desired, they will, merely upon the assurance of a member of the sub-committee to which the matter was referred, be setting a proper precedent of action toward a committee of this House by passing this bill in this manner? If the House will examine the bill they will find that it provides for the dismissal of officers from service for penalties, and for various matters connected with military discipline as well as military law—matters which have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs for examination and report. If the House feel disposed to dispense with committees whose duties are defined by the particular subjects intrusted to their charge, perhaps it may be well that any committee should make a report upon any subject without reference to the duties devolved upon them.

Mr. SPALDING. Under ordinary circumstances I should agree with my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] but I understand that this bill simply provides a way whereby our disabled soldiers may in a more speedy manner recover their back pay and bounty. It is a matter which is pressed upon us from all quarters, and I beg gentlemen to forego their objections, and let this bill pass now. It is a bill which, I am told, is entirely unexceptionable, and will give these men their pay in sixty days, which they could not otherwise get in twelve months. I hope we shall waive all questions of courtesy in behalf of this class of men, and pass this bill without delay.

Mr. HALE. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed the following joint resolutions; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

Joint resolution (No. 19) of thanks to Commodore Cadwalader Ringgold, and the officers and crew of the United States ship Sabine; and Joint resolution (No. 11) of thanks to Major General George H. Thomas and the officers and men who fought under his command at the battle of Chickamauga.

THE ELECTORAL COLLEGE.

Mr. DEMING, by unanimous consent, introduced the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire, and report by bill or otherwise, whether the condition of the country imposes any difficulties in the way of such an organization of the electoral college as will enable it legally and constitutionally to elect a President of the United States for the term commencing March 4, 1855; and whether, if such difficulties exist, they can be remedied by any legislation of Congress.

Mr. F. CLARKE introduced, by unanimous consent, the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That in order to secure beyond a contingency the permanent payment of interest on the public debt in coin, and prevent an undue increase of debt, and restrict within proper limits the aggregate paper circulation of the country, the Committee of Ways and Means are hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the duties on foreign imports upon articles of luxury of a class, as far as practicable, not manufactured or produced in this country, so as, in their opinion, to produce a revenue of $120,000,000 per annum. Also, into the expediency of increasing the internal revenue tax upon articles of luxury, and upon such articles of domestic manufactures as come in competition with foreign articles upon which the import duties are advanced, so as in the opinion of the committee to produce an annual revenue of $330,000,000. Also, into the expediency of restricting the bank circulation of the country, State and national, to $330,000,000. Also, into the expediency of authorizing the issue of bonds to the amount of $200,000,000, the whole or any portion thereof to be disposed of at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, when, in his judgment, he may deem it expedient and proper to use the proceeds for the redemption of Government legal-tender notes; and report at an early day by bill or otherwise.

CONFISCATED PROPERTY.

Mr. ELIOT. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the call of committees for reports, under which the House will resume the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 18) to amend a joint resolution explanatory of an act to suppress insurrection, to punish treason and rebellion, to seize and confiscate the property of rebels, and for other purposes, approved July 17, 1862, on which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SMITH] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SMITH. I had intended to proceed with my remarks this morning, but I am so indisposed that I will yield the floor to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BROOMALL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, the question before the House is upon the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amendment. The proposed amendment is to strike out the body of the resolution, and insert a repeal of the resolution of the last Congress explanatory of the act of July 17, 1862. Neither the resolution nor the proposed amendment can be said to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States, but as the act itself is said to be, the Constitution is necessarily drawn into the discussion. And the questions to which it gives rise are, first, whether the lands of a person engaged in the present rebellion may be taken from him absolutely by the process of law prescribed by the act of 1862 without violating that provision of the Constitution which says, "No attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted;" and, secondly, whether it is expedient to take the lands of such persons absolutely.

I have examined these questions wholly outside of their political bearings, if they have any, and with a determination to be in the right without regard to consequences; and, having arrived at a settled conviction, I desire to be heard upon the course of reasoning which has convinced me.

It is necessary, in the first branch of the inquiry, to go somewhat into the doctrine of attainder.

In the English law there were two processes by which attainder was produced. One was by bill of attainder, an act of Parliament passed for the purpose of attainting a person charged with crime. This might be done either in the presence or absence of the person charged—either in his lifetime or after his death. In bills of attainder there was no arraignment, no conviction, no judgment, no sentence. These bills were legislative acts, passed for the purpose of reaching persons who had fled the kingdom, or whose high power overawed the courts of justice, or whose alleged offenses were not cognizable by those courts. The persons charged were not convicted; they were enacted guilty and attainted.

The other mode by which attainder arose was, as a consequence of judgment of death for treason or felony after trial and conviction. There was no judgment or decree of attainder. The judgment was simply one of death, and the attainder was an incident to that judgment, inseparable from it. The moment the judgment was pronounced the culprit became ipso facto attainted. The common law knew no such thing as a judgment of death for treason or felony that did not attain the person against whom it was pronounced.

Attainders were, therefore, either legislative or judicial.

The consequences of attainder were the same in both these cases, except that in a bill of attainder it was competent for Parliament to modify those consequences in any particular case at will, though this was rarely done, whereas the consequences

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 4, 1864.

NEW SERIES.....No. 29.

of attainder resulting from judgment or death were fixed and uniform. In the language of the old law writers, an attainer was said to work corruption of blood and forfeiture of estates and chattels.

By the corruption of blood the person attainted was deprived of the power of inheriting and transmitting lands. There could be no descent to him, or through him, or from him. The forfeiture of lands related back to the time of the commission of the offense; that of chattels only to the time of conviction.

It is necessary for us to bear in mind this much of the law on a subject familiar to the framers of the Constitution, in order properly to interpret their meaning in the clause in question. It is very certain they had no allusion to the first of these species of attainder—that by bill or act of Parliament. A prior clause of the instrument, in article one, section nine, disposed of that by providing that “no bill of attainder shall be passed.” Our inquiry, therefore, is limited to the attainer consequent upon judgment of death. The Constitution prohibited bills of attainder, and restricted judicial attainers for treason by providing that they should not work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted, but it neither prohibited nor restricted attainers for murder or other felony not amounting to treason. There is no restriction upon the power of Congress to prescribe the punishment of crime, unless it be found in this provision, or in the one which prohibits “cruel and unusual punishments.” It may not be so easy to ascertain what the framers of the Constitution meant as to ascertain what they did not mean.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. Cox] maintains that by the restriction the lands of the offender can only be taken for life as a punishment for the crime of treason, whether the process be by attainer or by a sale of the lands for the payment of a fine imposed upon the offender as a part of the sentence. This position is singular. There are other crimes against the United States besides the crime of treason, running from it down the scale of depravity to the fraudulent use of postage stamps. A few of these are punished with death, but most of them by fine and imprisonment. To satisfy the fine imposed for some small larceny committed on the high seas, the lands of the offender may be sold from him absolutely; and yet it is gravely urged that for the crime of treason—the highest known to the law—they can only be sold for the life of the offender. The absurdity of this position becomes the more manifest when it is remembered that at the time of the formation of the Constitution there was no punishment known for the crime of treason in any country in the world except that of death. We have therefore a grave assembly actually providing in an instrument intended to perpetuate their collected wisdom to the latest posterity that the lands of a convicted traitor, under sentence of death, and just about to be hanged, should be taken from him for life as a part of the punishment of his crime; and the same assembly in the same instrument allowing the lands of a convicted thief, where the life estate would really be worth something, to be sold from him absolutely in expiation of his offense. Surely the framers of the Constitution did not mean this.

Another theory is that Congress may impose a fine as a part of the sentence of the convicted traitor, under which his lands may be seized and sold absolutely, but that where the lands themselves are forfeited as an incident to the judgment of death they revert back to the heir immediately upon the death of the traitor. This position is open to the same objection as the former. Why should the lands be forfeited at all if for so short a period as elapses between the conviction and execution of the criminal? I say between the conviction and execution, because although the forfeiture relates back to the commission of the offense, yet it does not carry mesne profits and so does not avail the Government anything until after the conviction.

There is still another objection to this position.

Why should the framers of the Constitution permit that to be done by one of these processes which it prohibited by the other? Why should they allow the lands to be sold absolutely for the fine and in the same case only forfeited for life by the attainer?

It may be said that Congress, having the power to fix the punishment for treason, might make it a long imprisonment instead of death, and thereby render the forfeited life estate of some value to the Government, and its forfeiture a corresponding punishment to the criminal. This would make a material change in the doctrine of attainer, yet it would be possible. But the question recurs, why single out the crime of treason for this immunity from punishment? Why favor the traitor more than the murderer, the pirate, the forger, the thief? Again, fine is the usual accompaniment of imprisonment, and for the fine it is conceded by these theorists the lands may be sold absolutely. Of what use then would the provision be?

It would be curious to trace the results of this theory. A man commits treason. By the very act a life estate in his lands is forfeited. What becomes of the remainder? It either remains in the traitor unforfeited or does not. If it remains unforfeited, the traitor may sell it for the entire value of the whole estate; for it must be remembered that the purchaser only awaits the hanging to go into possession, and so the Government would forfeit nothing. But it may be said that the execution may be put off for twenty or thirty years to obviate this pro tanto, or the traitor may shelter himself within the enemy's country, and so not get hanged. Grant this; still the traitor may sell the remainder and use the proceeds in aid of the enemy. This is supposing the remainder to remain unforfeited. Now suppose it forfeited. Then it is true the traitor cannot sell it or use it for the enemy, but it is forfeited, and the Constitution says, according to these theorists, that the remainder cannot be forfeited. But suppose the Constitution does not mean what it says, but directly the opposite: that is to say, that both life estate and remainder can be forfeited. What becomes of the remainder? It will be said it vests in the traitor's children. Yet there is no warrant in the Constitution for such a conclusion. That document says nothing about the children nor of the remainder. There ought to be some clear, unequivocal provision to justify legislating one man's property from him and vesting it in another. We must bear in mind that we are assuming the power to take the remainder from the traitor against the clear prohibition to forfeit more than a life estate, and then vesting it in third persons without the smallest warrant in the Constitution for it.

But grant all that is asked on the other side of the question. Insert or imagine all that is necessary to carry out that view. Thus, a man commits treason. By the act his estate in lands is divided into a life estate and remainder. The life estate is forfeited to the Government and the remainder is vested in the children immediately. This is a mode of creating a remainder of which Ferne and Blackstone knew nothing; but the present is an age of inventions, and remainders created by crime, though very novel, cannot be said to be impossible things! But why confer a benefit upon the children of the traitor? We are asked not to punish them for the crime of the father. This we readily accede to, but why give them a premium upon it? No law-maker would intentionally make the crime of the father a pecuniary benefit to the children.

It is important to the inquiry in hand to trace out the consequences of forfeiture for life by attainer, because the same results would follow confiscation for life, and if life attainers are impracticable, life confiscations are equally so. If the argument is not conclusive upon the first branch of the inquiry, the right to confiscate absolutely, it will at least have a strong bearing upon the second, the policy of doing so.

Suppose a father and an only son be implicated in the same treason. What becomes of the remainder then? It cannot be cast upon the son. His blood is corrupted. He can take nothing.

Whatever he would otherwise take passes immediately to the Government. But the Government can only take a life estate, and that it has already. What then becomes of the remainder? Would it go to the children of the son? No. His blood is corrupted during his life. He takes nothing. Hence nothing can be taken through him or from him. What then becomes of the remainder?

It must be borne in mind that this is no improbable state of facts. In this rebellion there are cases of two and even three generations of traitors.

There is much force in the views of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ORTH] and the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS,] that the forfeiture was not to be worked at all unless it should be worked in the lifetime of the offender. They would interpret the clause thus: “but no attainer for treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except it shall do it during the life of the person attainted.” The sentence is elliptical. In all renderings, something must be implied after the word except. To make the interpretation of the gentleman from Ohio, we must insert or imply proper words: thus, “but no attainer for treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except such as shall continue only during the life of the person attainted.” I use the word except in both versions because I find it in the original. Webster and the gentleman from Ohio differ in opinion about its meaning. Webster says it is equivalent to unless. Probably I ought to let posterity settle the question between these learned and honorable gentlemen. But at the risk of being accused of presumption in offering an opinion where such high authorities differ, I will suggest that except always means unless, except (or unless) where it is used as an imperative verb or preposition, with its object expressed; and that there is no object expressed in the clause in question. Congress did not, however, adopt the system of attainer. Hence which of the interpretations is the true one is of no importance whatever, unless (or except) an attempt shall be made to adopt that system.

If the framers of the Constitution intended to forfeit the lands of a traitor only for his life and restore them to his heirs at his death, they selected a very unfortunate word in the word “during.” If the phrase had been “except for the life of the person attainted,” the meaning contended for would have been more apparent. To say that a man cannot convey lands except during his life is to say what everybody knows, that he cannot convey them except while he is alive. But to say he cannot except for life, is to say he cannot except for a life estate. Both these words as they are used have reference to continuance. The difference is this: “during” refers to the happening of the event, requiring it to happen within the period specified. “For” has reference to the extent of the event, requiring it to cover the entire period, and no more. In the language of grammarians, “during the life of the person attainted” may be a phrase in the nature of an adverb, modifying the meaning of the verb “work,” while “for the life of the person attainted” would be a phrase in the nature of an adjective, modifying the meaning of the noun “forfeiture.” One limits the time of working; the other the duration of the forfeiture. An event may happen during a period, without continuing for the period.

All claim here is that “during” is an unfortunate word if the intention was to limit the continuance of the forfeiture, since its more obvious function would be to limit the time of the working. It may, however, do either. An estate may vest during widowhood, or an estate during widowhood may vest. In the former case the estate may be for years, for life, or in fee; in the latter it can be only for or during widowhood.

Again, why is this argument limited to the lands of the offender? What warrant is there in the language of the Constitution or in the doctrine of attainer to exclude from the operation of the restriction the personal estate of the traitor? The words of the Constitution are that “no attainer for treason shall work forfeiture.” The forfeiture of attainder is of all the property of the offender, personal as well as real. By what peculiar contrivance has the personal property of the traitor escaped the constitutional restriction? The answer is that by the common law there can be no life estate in chattels; that the possession carries with it the entire property. Let this be granted, yet by the laws of England and of the several States of the Union there is what is equivalent to a life estate in personality. When justice requires it, the courts have no difficulty in giving one the income of personality for life and another the principal in quasi remainder. But if this were not the case, where the organic law of the land provides expressly that the chattels of a traitor shall only be forfeited for his life, it is the business of the law-making power to contrive some process by which this provision can be carried out.

There is, therefore, no warrant for the distinction attempted to be made between realty and personality, and either the latter cannot or the former can be forfeited absolutely for treason. Now, a pecuniary fine is a forfeiture of the personality of him on whom it is imposed, and, as far as it goes, it is an absolute forfeiture. It follows, then, that not the smallest pecuniary fine can be imposed upon the traitor, or that all his estate, real and personal, can be taken in expiation of his crime.

The statute of 7 Anne, chapter twenty-one, enacted about the beginning of the eighteenth century, was intended to have the effect now attributed to the clause in question of the Constitution. That statute must have been familiar to the framers of the Constitution, and the fact that they did not copy it or embrace its provisions would naturally give rise to the suspicion that they did not intend to produce the consequences it did. The statute provides that "No attainder for treason shall extend to the disinheriting of any heir, nor to the prejudice of the right or title of any person other than the right or title of the offender during his natural life only; and that it shall and may be lawful for every person to whom the right or interest of any lands, tenements, or hereditaments, after the death of any such offender, should or might have appertained if no such attainder had been, to enter into the same."

On the other hand, the words of the Constitution are:

"But no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood, or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained."

The statute limits its operations by express words to realty; the Constitution not only does not, but uses a term which embraces all property of all kinds. The inference is that the Constitution was intended to embrace all property of all kinds. The statute fixes by express words the duration of the forfeiture, limiting it to the life of the offender, and expressly restoring the estate at his death to the heir; the Constitution does not expressly limit the duration of the forfeiture. It possibly requires it to be worked in the lifetime of the offender, but whether it intended to limit its duration to that period is by no means clear. With a statute before them expressly providing for the restoration of the estates to the heir on the death of the traitor, it is singular that the framers of the Constitution did not follow its provisions if they intended the same result.

The purpose of the constitutional clause was certainly to limit in some degree the effect of attainder. Its authors might wholly have prohibited this relic of a darker age, but they chose not to restrict the powers of Congress to that extent.

Notwithstanding the absurd consequences of attempting to carry out a system of attainders restricted according to this theory of the constitutional provision, I am of the opinion that the framers of the instrument really intended to prohibit attainders from having any effect except for the life of the offender. I am forced to this conclusion partly by what seems to have been the opinion of contemporaneous writers, partly by the fact that England had done the same thing by the statute of Anne, and partly by the consideration that that could have been the only possible intention. The words refer either to the time of working or to the duration of the forfeiture. That they do not refer to the time of working, restricting that to the lifetime of the offender, is evident when we reflect that the clause relates to judicial attainders only, legislative attainders being prohibited altogether by the previous provision, and that judicial attainders were always consummated during the lifetime of the person attained. The time of working, therefore, needed no fixing, and would admit of none, and the duration of the forfeiture is all that could have been intended to be restricted by the clause in question.

If it be asked why the framers of the Constitution inserted a provision the carrying out of which leads to consequences so absurd, the answer is this: they were more intent upon restricting this relic of a darker age than upon seeing how it could be put in operation so restricted. They knew that if Congress found difficulty in enforcing the system of attainders under the restriction there was this remedy: not to enforce them at all. And accordingly the first Congress that met after the adoption of the Constitution took the alternative, and did not attempt to enforce the system, but in so many words abolished the consequences of attainder for all offenses.

Will it be said, therefore, that there can be no forfeiture of lands or chattels for treason or other crimes because there can be no attainder; that therefore a man's property cannot be taken as a punishment for crime?

If the Constitution had provided that "judgment of death for treason shall not produce attainder" would it have followed that Congress could not make fine and forfeiture a part of the punishment of treason? The judgment of death for murder does not produce attainder. Yet no one doubts the power of Congress to make fine and forfeiture a part of the punishment for murder.

There is no constitutional limit of the power of Congress to affix fine and forfeiture to crime as a punishment, and this power has been exercised without limit from 1790 to the present time. All the Constitution does is to limit the effect of attainder. It might be curious to examine into the extent to which attainder is limited if Congress were about to establish a system of attainder. But this is not the case; so far from it, the act of 1790 renders the constitutional provision wholly useless for the time by abolishing attainders altogether, or, which is the same thing, abolishing their consequences: "But no conviction or judgment for any of the offenses aforesaid shall work corruption of blood or any forfeiture of estate."

It is worthy of remark that this very act of 1790 which abolished attainders specifies twenty-six different crimes, including treason, and prescribes their punishment in a few instances by death, but mostly by fine and imprisonment. Did the act that imposed the fines enact that no fines should be imposed when it said that "no judgment for any of the crimes aforesaid shall work forfeiture?"

The act of 1790 affords us a clue to the meaning of the clause of the Constitution in question. It was enacted immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, and to some extent by the same men who framed that instrument, and who therefore were likely to know its meaning. The act enumerates the offenses and fixes the punishments, mostly by taking away the property, more or less, of the offender; and yet after this it provides that no judgment for any of the offenses shall work forfeiture. Did the act intend to defeat itself? Did it mean that an offender's property should be taken from him for his crime, but that he should not forfeit his property? By no means: It intended the offender to forfeit that part of his property which the court should fix by the sentence, but it intended the mere judgment to have no forfeiting effect whatever. In short it intended to abolish attainders with all their consequences.

We can see a reason for this. At common law the judgment in cases of felony forfeited all the offender's property, whether much or little, and without regard to the grade of the crime. This was unequal, unjust. The spirit of a more enlightened age required the laws to graduate the forfeiture to the offense, and to make the courts say in the sentence how much of the offender's property should be forfeited. The act of 1790 says in effect that the courts must fix the forfeiture by the sentence, and that the mere judgment shall work neither forfeiture nor corruption of blood.

The clause of the Constitution is singularly correspondent with the act of Congress. It provides that Congress shall have power to fix the punishment of treason. It does not limit this power in any degree except by prohibiting cruel and unusual punishments. It then limits the effect of a judgment for treason, not by abolishing attainders, but by restricting their effects. Congress acts under both these clauses. It fixes the punishment of treason, first, by death; afterwards by fine and imprisonment. It limits the effect of the judgment by abolishing attainders altogether, in both cases keeping within the bounds of the Constitution.

Now, until and unless and except an attempt shall be made to revive the system of attainders, it is only a curious inquiry to what extent the Constitution restrains their effects. As long as the law stands as it does now by the act of 1790 there is no danger of violating the constitutional provision in question. If there are no attainders at all, a fortiori are there no attainders working forfeiture except during the life of the attainted.

Upon the whole matter I am convinced, first, that the framers of the Constitution did not intend by the clause in question to limit the power of Congress to prescribe the punishment of treason, but to limit the effect of attainders; and, second, that attainders being abolished by the act of 1790 no act of Congress that does not reestablish them can in any way come in conflict with that clause of the Constitution.

Now, the act of 1862 is not itself a bill of attainder. It is a public and not a private act of Congress. It is a general law, not one affecting an individual and his lands, and it does not revive the doctrine of corruption of blood. Neither does it revive the other species of attainder, that consequent on judgment of death. It provides no arraignment, no judgment of death, and, of course, no attainder. It merely provides a process of law by which the property of public enemies shall be taken for the use of Government, a power possessed and exercised by all nations in all ages of the world, necessarily incident to a state of war, and expressly provided for in that clause of the Constitution which empowers Congress to declare war. It will not do for those at war with us to say they are only rebels, not public enemies. That position would do for us. They have denied all allegiance to our Government and have set up one for themselves antagonistic to ours. Possibly we might consider them rebels and traitors and hang them as we catch them; but certainly they cannot claim the benefits of allegiance after repudiating it. They therefore cannot complain that the act of 1862 treats them as public enemies and confiscates their estates as such.

There are two positions taken by very opposite parties upon the status of those engaged in the rebellion. One is that they are for all purposes public enemies, and to be treated as such; the other is that for all purposes they are our fellow-citizens, and entitled to the benefits of the Constitution and laws of the United States. I think both these positions erroneous. I think the true theory is this: the rebels are in the wrong by their own voluntary act; they are therefore not entitled to any of the advantages of their position, but are subject to all the disadvantages of it. Against the Government they cannot claim to be either public enemies or subjects, but the Government at its election may treat them in either capacity, sometimes and for some purposes in one, and sometimes and for other purposes in the other. When subjects revolt the sovereign, if they are few, applies the civil law, and hangs them or pardons them. In theory he may do so without regard to the number of the revolting subjects. But in practice, as the number increases, the difficulty and the cruelty of enforcing civil law increase, and the more humane laws of war gradually step in. Captives, instead of being hanged for treason are treated as prisoners of war. Other nations interfere in defense of their subjects. Aiding and abetting traitors is treason; supplying traitors with food and arms is aiding and abetting them. To prevent the consequences of this, other nations require the granting of belligerent rights to insurgents. Thus the laws of war take the place of the civil law. But as between the sovereign and the revolted subjects the right to enforce civil law is not changed. The laws of war are only super-added, to be exercised at the option of the sovereign, subject to the rights of other nations and of humanity. Subject to these rights it is for the sovereign to elect, in every particular case, under which code of laws he will treat those in revolt. The Government therefore may seize and confiscate the property of traitors absolutely, under the laws of war; or it may fine and forfeit absolutely under the civil law; but it cannot extend the effects of attainder for treason beyond the life of the person attainted.

The second branch of the inquiry is whether it is policy to forfeit the lands of traitors absolutely. This question must be governed by the extent to which the forfeiture is proposed to be carried. All loyal men ought to agree that the entire property of the rebel leaders should be confiscated absolutely, and all reasonable men ought to agree that the lands of the unwilling conscript ought not to be confiscated even for his life. Two questions, therefore, arise: 1. Between these extremes where ought confiscation to begin and cease? And, 2. Is there a class of intermediate cases in which confiscation should be for life only?

The first question will afford little trouble. The act of 1862 limits the confiscation to the rebel leaders; men holding commissions to rob and murder, and to the property in loyal States of those who have voluntarily left their property and homes and joined the rebels. There is no wholesale confiscation of the property of rebels provided for by the act. It contemplates punishing only the few leaders by confiscation; men who, if caught, would be convicted of treason, murder, robbery, by even a jury of tender-hearted conservative gentlemen.

The next inquiry is, ought confiscation to be for life for the lesser degrees of guilt? If you could take chattels for life, and so punish all similar offenders alike; if you could not take part of the offender's property absolutely and leave him the rest, and so graduate the punishment to the crime; in short, if there was a necessity to confiscate for life the idea might be tolerated. Life estates, the remainder being in persons in whom the life tenant has no interest, have a baneful influence upon the country. They impoverish the soil. They waste the buildings. Where ever they exist the remainder-man succeeds but to a ruin and a desolation. I would not willingly fix upon a country already impoverished by the institution of slavery and desolated by civil war the blighting effects of a system of life estates. No! Where confiscation is resorted to let it be absolute. If in particular cases that should be too much punishment, confiscate absolutely only a part of the offender's property. If the Congress of 1790 found life forfeitures impracticable, that of 1864 ought to hesitate before inaugurating a system of life confiscation.

It is gravely urged upon this floor that the laws of war do not authorize the seizure and confiscation of the property of enemies except taken as prize at sea. This is wholly a mistake. No writer upon the law of nations can be cited to sustain such an opinion. Writers discourage such confiscations. They argue against their policy. They take the ground that it is not done in modern warfare, but they do not deny the right of the captor to appropriate all property of enemies to his own use. In a state of war there is no limit to the power of the conqueror. He may do whatever is necessary to be done to achieve or maintain his position, and he alone is the judge of the necessity. What are called "war powers" are powers arising from the law of necessity, the highest of all laws, at least of all human laws—laws which every sovereign Power must enforce and follow without writ of error, or liability for mistake of law or fact to any human tribunal. This may bear hard on individuals, but they have no redress. War is a state of hardship on individuals, and the responsibility is on those who inaugurate it. Writers may talk of what ought to be in a state of war, but they cannot fix what must be. Whenever a state of war exists, however, the sovereign Power must judge carefully and honestly what is necessary. In doing so it ought to keep in view the dictates of humanity, though in this there is no binding obligation. England committed no crime against the law of nations in her treatment of the rebels in India, though the civilized world read the tale of her doings with horror. Whatever measures the victor judges necessary must be submitted to by the vanquished, because the appeal to arms is the submission of the cause to the arbitrary will of him who shall prove to be the stronger.

But while denying all limit to the powers arising from a state of war, I would not willingly assent to measures which the sense of impartial lookers-on would denounce as cruel. I would therefore vote against a universal confiscation of lands in the rebel territory until satisfied that such course is necessary, just as I would oppose the extermination of those in rebellion until satisfied of the necessity of it. But when satisfied of the necessity in either case, I should fearlessly advocate both these extreme measures in order to save the Government.

The act of 1862, wholly unaffected by the resolutions which accompanied it, proposes only the confiscation of the estates of the leaders, the willing and ardent workers in this unholy crusade against the best Government ever framed by man. In doing so, it strikes me that it keeps far within the limits to which it might reasonably go. It exhibits an example of moderation to the civilized world. I shall therefore vote the most willingly for that measure which interferes the least with the operation of the act of 1862.

Mr. WADSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. DAWES. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. SCHENCK. I would suggest to the gentleman from Massachusetts that he can call up his election case at any time.

Mr. DAWES. While I can call it up at any time, I do not desire to crowd it as against the enrollment act, which I consider a matter of greater consequence. If the gentleman from Ohio is not prepared to proceed with the consideration of that bill, I will call up the election case.

ENROLLMENT ACT.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union upon the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. DAWES in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being Senate bill No. 36, to amend an act entitled "An act for enrolling and calling out the national forces, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1863.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the amendment offered yesterday by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] to strike out all after the word "enlisted" in line nineteen, page 4, down to the end of the fifth section, as follows:

And if any drafted person shall hereafter pay money for the procuration of a substitute, under the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft on that call, and his name shall be retained on the roll, and he shall be subject to draft on future calls; and the maximum of commutation under said act shall hereafter be $400 instead of $300.

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

And so much of the thirteenth section of the act of which this act is an amendment as authorizes exemption from military service by the payment of a sum not exceeding $300 is hereby repealed.

Mr. SCHENCK. Mr. Chairman, before the committee proceeds to vote upon that amendment, I desire to make some remarks in relation to the general character of the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, in order that there may be a clearer understanding in the mind of the House as to the questions presented between that substitute and the bill as it came from the Senate. Gentlemen inquire of me so frequently as to whether this or the other thing is intended, and there seems to be so much confusion prevailing, owing probably to the length of the bill, as to the comparison between the provisions of the Senate bill and the proposed substitute, that I go into this more lengthened explanation to avoid the necessity of replying to such questions hereafter.

This is a Senate bill, and the House committee propose to amend it by a substitute. After watching the course, progress, and history of the bill which has come to us from the Senate after due deliberation there, the House committee found themselves constrained in so many respects to follow the lead of the Senate, and found upon conference that they were so agreed upon most of the points, that they were willing to accept in the main the Senate bill, and let it be passed, instead of a separate House bill; and thus, in a manner, whatever credit may attach to the construction of the bill or the provisions made for the matters contained in it, will rather belong to the Senate than to the House committee or the House, if there be any feeling upon that subject.

But in order to a clear understanding of the amendments proposed by the House committee, it seemed to be advisable to put them in the form of a substitute, because, in the revision of the several sections of the Senate bill, sometimes phraseology is altered, sometimes a slight modification is made in some matters of detail, sometimes a slight change is made in some of the principles involved; and thus it was thought that the matter would assume a better and more convenient shape for legislation by putting the amendments that suggested themselves to the Committee on Military Affairs in the form of a substitute for the Senate bill.

Now, gentlemen ask me wherein the substitute differs from the bill brought in from the Senate. In the first place, many seem to think that while the bill of the Senate has provided for retaining a commutation clause with this change, that they have increased the amount to be paid for the procuration of substitutes from $300 to $400, the House committee have made no provision upon the subject. Well, it is true that the House committee have presented nothing upon that subject; but why? Because the act of Congress passed March 3, 1862, is an act to which this bill is an amendment, and that act, which is still in force, contains the $300 commutation clause. The House committee have been unwilling to disturb it; they prefer not to amend the existing law upon that subject. The difference, therefore, gentlemen will please to observe, between the Senate bill and the substitute offered by the Military Committee of the House is this: that whereas the Senate bill retains the commutation clause, increasing the amount from $300 to $400, the House committee proposes no change in that particular at all, but leaves the law as it now exists.

Again, it will be found that in one part of the Senate bill provision is made for substitutes to be obtained from the Army or Navy. The House committee propose no such provision in their substitute. They think it better not to let substitute agents get among the troops at all. They think it better that those who have enlisted in the Army or Navy shall remain where they are unless they are transferred, or re-enlist under the general provisions of law, and shall not be permitted to be made subjects of search and bargain, nor be hunted for to be procured as substitutes for other persons regularly drafted.

Without dwelling upon this—for I do not propose now to argue these points—I will, in passing, remark that it struck the House committee as being exceedingly inexpedient to throw open the ranks of the Army and Navy to those persons who may be hunting for substitutes, and thus perhaps have substitute agencies established in every camp where the commanding officer will allow substitute agents to go.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will the gentleman from Ohio allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It is upon the first point to which the gentleman has spoken. Do the House Committee on Military Affairs intend to leave the effect of paying the $300 commutation the same as under the old law?

Mr. SCHENCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. And it is to relieve the party paying the commutation for the same length of time?

Mr. SCHENCK. There is nothing in the original law in regard to the length of time that it shall relieve the party. That is provided for in another part of this bill. The law on that subject is silent. A construction has been put upon the law in two different ways. The last and prevailing construction is that it relieves the party for a period of three years.

To avoid all ambiguity hereafter, and to limit the length of time for which freedom from draft is purchased by the payment of commutation money, a provision will be found in the substitute reported by the committee. What I mean to say is this—and I repeat it in order that there may be no misunderstanding—that as far as the $300 commutation is concerned, the House committee proposes to leave it precisely as it is, having concluded that it is not expedient to report any change.

Mr. STEVENS. The old law has received the construction that the payment of the $300 exempts the party from service for three years. If I understand the substitute aright it changes that.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman is right in regard to that matter. It leaves the law as it is, but defines clearly by law a construction as to the time of exemption, not leaving it hereafter to executive interpretation.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is just the question I desired to ask, whether it is the intention of the House committee to leave that matter as it is under the last construction given to it.

Mr. SCHENCK. Not as I understand the last construction to be. The Committee on Military Affairs has defined a limit of time, which may be varied at the pleasure of the House if it does not agree with the committee in regard to that limitation.

Mr. STROUSE. Is the limit which the gentleman speaks of stated in the bill now before the House?

Mr. SCHENCK. It is stated in the substitute. There is a section introduced in it which does not appear at all in the Senate bill. It is the fifth section in the amendment offered by the committee. Members will recollect that, by the existing law, all able-bodied persons between the ages of twenty and forty-five are placed on the enrollment list. The Senate bill has provisions looking to the exhausting of that enrollment. The House committee proposes a principle to be incorporated by legislation for future purposes into the provisions of this bill, which will make the enrollment, as it were, continuous as long as there shall remain a necessity, from time to time, of ordering or making drafts. The fifth section of the substitute (with an omission which we propose to remedy at the proper time) provides:

That boards of enrollment shall enroll all persons liable to draft under the provisions of this bill, or under the act to which it is an amendment, whose names may have been omitted by the proper enrolling officers; all persons who shall arrive at the age of twenty years before the draft; and all persons discharged from the military or naval service of the United States who have not been in such service two years during the present war; and said boards of enrollment shall release and discharge from draft all persons who, between the time of the enrollment and the draft, shall have arrived at the age of forty-five years, and shall strike the names of such persons from the enrollment.

The effect of this will be to make the enrollment, as I said, continuous. It is a provision that instead of enrolling those who are now, or were at the time of the first enrollment, between the ages of twenty and forty-five, and then drawing from time to time until there remains a residuum which itself would be exhausted, there will be a keeping up of the enrollment, by adding the name of every person who becomes liable to the draft. For instance, aliens who become naturalized will fall within the description of persons liable to draft, and when they thus become naturalized or declare their intention to become naturalized, if not before placed on the enrollment lists, they will then rightfully take their places there. Their names will be entered by the enrolling board in each district without any further legislation.

Again, Mr. Chairman, it is provided that every person arriving at the age of twenty years will be, when he reaches that age, placed on the enrolling list, and that every person arriving at the age of forty-five—thus passing the maximum at which he may be rightfully drawn—passes off the enrollment list. Thus, without enlarging on this section, the committee will see that the Committee on Military Affairs has introduced a new feature in the bill, providing that this enrollment shall be like a scroll moving along, on which from time to time and as fast as they become liable to military service, the names of all persons shall be placed, and from which the names of all persons on it, as they reach the age of forty-five, shall be removed.

The seventh section also introduces a new feature, but I will state to the House now that the Committee on Military Affairs proposes to drop that section from the amendment.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Ohio allow me now to call his attention to the inquiry which I made before, and which refers to the sixth section? I wish to know whether the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs is to make the payment of $300 an exemption from the one draft only?

Mr. SCHENCK. For the one draft, provided that in no instance shall it apply for more than one year. That is the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not now understand the answer of the gentleman. I cannot find the words in the bill which limit it to one year.

Mr. SCHENCK. The gentleman will find that we have used the word "quota" in the House bill, and that we have confined our legislation to each successive quota or call. We propose that the commutation shall purchase exemption from that call, from that quota; but that the exemption shall not extend, in consequence of such commutation having been paid, beyond one year. The gentleman will find the provision in the sixth section of the substitute which the committee have reported.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Michigan. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to explain the language in lines fourteen and fifteen of this section: "Such payment of money shall operate only to relieve such person from draft in filling that quota."

Mr. SCHENCK. It is proposed that at the end of the year these persons shall be enrolled again, and in this way that this continuous enrollment shall be kept up.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Suppose there were two drafts in the same year?

Mr. SCHENCK. I suppose then a year's exemption would be allowed. The committee did not, however, anticipate in their bill so frequent drafts as are now taking place.

But in these remarks my intention was to point out the general features of difference between the Senate bill and the substitute reported by the Committee on Military Affairs. Afterwards, I would be glad to take it up section by section and clause by clause, in determining the correctness of the phraseology to which we have resorted to carry out these ideas. I think we shall simplify the matter by doing so, and I will therefore proceed with these general views.

Section seven, gentlemen will see, contains a provision that those who are exempted from physical disability, but who have an annual income equal to $1,200, shall not be exempt except upon the payment of $300 commutation.

This was introduced by us with some hesitancy, as a new principle in our legislation; and I am instructed to say that upon subsequent reflection, it being inconsistent, independent of any other reason, with the original act of which this is an amendment, requiring that only able-bodied persons between the ages of twenty and forty-five shall be enrolled at all, the committee have thought it proper to withdraw it from the substitute which they offer. If gentlemen will look at the original act to which this is an amendment they will find a provision that the enrollment shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States, and persons of foreign birth who shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States under the laws thereof, between the ages of twenty and forty-five, except as thereafter exempted. Inasmuch, therefore, as only able-bodied persons are to be enrolled at all under the original law, it would be inconsistent to require a man who is physically disabled, and who ought therefore never to have been enrolled at all, to pay $300 commutation.

If gentlemen will look at the matter, they will see that however there may be equity in this provision, however strong the desire may be to ingraft some principle upon our legislation to reach those who, although they may be physically disabled, yet ought, in some form, to contribute to the support of the Government in its time of need beyond the payment of their ordinary taxes, yet when they take into consideration that they were not rightfully placed upon the enrollment list at all, you will see that they have the right to claim that, having been improperly included in the list, their names shall be taken off.

For this reason the Committee on Military Affairs have determined to drop the seventh section from their substitute, and at the proper time, by their direction, I shall move to strike it out.

The substitute of the House leaves out the provision of the nineteenth section, that is, the provision which provides for the conscientious scruples of Friends and other religious denominations who are unwilling to perform military service or to pay anything as commutation therefor, for I understand that their scruples go the whole length. If that be so, I do not see how the Senate, by the provision that they may be drafted to go into the hospitals to act as nurses, would much benefit them.

But I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the merits of any of these amendments. That will come up at the proper time, when we consider the bill section by section. I only attract the attention of the House to the fact that the bill proposes to leave out section nineteen of the Senate bill.

The other exemptions are in the main, I believe, precisely the same in the Senate bill as in the substitute—that is, we have limited them to the President and Vice President of the United States; to certain official persons, and those who are disabled by reason of mental or physical infirmities. They are left out in the House amendment as they are left out in the Senate bill.

Now, in reference to what may be called the humanitarian provisions of the existing law. When this shall become the subject of discussion, it will be considered whether the benevolence and kindness of the Government toward citizens who could not well perform military service, because they had others dependent upon them, have not in practice and will not continue to be overbalanced by the frauds and abuses committed under the existing law. However that may be, as between the Senate bill and the House amendment, there is no difference on that point.

There is another change by the introduction of new matter, to which I will next call attention of members. Section seventeen of the House amendment provides that the Secretary of War shall be authorized, whenever in his judgment the public interest will be subserved thereby, to permit or require boards of examination of enrolled or drafted men to hold their examinations at different points within their respective enrollment districts, to be determined by him.

Many applications for relief have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs by the House on account of the inconvenience of the present law. It has been found in practice that it works great inconvenience when boards of enrollment are required as now to sit only at some one place as headquarters. Though it may be convenient enough in the cities, or in populous districts, consisting of only one county, as in New York State, yet it is a great inconvenience to the citizens of large districts, who are compelled to travel fifty, sixty, and sometimes even one hundred or one hundred and fifty miles to the headquarters of the enrollment board. There are instances in Pennsylvania, among the mountains, where men in traveling to the enrollment board where they were summoned, or before which they went for examination, had to go one hundred and fifty miles. They did that where roads are not of the best, and at an expense which they could ill afford.

The reason why county seats were not selected—

Mr. ELIOT. Let me interrupt the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs for a moment. I am desirous to call his attention to section seventeen of the substitute, and to ask him whether, in his judgment, the law as it now stands does not contain full power to the Secretary of War to do precisely what this section authorizes? whether the law does not give full authority to fix different places in a district for holding the sittings of these enrollment boards? I understand that such is the case.

Mr. SCHENCK. The committee were of the opinion that it did not, except by a violent construction. There is a provision in regard to sub-districts from which that power might be inferred.

Mr. ELIOT. I inquire whether in point of practice this power has not been assumed by the Secretary of War?

Mr. SCHENCK. It may have been in some instances, but of this I know nothing. In some districts where it might properly have been done I know that it has not been done. The committee thought it better, instead of leaving this matter to be determined hereafter by construction which may vary from time to time, to give the express power and to make it directory on the Department to give this migratory character to boards of enrollment. It is different from the provision in the existing law in reference to sub-districts. The petitions on this subject, not only from the people but from the officers of the enrollment boards, are that the boards may sit in the different districts at the county towns. But it has been thought better that the Secretary of War should define the places where they might be authorized to sit, for this, among other reasons: that though there may be two, three, or four county towns in an enrolment district, they may be so situated as not to make it important that the enrollment board should hold sessions in each one of them. A further reason exists in the fact that in such States as Kentucky and Missouri, and in other parts of the country still held to be loyal, or where elections at least have been held, it would be found exceedingly inconvenient for the enrollment board at all times to go to the county towns. They might be met by guerrillas, if not by rebels in more formidable bodies, who would render their peregrinations uncomfortable. The committee prefer the shape they have given this matter in the seventeenth section, thereby leaving the Secretary of War to determine the points at which the enrollment boards shall hold their sessions.

As far as I recollect, I have now stated all the material differences between the substitute and the original bill itself. There are some sections in the two which are precisely identical, which are the Senate sections properly. There are other sections of the Senate bill which were changed somewhat in phraseology, or in matters not affecting the body of the section as the Senate left it. But it was thought advisable, on account of these changes, to rewrite the whole bill. The bill, however, as I said before, comes before the committee in the convenient shape of the Senate bill, as it was believed by the committee that in that manner they could present it easier, and have an earlier consideration of it, than by attempting to pass a bill of their own. The substitute embodies all the changes, as well as what remains of the Senate bill, and in that shape the House committee chose to present it to the committee and the House.

Mr. CHANLER. Mr. Chairman, the history as well as the ultimate object of this bill is clearly expressed in the words of the Provost Marshal General's report, namely:

"The act of March 3, 1863, for enrolling and calling out the national forces, is the first ever passed by Congress in which the Government has appealed directly to the citizens of the United States to create a large army without the intervention of the authorities of the respective States."

By this act, Congress strikes at State sovereignty with a mailed hand; aiming to establish a standing army of gigantic proportions, to be drawn directly from the body of the people of each State, without any check from, or consultation with, the State governments. Such, sir, is the avowed intention and the unmistakable spirit of this law. Moreover, it is an imitation of a French edict, of most questionable origin and dangerous results; an edict born of the French Revolution. A child of the republic, it became the guardian of the empire and dynasty of Napoleon. It carries the stamp of tyranny upon its face, and in its course has been fatal to representative government.

A French Secretary of War, Carnot I think, first conceived the idea of raising an army by lottery. The modifications of his plan have resulted in the system now fastened by this Administration on the American people.

Would it not be well, sir, to examine the career of France, once a sister republic, under the influence of this method of raising national forces? The conscription began in France at that period of her eventful history when she was reeling in frenzy, scarce free from the Reign of Terror. Her condition was hopeless, beyond perhaps that of any people of modern times. By the happy inspiration of despair, Carnot drew an army from the prostrate nation by lottery. The first coalition was broken by its victories. The foe was hurled back from her frontiers with Gallic fierceness, and France became again a power among nations.

But, sir, I hope here you will weigh well the import of these words: France became a military republic from that hour, an aggressor upon every border, an enemy to every neighbor. The stride onward from a military republic to a military, imperial despotism was so swift and so sure and so destructive to constitutional liberty, that we who propose to fix this vital principle of the military system of France as the law of this Union may well look back, around, and beyond, before we dismiss this subject. We should remember that the French republic fell at the bidding of General Bonaparte; that he and a handful of veteran conscripts closed the doors of the senate of his country, bound liberty to his throne, and transmitted his claim to be master of the French to his now most Christian Majesty. It is true that he reestablished order and conquered the enemies of his country. But it is also true that he overthrew the independence of her people, and on the ruins reared the dazzling mausoleum of a military aristocracy. For that work the conscript law furnished the machinery, and his own great genius the method. Thus centralized power found its great exemplar in Napoleon, who fixed centralization as the law of government for his successors. Whoever holds Paris rules France; who controls the army rules Paris. The consent of the army once gained, and the will of the people is invited to express itself through the formality of a ballot. The sweet voices all chime in most suspicious harmony; not unlike the rumored elections in some border States of this Union.

Such, sir, is an imperfect sketch of the working of a conscript law in what was once republican France. There it found a congenial soil and a fit occasion. Here I sincerely hope it may never take root; if it should, I believe it will pervert the native courage of our people, and turn their noble enthusiasm for this Government into callous indifference; or it will rouse their just indignation against those who have signalized their political career by the adoption of and adherence to such laws as this under the specious plea of military necessity. Sir, the national defense and the suppression of this rebellion undoubtedly call for all our available force at this time, and I am in favor of using all constitutional and necessary means to preserve the integrity and to restore the lawful and undisputed authority of this Government over this whole Union. I believe that the Constitution has clearly and sufficiently provided the power to carry the country safely through this rebellion or through any subsequent crisis. But this bill is inconsistent with the Constitution, and inimical to the welfare of every free people. It creates justifiable dissatisfaction which may very naturally lead to discord between the people and this Government, and may eventually sever those ties of sympathy and interest which have bound them together in harmony and strength up to and through this war. No necessity exists, has existed, or is now imminent which calls for this law; and having been tried fairly and found insufficient as a means of enrolling and calling out the national forces, it should be repealed, or at least so amended as to be limited in its objects as a law, first, to enroll all persons liable to military duty; second, to secure the return of deserters and prevent desertion.

Mr. Chairman, if this general review of the bill justifies the hope that it may be repealed, the consideration of the practical bearing and effect of the details of this enrollment act will certainly strengthen that hope. The disposal of human life by lottery is a solemn theme, which every just man contemplates with feelings akin to awe. With a humble deference to the wisdom which devised it, and with an earnestness of purpose due to the object of the law, I looked upon it as one of that sacred order of appeals which puts man's destiny upon the throw of a die; such as we are told of in the sad stories of shipwreck, when men, forced to the alternative of dooming one to death lest all should perish, cast lots in silent prayer to the great Judge that the blood of the one taken may not be on the heads of the survivors. But the truth soon burst through the solemn farce which clothed the law with flimsy dignity, and the positive injustice of its spirit, and the downright wrong done in its practice, stood revealed in ridiculous absurdity. The mystery of fate was made manifest in a money equivalent; and the majesty of law had the hopeful chink of cash, which rang the changes on the merciful chance of escape to the tune of $300. The die was to be cast to fix the fate of a mortal, but blind justice loaded the dice for capitalists. The lot was to be drawn, but he who might be taken could buy exemption. The game was to be played and human life the stake, but he who knew how the cards were pricked was sure to win. Sir, as the truth revealed itself, every honest mind felt a thrill of indignation. The law for "enrolling and calling out the national forces" had become a mere money question. The Government plays highwayman in shoulder-straps, and cries, "Stand and deliver—your money or your life!"

By its operation upon the individual citizen an invidious distinction is drawn between those who have $300 to spare and those who have not. In an honorable cause, the service of the country, where all should share the common danger without distinction of class, (whenever necessity may demand such an extreme measure as a conscript law,) we find a preference given to capital, which can always take care of itself, over labor, which is always dependent on law for protection: letting the one go free and forcing the other to serve; cheating the working man of his chief and priceless privileges of independence and equality under the law.

Sir, this act lowers the dignity of labor and compels every sound, able-bodied mechanic to assume the pauper's plea, or follow the drum in default of a miserable money equivalent. It compels him to accept public charity or private bounty, or march to the music of a provost marshal's order. It degrades the laboring classes, without whose sturdy arms and brave spirit, patient long-suffering and noble fortitude, this Government would soon die out and fall from its high place like a young oak blighted at the root. By the operation of this law upon the States of this Union, a most unfair distinction is made between those which furnish men to fill the quota fixed by Congress and those which furnished the equivalent in money. The blood of the people of one State is drained from every artery of industry and every vein of enterprise on the one hand, while a roll of greenbacks issued from the national Treasury building to meet the necessity created by war, or waste, or corruption, may, on the other hand, be paid as the price of human blood in compensation for military service. One State may thus lose the pith and marrow of her population, while the other, her more canny or crafty sister State, loses only a bundle or two of national paper currency, which is depreciating every month by the natural laws of finance. Sir, at least let the price of an American citizen when put up at public sale be fixed in coin.

The Administration has not made it very clear to the country why the innovation should be made upon the well-established custom and constitutional precedent of relying on the militia and volunteers for the national defense. It has been suggested that economical views had induced the change; that the loss of public money by contractors, and the outcry made over it, led the party in power to filter the Army appropriations to some extent through a Provost Marshal's Bureau. To this end a law was necessary which should compel each citizen drafted to come up to the captain of cavalry's office and settle; and to enable that functionary to bring them to a speedy and satisfactory settlement he was supplied with a well-paid corps of spies, detectives, and informers, and empowered to arrest and imprison on his mere suspicion, in direct violation of every principle of the Constitution established for the protection of personal liberty. The whole sum raised by this most magnanimous Administration, through this praiseworthy process of law, is estimated to be about $10,518,000; the whole force enrolled and mustered into the service, after deducting those who enlisted and were credited on the quotas after the draft was ordered, about 25,000 men; the cost of the Provost Marshal's Bureau about $1,200,000, without estimating the cost of enforcing the draft in districts where disturbance arose from resistance to this law of enrollment.

Mr. Chairman, as an economical measure, the practical experience of the Administration relative to this act is forcibly set forth by Mr. Secretary Stanton in his letter to the President dated January 4, Executive Document No. 17, namely:

"And although much difference of opinion exists in respect to the merits of the system of raising troops by volunteers and the payment of bounties, and the system of raising an adequate force by draft, two things are certain:

"First. That whatever may be the weight of argument or the influence of individual opinion, a large portion of the people in every State prefer the method of contributing their portion of the military force by bounty to volunteers, rather than by draft.

"Second. That veteran soldiers who have become inured to service, even when paid bounty, constitute a cheaper force than new recruits or drafted men without bounty."

Mr. Chairman, could I be convinced that there existed in this country an overwhelming necessity, such as gave rise to a similar law in France at the time of the first coalition, then, sir, I would yield all my objections to this bill and submit cheerfully to the evils which it threatens and the injustice which it perpetuates, provided always the exemption clause were reduced to a nominal sum or stricken out.

But I see no necessity for the law. I deny that any exists, has existed, or is imminent. The Constitution has fully provided for "calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion." The volunteer system has furnished all the national forces we have needed or can need. We have not made full use of the power given and provided to do the very thing this bill proposes to do in a most obnoxious manner.

Certainly, sir, until we shall have exhausted the remedy prescribed by the Constitution for the very evil which now deranges the Union, it is unnecessary to empiricize with new and untried remedies. But how much more unnecessary is it to continue a practice which has proved so utterly ineffectual as this. Besides, the Administration are bound to show that no adequate constitutional power existed for meeting this crisis before they can claim a necessity for introducing a measure which is doubtful in its nature, having been declared unconstitutional by high judicial authority in the State courts, and being without any sanction from the United States court.
